

47985

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME CXXXVII
JULY 5, 1933, to DECEMBER 27, 1933

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXVII

JULY 5, 1933, to DECEMBER 27, 1933

(Nos. 3548-3573)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1-28	July 5	365-392	October 4
29-56	July 12	393-420	October 11
57-84	July 19	421-466	October 18
85-112	July 26	467-494	October 25
113-140	August 2	495-522	November 1
141-168	August 9	523-550	November 8
169-196	August 16	551-578	November 15
197-224	August 23	579-606	November 22
225-252	August 30	607-634	November 29
253-280	September 6	635-662	December 6
281-308	September 13	663-690	December 13
309-336	September 20	691-718	December 20
337-364	September 27	719-746	December 27

Abbott, Edith	A
Relief, crisis in; S.....		400
Actors; and the depression. R. Middlemass; S.....		349
Adler, Felix, tribute to. O. G. Villard; S.....		473
Advertising and the depression. J. Rorty; S.....		703
See also Food and drug bill; Newspapers
Advice to the lovelorn. W. Troy; MP.....		744 Aeronautics
Airships, Macon and Graf Zeppelin. S.....
Fitz-Kandolph and H. Phillips; S.....		480
Arctic regions made familiar; EP.....		115
Affiliates, security. See Banks
Agricultural adjustment act
Constitutionality. M. Finkelstein; S.....		428
See also Prices, Wheat
Agriculture
Administration program; EP.....		85
California, revolt. T. Rodriguez and W. G. Fennell; C.....		272
Farmers' holiday association, strike; EP.....		496
Farmers' strike; EP.....		551
Farmers' strike. B. H. Hibbard; S.....		589
Farming and jobless. J. G. Weisman; C.....		485
Open letter to President Roosevelt, on strike. O. G. Villard; S.....		585
Processing taxes. M. A. Hallgren; S.....		101
Rehabilitation and codes. P. Y. Anderson; S.....		699
Ah, wilderness! J. W. Krutch; D.....		458
Aiken, Conrad
Prelude; P.....		162; 446; 570
Airships. See Aeronautics
Albatross; Dt.....		510
Alcoholic liquors
Control after repeal; E.....		255
Pennsylvania legislation to regulate sale; EP.....		636
Problems, new; John D. Rockefeller, junior, report by R. B. Fosdick and A. L. Scott; E.....		583
See also Prohibition
All good Americans. J. W. Krutch; D.....		744
Allen, Daniel
Coal strike truce in Pennsylvania; S.....		205
Mine war in Pennsylvania; S.....		176
Aluminum industry; code for. P. Y. Anderson; S.....		402
Amend, Katharine M.
Government builds houses; S.....		644
American bankers' association; address of J. H. Jones; EP.....		310
American federation of labor
Convention, Washington; EP.....		421
Craft unions sustained in convention; E.....		470
Defended. H. Warmke; C.....		411; see also EP.....
Gains; EP.....		86
Leaders, new, needed. H. Seidman; S.....		431
Leadership; EP.....		421
Americans
American virility and British decadence. E. S. Bates; S.....		445

Americans in Germany, assaults on; EP.....		142
Anderson, Paul Y.
Agriculture, rehabilitation and codes; S.....		699
Aluminum industry, code for; S.....		402
Beck, J. M., attack on National industrial recovery act; S.....		649
Business depression, revolution as outcome? S.....		234
Business, last chance; S.....		64
Cates, D. C., resignation; S.....		348
Coal code; S.....		348
Coal mines, "captive"; S.....		481
Cotton; reduction in acreage; S.....		120
"Dysentery." L. Towley; C.....		47
Farley, J. A., defeat in New York city election; S.....		595
Government without congress; S.....		11
Humphrey, W., attempted removal from office; S.....		481
Ickes, Secretary, strength; S.....		64
Illness and recovery; S.....		481
Income tax, beating; S.....		64
Inflation; S.....		348; 649
Johnson, H. S., and freedom of the press; S.....		234
La Guardia, Fiorello H.; S.....		503
Moley, R., resignation; S.....		290
National industrial recovery act; S.....		120
At work; S.....		181
Chaos in administration; S.....		11
Criticism; S.....		290; see also C.....
Labor decision under act; S.....		348
Prospects disquieting; S.....		348
Trouble; S.....		595
Newspaper publishers and the act; S.....		181; 402; 669
Working off; S.....		402; see also EP.....
Railroads, wage cut, attempted; S.....		11
Reconstruction finance corporation loan to Russia; S.....		64
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Administration; attack by Republican national committee; S.....		699
Administration not breaking up; S.....		649
Administration scandal threatened; S.....		699
Progressiveness; S.....		120
Stock-market investigation; S.....		649
Tugwell (Copeland) bill; S.....		699
Another language. W. Troy; MP.....		250; see also C.....
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Apache county, Arizona; teaching on promises. E. M. Schnebly; C.....		105
Arbiter, sole; Dt.....		46
Architects
And the depression. T. F. Hamlin; S.....		152; see also EP.....
Chicago, call to. S. Greenberg; C.....		273
Armament limitation and disarmament
Conference, Geneva, outlook bad; EP.....		339
German withdrawal from conference; EP.....		467
German withdrawal from League of nations; E.....		499
League of nations and arms; E.....		641
Outlook; E.....		368; see also C.....
Preparations for war, active; EP.....		424
Armaments. See Navies
Armour and company; stock juggling. P. H. Noyes; S.....		300
Armwood, George. See Lynchings
Army, United States
Enlargement, movement for; EP.....		114
Posts, elimination; EP.....		338
Art
Under capitalism. K. Burke; S.....		675
See also Pach, W.
As thousands cheer. J. W. Krutch; D.....		458
Associated press; attitude toward National industrial recovery act provisions for its employees; EP.....		497
Atom, release of power not imminent; EP.....		340
Atterbury, William Wallace; salary reduction to $60,000 a year; EP.....		394
Austria
Dollfuss dictatorship; EP.....		366
In danger. J. Gunther; S.....		320
National socialism in. O. W. Holden; S.....		14
Plight, political; E.....		285
See also Jews
Authors; Kipling's views; EP.....		87
Automobiles
Code; EP.....		309; see also.....
Union organized; EP.....		552
Aviation. See Aeronautics
B
Babbitt, Irving; death; EP.....		87
Back-to-the-land movement. See Cities
Bacteriophages in fishy water; E.....		117

Bailie, Earl; appointment to treasury department; EP.....		663
Balbo, Italo; hero Balbo. G. Seldes; S.....		131
Baldwin, G. A.
"Mob" and "best people"; C.....		439; see also C.....
Balloons, dirigible. See Aeronautics
Bankers. See Banks
Banking, investment. See Stocks and bonds
Banks
And insurance. H. L. Perez; C.....		512; see also.....
And political parties; EP.....		31
Bankers and public questions. O. G. Villard; S.....		259
Bankers at work in Washington; E.....		369
Detroit panic, inquiry; EP.....		30
Inquiry, Washington; E.....		369
Portrait of a banker, A. H. Wiggin; E.....		556
Security affiliates, liability. H. W. Harris; S.....		262
Taking of loans from Reconstruction finance corporation urged by J. H. Jones; EP.....		310
Barnett, Amos H.
Income tax for government employees; C.....		243
Bartlett, Louis
Cities, tax-free; C.....		132; see also.....
Barton, Bruce; suppression of extortion case news by some New York newspapers; EP.....		115
Bates, Ernest Sutherland
American virility and British decadence; S.....		445
Bauer, Catherine
"Slum clearance" or "housing"; S.....		730
Beacon participations, incorporated; directors held to liability for transactions. H. W. Harris; S.....		262
Bechuanaland; banishment of chief Tshekedi for flogging white man, and return; EP.....		468
Beck, James M., attack on National industrial recovery act ridiculed. P. Y. Anderson; S.....		650
Becker, Carl
Grey, Sir Edward; C.....		510; see also.....
Beffel, John Nicholas
Murder and the Khaki shirts; S.....		620
Begun, Isidore; dismissal; EP.....		31
Behrman, S. N., comic wisdom. J. W. Krutch; S.....		74
Bellamy, Edward, Association; C.....		485
Benedict, Ruth
Ways not winds' ways; P.....		655
Bennett, Arnold, and his reading of books; Dt.....		215
Bennington college for women. H. Herring; S.....		651
Benson, E. M.
Orozco murals at Dartmouth; A.....		546
Berkeley square. W. Troy; MP.....		363
Bernstein, Philip S.
Nazi duplicity; S.....		728
Bernstein, Samuel
On Stolberg review of his book, Beginnings of Marxian socialism in France; C.....		484; see also.....
Bicycle, revival and history; E.....		258
Birth control; legislation urged; EP.....		581
Birthing. L. S. G.; D.....		661
Bitter sweet. W. Troy; MP.....		308
Blackwell, Alice Stone
British greed in India; C.....		300
Blanshard, Paul
La Guardia versus McKee; S.....		474
Spain's unfinished revolution; S.....		260
Bloch, Alan
Dance, the; Jooss and Lifar companies; S.....		632
Blue eagle. See National industrial recovery act
Blumberg, Isidore, dismissal; EP.....		31
Books
Books I have never read. C. Van Doren and others; S.....		536; see also C.....
Children's. H. Colby; S.....		572
Children's; list. S. L. Goldsmith; S.....		573
Education by books. M. Van Doren; S.....		655
Fall list.....		460
Inflated format. E. W. Parks; C.....		133; see also C.....
Non-fiction, in demand; EP.....		143
Unread; Dt.....		381
See also Censorship, literary; Criticism, literary Bootleggers; Dt.....		734
Boyd, Ernest
Books I have never read; S.....		536; see also C.....

- Boyle, Kay
Flight of fish; P..... 190
Flying foxes and others; P..... 444
- Bradley, Rose
Maryland lynching; S..... 672
- Brady, Matthew B., biographical material sought. C. Flato; C..... 327
- Bread; price, rise in; EP..... 58
- Brenner, Anita
Revolution in Spain. I. Revolt from the top; S..... 435
II. Fear of fascism; S..... 508
- Brevet, Madame; expelled from Switzerland; EP..... 2
- Bridgeport, Connecticut, goes socialist. J. C. Rich; S..... 646
- Brown, Harrison
Hitlerism, six months of; S....121; see also C..... 299
- Bryan, Horace
Story of all miners; C..... 326
- Bullitt, William Christian, presents credentials; EP..... 720
- Bundling. J. W. Krutch; S..... 493
- Burke, Kenneth
Art under capitalism; S..... 675
New school for social research concerts; M..... 633
Schönberg music; M..... 633
- Burroughs, Mrs. Williana, dismissal; EP.... 31
- Business
Last chance. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 64
Picking up. W. Gropper; Ct..... 92
Profits versus general recovery; E..... 116
Swope plan for doing away with control; E..... 554
- Business depression
Illness in; E..... 471
Illness and recovery. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 481 Improvement, and unemployment; EP.. 141
Prices, higher, inevitable under recovery program; EP..... 365
Professional men and women, effect on. See Unemployment Revolution as outcome? P. Y. Anderson; S..... 234
- Butler, Hilton
Murders of Negroes for jobs; S..44; see also C..... 273
- "Buy now"—on $30 a week. J. R. Martin; S....502; see also 500; see also C.. 625
- C
Cabell, Branch
Books I have never read; S..536; see also C..... 625
- Cafeterias. See Restaurants
- Caffery, Jefferson; appointment as ambassador to Cuba; E..... 230
- Caldwell, Erskine; Made in America. C. Van Doren; S..... 443
- California
Cotton, blood-stained. M. A. de Ford; S. 705
See also Lynchings
- Cammer, Moses
Economic interdependence; C..383; see also 21
- Captains of industry; and public questions. O. G. Villard; S..... 259
- Carr, Charlotte E., appointed secretary of industry and labor, Pennsylvania; EP. 115
- Cates, Dudley C., resignation as industrial adviser to national recovery administration. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 348
- Censorship, literary; Ulysses, sale held legal; E..... 695
- Censorship, moving pictures; eliminations ordered by New York board of censors; E..... 528
- Censorship, radio; Hoover address on Russia censored; C..... 272
- Central statistical board; creation; EP..... 311
- Champagne, sec. J. W. Krutch; D..... 521
- Chapman, John Jay; death; E..... 584
- Charleston, South Carolina; Dt..... 597
- Chase, Stuart
Eating without working; S..... 93
On review of his "The promise of power"; C.....653; see also..... 489
- Chase national bank; Cuban graft; EP..... 525
- Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific railway; bankruptcy. P. H. Noyes; S..... 160
- Chicago, University of, financial policy. P. H. Douglas; C....410; see also C.. 213; C..... 356
- Child labor; lessening, without aiding children. A. B. Lewis; C..540; see also.. 287
- Childbirth, hazards of; E..... 612
- Children; Dt..... 567
- Children's books and toys; Dt..... 298
- China
Fukien rebellion; EP..... 692
Loan, Reconstruction finance corporation. J. Loeb; C..... 105 Prisoners, inhuman treatment. L. Colman; C..... 216
See also Chinese-Japanese relations
Chinese eastern railway. See Japanese-Russian relations
- Chinese in America. See Immigration
- Chinese-Japanese relations; Manchukuo, Japan's purpose in. T. J. League; C.. 382
- Christmas
"Gift advisers"; EP..... 721
Slogan, Salvation army's; EP..... 719
- Chrysler building, Chicago. J. W. Root; C. 216
- Cigar makers, Tampa; alleged rioters released; EP..... 142
- Cities, flight from; E..... 32
- Civil service
Roosevelt program; E..... 88
Ruling on employment of persons over forty; EP.....552; EP..... 580
- Civil works administration. See Unemployment
- Civilian conservation corps; soil-erosion work; EP..... 581
- Clark, Stetson
Muscle shoals, whooping up; S..... 124
- Clemens, Cyril
Seeks material on P. V. Nasby; C.... 47
- Cleveland, Ohio; home-owners in revolt. J. Steele; S..... 266
- Coal
Code; E.....313; EP..... 337
Code. P. Y. Anderson; S..234; S.... 348
- Coal miners, American
"Captive" mine situation. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 481
Misery; appeal for help. J. Myers; C.. 106
Pennsylvania, strike; national guard to insure fair play; EP..... 143
Pennsylvania; truce. D. Allen; S..... 205
Pennsylvania, war in. D. Allen; S.... 176
Story of all coal miners. H. Bryan; C. 326 Telegram to President Roosevelt on conditions. A. B. Wieck; C..... 540
- Codes. See National industrial recovery act
- Colby, Harriet
Children's books; S..... 572
- College instructors and professors and the depression. W. B. Thomas; S..213; see also C.....356; C..... 382
- Colman, Louis
Prisoners in China; C..... 216
- Columbus, Ohio, workers' school; asks books. A. Johnson; C..... 598
- "Communist manifesto, the." J. W. Krutch; S..... 49
- Communist party, American, in difficulties; EP..... 86
- Composers. See Music
- Compton, Mrs. O. C. A.; degree "in motherhood"; EP..... 3
- Conferences, international, failure. H. J. Laski; S..... 65
- Congress
Government without congress. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 11
Meeting, date of. W. C. Hill; C..... 384
- Consumers
Cooperative distributors, incorporated. E. J. Lever; C..... 438
See also National industrial recovery act
- Consumers' advisory board. See National industrial recovery act
- Contempt of court; E..... 145
- Cooperative distributors, incorporated. E. J. Lever; C..... 438
- Cooperatives and National recovery administration. J. P. Warbasse; S..... 561
- Copeland (Tugwell) bill. See Food and drug bill
- Cornell university; military training still prescribed; EP..... 142
- Corporations; salaries, large; E..... 527
- Cost of living, rise in, and decrease in unemployment; EP..... 311
- Cotton
Acreage reduction. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 120
Acreage reduction plan; EP..366; EP.. 608
Blood-stained, in California. M. A. de Ford; S..... 705
Tax on processing; EP..... 85
See also Russia
- Counsellor-at-law. W. Troy; MP..... 744
- Count, Jerome
Utility crisis in New York; S.....211; correction; C..... 243
- Countryman, The; Dt..... 409
- Courts
On trial; E..... 584
See also Contempt of court
- Cradle song. W. Troy; MP..... 630
- Crawford, George
Ilisley murder case; résumé; E..... 584
Must return to Virginia for trial on charge of murder of Mrs. A. B. Ilisley and maid; EP..... 469
- "Credit, social." See "Social credit"
- Crime and criminals; politics, connection with; E..... 229
- Criticism, literary. J. W. Krutch; S..... 711
- Critics, literary; books I have never read; C. Van Doren and others; S....536; see also C..... 625
- Cromwell, Arthur D.
Pinchot versus Lippmann; C....189; see also 67
- Crowder, W. A.
Denounces home-loan act; C....384; see also 148
- Cuba
American warships to protect life, not property; EP..... 394
Army revolt; EP..... 281
Caffery appointment as ambassador; E.. 230
Cartoons. Massaguer; Ct.....232, 315
Future; E..... 199
Graft in Machado administration; EP.. 525
House cleaning. H. Herring; S..... 233
Machado, exit. H. Herring; S..... 207
New government in fifth week; EP.... 422
Recognition of de facto government; EP....338; correction, C, 382; EP.. 579
Recognition; Roosevelt views; EP..... 637
Students run government; EP..... 468
Sugar, and the United States; EP..197; E..... 395
United States, duty of; E..... 312
- Currency
"Commodity" dollar; EP..... 198
Dollar, depreciation by government gold-buying; EP..... 636
Devaluation needed; EP....29; EP.... 58
Dollar, falling, and inflation; E..... 367
Dollar, future of; E..... 284
Dollar, Roosevelt policy; E..... 609
Gold policy of Roosevelt administration; EP..... 523
Inflation. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 649
Inflation, demand for. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 348
Inflation, effects of. O. G. Villard; S.. 642
Inflation, meaning of. M. S. Stewart; S. 670
Managed. H. Hazlitt; S..... 94
Money—servant or master? D. W. Ryder; S..... 505
Roosevelt policy, criticism by Secretary Wallace; EP..... 719
Roosevelt policy, statement on; EP.... 495
Stabilize dollar now; E..... 425
Thinner dollars and fatter prices; E.... 638
Wall street and gold policy. P. H. Noyes; S..... 653
- Czecho-slovakia; Nazi neighbors. E. E. Kisch; S..... 99
- D
Dairy business
Regulation; EP..... 664
See also Milk
- Dancing; Jooss and Lifar ballets. A. Bloch; S..... 632
- Dark tower, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 688
- Dartmouth college murals. E. M. Benson; A. 546
- Dean, O. S.
Sioux City, Iowa, fight for lower utility rates; S..... 40
- De Ford, Miriam Allen
Blood-stained cotton in California; S.. 705
- Degrees, college, reasons for conferring; EP. 3
- Dell, Robert
German nightmare, the; S..... 433
- Democracy
And finance. R. Herrick; S..... 103
"Best people" and the "mob." R. Herrick; C.....48; see also C..... 439
- Dent, Lancelot
Logic of the rose, the; P..... 354
- Depression. See Business depression
- Design for living. W. Troy; MP..... 660
- Detroit
Marxism in. J. Root; C..... 653
See also Banks
- Dewey, John
Appeal for Rand school; C..... 47
- Dillon, George
Iberian coast; P..... 107
- Dillon, Read and company. See Stocks and bonds
- Dinner at eight. W. Troy; MP..... 308
- Disarmament. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Doctor Monica. J. W. Krutch; D..... 606
- Doctors. See Medical profession
- Dollar, value of. See Currency
- Dollfuss, Engelbert. See Austria
- Double door. J. W. Krutch; D..... 419
- Douglas, Major C. H.
"Social credit" program. D. W. Ryder; S..... 505
- Douglas, Paul H.
Chicago University's financial policy; C....410; see also C....213; C..... 356
- Drama. See Krutch, J. W.
- Drifter on the radio; Dt..... 437
- Drug and food act. See Tugwell bill
- Drugstores, code for; EP..... 525
- Duck soup. W. Troy; MP..... 688
- Durling, Dwight
Night by day; P..... 542
- E
Eagle, blue. See National industrial recovery act
- Earle, George H., third; warns Austrians against anti-semitism; EP..... 637

Eating without working. S. Chase; S..... 93
 Economic conditions
 Eating without working. S. Chase; S..... 93
 Profits versus general recovery; E..... 116
 See also Banks; Business depression; Currency; Industry; National industrial recovery act; Unemployment;
 United States, et cetera Economic conference, world. See World monetary and economic conference Economic interdependence. M. Cammer; C. 383;
 see also..... 21
 Economics; planning, economic; EP..... 393
 Ecuador, adventures in. E. K. Lyon; C..... 105
 Editors. See Newspapers
 Edman, Irwin
 Memory of music, the; P..... 100
 Education
 By books. M. Van Doren; S..... 655
 Progressive, help needed; EP..... 31
 Edward Bellamy association of New York; C. 485
 Eight bells. J. W. Krutch; D..... 576
 Eisenstein, Sergei. W. Troy; MP..... 391
 Eisenstein, Sergei; and U. Sinclair. W.
 Troy; MP..... 83; see also C..... 410
 Election results; EP..... 551
 Electric companies. See Public utilities
 Electric power. See Power and power industry
 Eliot, T. S.; lectures at Harvard. J. W.
 Krutch; S..... 679
 Emperor Jones, the. W. Troy; MP..... 419
 Employees, government. See Government employees
 Employment. See Labor; Unemployment
 Engineers
 And the depression. W. A. Shoudy; S..... 296
 Chicago, call to. S. Greenberg; C..... 273
 Erosion, soil; Civilian conservation corps work; EP..... 581
 Eskimo. W. Troy; MP..... 630
 Europe; tension due to Nazi provocation; EP. 281
 Evans, Albert
 Can the NRA succeed? S..... 345 Evening Post, New York; change to tabloid size; EP..... 340

F

Farley, James A.
 And New York city election; E..... 367
 Defeat in New York city election. P. Y.
 Anderson; S..... 595
 Farm relief. See Agriculture
 Farmers' holiday association. See Agriculture
 Farming. See Agriculture
 Farms; Dt..... 539
 Fascism. See Italy
 Fastov, Charles
 Social workers; C..... 76
 Federal securities act. See Stocks and bonds
 Federal trade commission; appointment of J.
 M. Landis; EP..... 422
 Fennell, W. G.
 California, agrarian revolt; C..... 272
 Ferguson, Katherine
 Physical director and the depression; S.. 504
 Films. See Moving pictures
 Finances. See Banks; Currency
 Finance, articles on. See Noyes, P. H.
 Financiers; in a democracy. R. Herrick; S.. 103
 Finkelstein, Maurice
 National industrial recovery act and Agricultural adjustment act, constitution-ality; S..... 428
 Firemen, railroad. See Railroads
 Fischer, Louis
 Lenin to Franklin D. Roosevelt; S..... 698
 On E. Winter's criticism of his review of her book; C..... 299; see also C..... 104
 Russia: Fear and foreign policy; S..... 403
 Russia's last hard year; S..... 154
 Russia's mental revolution; S..... 288
 Soviet revolution goes on; S..... 592; correction, C..... 625
 United States and Soviet Russia; S..... 559
 Fish, bacteriophages in water; E..... 117
 Fisher, Jacob
 Social workers; C..... 76
 Fitz-Randolph, S., and H. Phillips
 Airship, airing the; S..... 480
 Flato, Charles
 Biographical material on M. B. Brady sought; C..... 327
 Fletcher, John Gould
 On Negro; southern view; C, with editorial comment..... 734
 Food and drug act
 Tugwell (Copeland) bill attacked and defended. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 699
 Tugwell (Copeland) bill, provisions; EP. 720
 Foods, canned; Dt..... 104; 381
 Ford, Henry
 Campaign against, for not signing code;
 EP..... 523
 Opposition to national industrial recovery act; EP..... 309; see also..... 402
 Ford motor company
 Strike. C. M. Mydans; S..... 482
 Foreign service; economy unwise; EP..... 170
 Forestry. See Reforestation

France; socialism, Marxian, beginnings of.
 S. Bernstein; C.... 484; see also.... 23
 Freedom of speech; letters and comment on Nazi propaganda.... 707; see also 526; 615
 Freedom of the press; made issue in defense of lynching; E..... 723
 Freedom of speech; principle involved in suppression of Nazi meeting, New York;
 E..... 526; see also 615, 707

G

G., L. S.
 Birthright; D..... 661
 Gala premiere; Mickey mouse cartoon; W.
 Troy; MP..... 111
 Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand. See India
 Gas companies. See Public utilities
 Geneva conference. See Armament limitation and disarmament
 Genius for sale; E..... 314
 Germans in the United States Nazi politics. L. Lore; S. 615; see also 707, 708
 Nazi propaganda; E..... 526
 Germany
 America, the allies, and Hitler; E..... 499 Americans in Germany. See Americans in Germany
 Anti-Nazi agitation in Germany; E..... 227
 Attacks on foreigners; EP.. 142; EP.. 467
 Boycott, effect on steamship lines; EP. 142
 Church dissent against Nazis; EP.. 607;
 EP..... 664
 Courts, Nazi. R. S. Wheeler; S..... 45
 Death sentences for offenses against government; EP..... 664
 Decrees, Nazi; EP..... 87
 Hitler; ignorance of psychology of other peoples; EP..... 310
 Hitler; views of J. Richter; E..... 557
 Hitlerism; cracking; E..... 397
 Hitlerism; six months of. H. Brown;
 S..... 121; see also C..... 299
 Intellectuals; exiled, hailed in America;
 E..... 398
 Intellectuals, persecution of. K. Langer;
 S..... 72
 Intellectuals; to be brought to "University in Exile," New York; E..... 89 Intellectuals; under Hitler. L. Lieberknecht; S..... 534
 International action called for; E..... 200
 Jews. See Jews
 League of nations, withdrawal from;
 EP..... 467; E..... 499
 Letters on Nation's attitude toward Nazis, and present situation in Germany; C.. 736 Medicine; Nazi blows at; EP..... 226;
 see also C..... 383
 Nazi child-mind. O. G. Villard; S..... 614
 Nazi criminality and thuggery; EP..... 114
 Nazi duplicity. P. S. Bernstein; S..... 728
 Nazi psychology, views of T. Mann; E.. 426
 Nazi unification; E..... 33
 New; persecution of Jews and others. R.
 Neuberger; S..... 376; see also C..... 511
 Nightmare. R. Dell; S..... 433
 Nürnberg Nazi demonstration; EP..... 281
 Outrages, Nazi; EP..... 2
 Persecution of relatives of opponents of Nazis; EP..... 87
 Political opposition, underground. R. B.
 Nelson; S..... 647
 Preparation for war. W. J. Robinson;
 C..... 484; see also E..... 368
 Press, free, suppression of; EP..... 422
 Pro-Nazi propaganda; EP..... 2 Refugees from oppression. R. Schwim-mer; S..... 158
 Reichstag building fire. A. G. Hays; S. 586
 Reichstag building fire, trial; E..... 256;
 E..... 556
 Reichstag building fire, trial. J. Gunther; S..... 674
 Russian policy toward Germany. L.
 Fischer; S..... 403
 Trade unions, dissolution decreed; EP.. 693
 Vaerting, Mathilde; dismissal by Nazis;
 EP..... 170
 War or peace? E.. 368; see also C..... 484
 War, preparation for. E. Schulz; S..... 353
 Gifford, James P.
 Lawyers and the depression; S..... 236
 Glasgow, Ellen
 Books I have never read; S.. 536; see also C..... 625
 God and mathematics; E.. 342; see also C.. 652

G

Gold
 Roosevelt policy; E..... 609
 Valuation of dollar; EP..... 495
 See also Currency
 Goldberg, William Victor
 On authors of The Black Worker; C. 327;
 see also..... 23
 Golden goal, the. W. Troy; MP..... 55
 Goldey, Henry
 Home loan act; with reply by W. F.
 Stevenson; S.. 148; E.. 173; see also
 C..... 384

Goldsmith, Sophie L.
 Children's books, list; S..... 573
 Government employees; discharges; E.... 6;
 E..... 61; E..... 118
 Government, United States. See United States
 Gow, W. Troy; MP..... 717
 Graduate faculty of political and social science. See New school for social research
 Graf Zeppelin. See Aeronautics
 Grain; price break; EP..... 113
 Great Britain
 American virility and British decadence.
 E. S. Bates; S..... 445
 By-election, Laborite victory; EP..... 524
 Navy. See Navies
 Green, Robert W.
 On Germany; C..... 736
 Green bay tree, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 548
 Greenberg, Sol
 Call to Chicago architects and engineers;
 C..... 273
 Greene, George W.
 Tax-free cities; C.. 46; see also C..... 132
 Gregory, Horace
 Ask no return; P..... 599
 Horse of poetry, the; P..... 302
 Grey of Falloden, Viscount. O. G. Villard;
 S..... 316; see also C..... 439; C..... 510
 Gridiron club, barring of women; EP..... 693
 Griffith, Roy
 Critics, reading of; C.. 625; see also.... 536
 Grimm, C. J.
 Resents Nation's views on Germany; C. 243
 Gropper, William
 Business picking up; Ct..... 92
 Grossman, William
 Life insurance, Massachusetts plan; S.. 351
 Gruening, Ernest
 Appointment as adviser to American delegation to Pan-American conference;
 EP..... 580
 Corrects slip in editorial paragraph on Cuba and Ambassador Welles; C..... 382
 Gruening, Martha
 Nazi propaganda; C.. 707; see also 526, 615
 Gunther, John
 Austria, danger in; S..... 320
 Reichstag fire trial; S..... 674

H

Haiti
 Agreement, financial, with United States;
 EP..... 552
 Intervention by United States, question at Pan-American conference; EP.... 663
 "New deal." H. Herring; S..... 596
 Hall, Bolton
 Taxation of land values; C..... 273
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.
 Drive for spoils; S..... 208
 Liberia in shackles; S.. 185; see also C. 653
 Militarism, drifting into; S..... 372
 National recovery administration; S.... 38
 Processing taxes; S..... 101
 Right to strike, the; S..... 530
 Hamburg-American steamship line; boycott of Germany, effect on line; EP..... 142
 Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner
 Architect and the depression; S.... 152;
 see also EP..... 143
 Hammond, John Henry, junior Law in Alabama; S..... 701
 Hansen, Harry
 Books I have never read; S.. 536; see
 also C..... 625
 Harriman, Joseph W.; prosecution, delay;
 EP..... 31
 Harris, Henry W.
 Finance, high, in Boston; S..... 262
 Hauss, John
 Unemployment; C..... 541
 Hays, Arthur Garfield
 Burning of reichstag building; S..... 586
 LaGuardia, F. H.; S.. 71; see also C.. 132
 Hays, Will H.; czar of the movies; E.... 62
 Hayti. See Haiti
 Hazlitt, Henry
 Currencies, managed; S..... 94
 Leaves staff of The Nation to become editor of the American Mercury; EP. 423 Health. See Unemployment
 Heat lightning. J. W. Krutch; D..... 390
 Her man of wax. J. W. Krutch; D..... 493
 Her master's voice. J. W. Krutch; D..... 548
 Herrick, Robert
 Democracy; C.... 48; see also C..... 439
 Democracy and finance; S..... 103
 Herring, Hubert
 Bennington college for women; S..... 651
 Cuba cleans house; S..... 233
 Exit Machado; S..... 207
 Haiti, "new deal"; S..... 596
 Rebellion in Puerto Rico; S..... 618
 Herrmann, Eva
 Woodin, William H.; Ct..... 639
 Hibbard, B. H.
 Farmers in revolt; S..... 589

- Highlander folk school; appeal for books. M. Horton; C. 189
- Highways. See Roads
- Hill, W. C.
Corrects Nation on date of meeting of congress; C. 384
- Hillquit, Morris
Death; EP. 423
Tribute to. O. G. Villard; S. 473
- Hirohito, Emperor, receives R. W. Howard; EP. 3
- Hirschmann, I. A.
Musician and the depression; S. 565
- Hochscheid, A.
Calls Nation reactionary on Germany; C. 299; see also. 121
- Holberg, Ruth Langland
Sorcery; P. 514
- Hold your horses. J. W. Krutch; D. 419
- Hoiden, O. W.
Austria and National socialism; S. 14
- Holly, William H.; appointment as judge; EP. 663
- Holmes, Henry W.
Views on Jews and Nazis; C. 511; see also. 376
- Holmes, John Haynes
Critics, reading of; C. 625; see also. 536
- Home loan act; fraud? H. Goldey; with reply by W. F. Stevenson; S. 148; E. 173; see also C. 384
- Home-owners. See Mortgages
- Homestead, Pennsylvania. See Steel and iron
- Hook, Sidney
Marxism; letter in reply to L. Trotzky; C. 18
- Hoover, Glenn H.; radio address on Russia censored; C. 272
- Horton, Myles
Appeal for books for Highlander Folk School; C. 189
- Hotels; financial debacle. B. Lyons; S. 379
- Housing
"Slum clearance" or "housing." C. 730
Bauer; S. 730
Social problem. Z. Witkin; C. 132
See also Muscle shoals
- Howard, Roy W.
Received by emperor of Japan; EP. 3
Views on Japan and America; EP. 59
- Howard, Sidney. J. W. Krutch; S. 294
- Huff, Tess
Labor action school; opening; C. 737
- Humphrey, William Removal from office, attempted. P. Y. Anderson; S. 481
- ### I
- Ickes, Secretary Harold Loy
As public works administrator; EP. 58
Strength. P. Y. Anderson; S. 64
- Idealists to the front. O. G. Villard; S. 371
- Idleness. See Business depression; Unemployment
- Illinois, university of; finances. J. F. Wright; C. 382; see also 213 and C. 356
- Illness in unemployment. See Unemployment
- Health
- Ilsley, Mrs. Agnes Boeing. See Crawford, G.
- I'm no angel. W. Troy; MP. 547
- Immigration; Chinese and Japanese; change in Pacific coast sentiment; EP. 469
- Income tax
Advocated for government employees. A. H. Barnett; C. 243
Payment, beating. P. Y. Anderson; S. 64
- India
British greed in. A. S. Blackwell; C. 300
Civil disobedience campaign, Gandhi's; EP. 86
Gandhi released; EP. 255
Gandhi, return to prison; EP. 170
Problem; Dt. 271
Tired. S. K. Shah; C. 242
- Indians, American; land-allotment system, effort to abolish; EP. 665
- Industrial recovery act. See National industrial recovery act
- Industry; economic interdependence. M. Cammer; C. 383; see also. 21
- Inflation. See Currency
- Initials; Dt. 510; 652
- Initials, government by; Dt. 483
- Injustices, legal; E. 200; Ct. 203
- Insull, Samuel; extradition refused by Greece; EP. 553
- Insurance, life
Honest, Massachusetts plan. W. Grossman; S. 351
Safety discussed. J. P. Sullivan and D. D. Stansbury; S. 322; see also C. 512; C. 567
- International P. E. N. clubs and persecution of intellectuals by Nazis. K. Langer; S. 72
- Internationalism; doomed? E. 201
- Investments. See Stocks and bonds
- Invisible man, the. W. Troy; MP. 688
- Irish free state; fascist movement; EP. 339
- Iron and steel. See Steel and Iron
- Italy; fascist regulations for newspapers; EP. 720
- Ivy, James W.
Liberia, a negro's view; C. 653; see also 185
- ### J
- Japan
Political situation and foreign relations; EP. 579
Relations with United States; EP. 59
See also Chinese-Japanese relations
Japanese in United States. See Immigration Japanese-Chinese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
Japanese relations
Japanese-Russian relations
Chinese eastern railway, negotiations over; EP. 467
- Jennings, Leslie Nelson
Elegiac; P. 49
- Jews
Austria; Minister Earle warns country against anti-semitism; EP. 637
German:
American opposition to exclusion from Olympic sports; EP. 607
Defended by W. G. A. Ormsby-Gore; EP. 422
Persecution; EP. 59; C. 269
Suppressed advertisement of S. Untermyer in response to R. H. Macy and company's statement of attitude toward German goods. 478; see also C, with editorial comment. 511, 541
McKee, J. V., statement in 1915. P. 475
Blanshard; S. 106
Negation of origin. L. Lewisohn; C. 106
- Johnson, Arnold
Asks books for workers' school, Columbus, Ohio; C. 598
- Johnson, General Hugh S. See National industrial recovery act
- Johnson, Louis C.
Doctor and the depression; S. 622
- Jones, Jesse Holman; address to American bankers' association; EP. 310
- Jooss ballet. See Dancing
- Journalists. See Newspapers
- Joyce, James; Ulysses, sale held legal; E. 693
- Judges. See Contempt of court
- Juries and jurymen. See Negroes
- ### K
- K. F.
Roberta; D. 661
- Kahn, Otto Hermann; "Doctor." Massaguer; Ct. 35
Testimony on financial practices; E. 61
- Kaiser, Hillis
On Germany; C. 736
- Kaufman, George S.; satire, random. J. W. Krutch; S. 156
- Kelly, George. J. W. Krutch; S. 240
- Kendrick, Alexander
End of Boss Vare; S. 621
- Khaki shirts of America. See Terzani, A.
- Kidnapping
Death penalty; E. 172
O'Connell case; EP. 87
Urschel case and federal action; EP. 469
- Kiep, Consul General Otto C.; removal by Hitler government; EP. 310
- King, Judson
Light bills, reduction; S. 97
Public ownership in Ontario; S. 532
- King, Murray E.
Utah, liberalism in; S. 408
- Kipling, Rudyard; views on writers; EP. 87
- Kirkpatrick, C. W.
Agrees with The Nation; C. 243
- Kisch, Egon Erwin
Czecho-slovakia's Nazi neighbors; S. 99
- Kothe, Herman W.
On Germany; C. 737
- Kramer, Lucy
Volunteer research; C. 48
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
Ah, wilderness! D. 458
All good Americans; D. 744
As thousands cheer; D. 459
Behrman, S. N.; S. 74
Champagne, sec; D. 521
"Communist manifesto"; S. 49
Criticism, literary; S. 711
Dark tower, the; D. 688
Doctor Monica; D. 606
Double door; D. 419
Eight bells; D. 576
Green bay tree, the; D. 548
Heat lightning; D. 390
Her man of wax; D. 493
Her master's voice; D. 548
Hold your horses; D. 419
Howard, Sidney; S. 294
Kaufman, George S.; S. 156
Kelly, George; S. 240
Let 'em eat cake; D. 548
Literature and utopia; S. 441
Mary of Scotland; D. 688
- Men in white; D. 419; 548
- Murder in the vanities; D. 362
- Party, the; D. 336
- Peace on earth; D. 718
- Plays, current; D. 745
- Pursuit of happiness, the; D. 493
- School for husbands, the; D. 521
- Sellout, the; D. 336
- She loves me not; D. 661
- Thunder on the left; D. 576
- Tobacco road; D. 718
- Kuhn, Loeb and company
Deals, recent; EP. 30
- ### L
- Labor
Child. See Child labor
Eating without working. S. Chase; S. 93
Employment, rise in; EP. 226
Middle-aged persons over forty barred from examinations by United States civil service commission; EP. 552; EP. 580
Under national industrial recovery act; E. 144; EP. 169; E. 553
See also National industrial recovery act; Labor unions; Strikes
- Labor action school; opening. T. Huff; C. 737
- Labor, child. See Child labor
- Labor party, British; peace, stand for; EP. 422
- Labor unions
Automobile workers organized; EP. 552
In the codes; EP. 225
Journalists; E. 370
Leaders, new, needed. H. Seidman; S. 431
Picketing, decision against; EP. 282
Racketeering in. H. Seidman; S. 177; see also EP. 170; C. 411
Under national industrial recovery act; E. 144; EP. 169; E. 553
See also American federation of labor
- La Follette, Suzanne
Artist and the depression; S. 264
- LaGuardia, Fiorello H. P. Y. Anderson; S. 503
For mayor of New York. A. G. Hays; S. 71; see also C. 132 Nomination. O. G. Villard; S. 231; see also. 343
See also New York city
- Land. See Taxation
- Landis, James M.; appointment to federal trade commission; EP. 422
- Langdon, Eunice
Teacher and the depression; S. 182; see also E. 173
- Langer, Karl
Intellectuals and Hitler; S. 72
- Lardner, Ring; death; E. 398
- Laski, Harold J.
Conference, international, failure; S. 65
- Latin America
United States loosening hold; EP. 170
United States policy; EP. 394
- Lawrence, Thomas
Help for gas companies; S. 563
- Lawyers
And the depression. J. P. Gifford; S. 236
First and second rate. T. R. Lynch; C. 383; see also E. 4
- Lazar, David
New York city election figures; C. 132; see also. 71
- League, T. J.
Japan, purpose of, in Manchukuo; C. 382
- League of nations
German withdrawal; EP. 467; E. 499
Reform; EP. 692
See also Armament limitation and disarmament
- Legal injustices; EP. 200; Ct. 203
- Legal profession. See Lawyers
- Lehman, Governor Herbert H.; New York city politics; open letter to the governor. O. G. Villard; S. 427
- Leisure, the new; E. 610
- Lenin to Roosevelt. L. Fischer; S. 698
- Let 'em eat cake. J. W. Krutch; D. 548
- Lever, E. J.
Cooperative distributors, incorporated; C. 438
- Levin, Ruben
Milwaukee stays socialist; S. 507; correction, C. 653
- Levine, Abraham
Wants Nation club in Hudson County; C. 243
- Lewis, Alfred Baker
Child labor, lessening without aiding children; C. 540; see also. 287
- Lewis, C. Day
Before the storm; P. 134
Ecstatic, the; P. 244
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
Jews, negation of origin; C. 106
- Liberals; fashion movement. O. G. Villard; S. 147
- Liberia; adviser to, appointment of; EP. 468
- Lieberknecht, Peter
Germany, intellectual, under Hitler; S. 534
- Lifar ballet. See Dancing
- Life insurance. See Insurance, life

- Lilly Turner. W. Troy; MP..... 55
Lippmann, Walter
I. As "great elucidator." A. Pinchot;
S..... 7
II. "The new Tammany." A. Pinchot;
S..... 36
III. Obfuscator de luxe. A. Pinchot;
S..... 189
IV. On democracy. A. Pinchot; S.... 126
Liquors, alcoholic. See Alcoholic liquors Literary criticism. See critics, Literary Literature
American virility and British decadence.
E. S. Bates; S..... 445
And utopia. J. W. Krutch; S..... 441
Litvinov, Maxim
At London conference; EP..... 59
Garb; EP..... 581
Telephone conversation with family; EP. 609
See also Russia
Little women. W. Troy; MP..... 630
Living, cost of. See Cost of living
Loans, direct to industry by government;
EP..... 288
Locke, David Ross. See Nasby, P. V.
Loeb, J.
Loan to China, C..... 105
Logue, W. H., junior
America, land of motion and emotion; C. 133
London conference. See World monetary and economic conference
Long, Senator Huey Pierce
Black eye incident; EP..... 283
Sympathy for; Dt..... 325
Lord, Chester S.; death; E..... 174
Lore, Ludwig
Nazi politics in America; S..615; see also.....526, 707, 708, 709
Low (cartoonist)
World monetary and economic conference; Ct..... 66
Lynch, Thomas R.
Lawyers, first and second rate; C..383;
see also E..... 4
Lynchings
California; lynchers praised by Governor Rolph; EP..... 635
California and Maryland; Governor Rolph condemned for praising mob; E..... 666
Cartoon. W. Steig..... 667
Defense by W. Pegler in Scripps-Howard newspapers; E..... 723
Maryland; Armwood case; EP...497;
EP..... 635
Maryland; Armwood case. R. Bradley;
S..... 672
Missouri; L. Warner; EP..... 721
Roosevelt condemnation. O. G. Villard;
S..... 697
Lyon, Elmer Kelley
Ecuador, adventures in; C..... 105
Lyons, Barrow
Hotel debacle; S..... 379
- M
- M., M.
Three and one; D..... 548
Maas, Willard
Moonlight over juniper; P..... 562
Machado y Morales, Gerardo. See Cuba
Macon, airship. See Aeronautics
Macy, R. H., and company; suppressed advertisement of S. Untermeyer in response to store's statement of attitude toward German goods...478; see also
C (with editorial comment).....511; 541
Mahler, Herbert
Funds for A. Terzani; C..... 625
Mail, ocean. See Shipping
Malloy, Pat; appointment; E..4; see also C.. 383
Mama loves papa. W. Troy; MP..... 196
Manchukuo. See Chinese-Japanese relations
Manhattan. See New York city
Mann, Thomas, on Nazi psychology; E..... 426
Mann, Tom
Exclusion from United States; EP..... 197
Permitted to enter United States, EP.. 365
Marine, merchant. See Shipping
Marshall, Margaret
Afternoon at Hyde Park; S..... 270
Marshall, R. reforestation plan; E..... 696
"Martin, a."
Word from; C.....625; see also..... 502
Martin, James R.
"Buy now"—on $30 a week; S..502; see also E.....500; see also C..... 625
Martin, L.
Nazi propaganda; C..707; see also..526; 615
Marxism. See Socialism
Mary of Scotland. J. W. Krutch; D..... 688
Maryland. See Lynchings.
Massager
Cuba; cartoons.....232; 315
"Doctor" Kahn; Ct..... 35
Maternity. See Childbirth
Mathematics, God and; E..... 342
McGoldrick, Joseph D.
New York city election; S..... 591
McIntosh, W. C.
Akron vote for public ownership; C..653;
see also EP..... 551
McKee, Joseph Vincent. See New York city
McNitt, V. V.
Moley, R., at London; C..189; see also
EP..... 85
Medical profession and the depression. L. C.
Johnson; S..... 622
Medical science; accidental discoveries; E... 117 Medicine; German, Nazi blows at; EP..226;
see also C..... 383
Men in white. J. W. Krutch; D.....419; 548
Mencken, H. L.
Books I have never read; S..536; see
also C..... 625
Merchant marine. See Shipping
Middle-aged labor. See Labor
Middle class. See United States
Middlemass, Robert
Actor and the depression; S..... 349
Midnight club. W. Troy; MP..... 196
Militarism
At Washington; EP..... 30
Blow to, seen in British by-election; EP. 524 Drifting into militarism. M. A. Hall-gren; S..... 372
Military training
Bill vetoed by Governor Schmedeman;
EP..... 171
Still prescribed at Cornell and Wisconsin universities; EP..... 142
Milk
Conferences; EP..... 283
Strike; New York state. R. Whitcomb;
S..... 267
Trust; investigation; EP..... 469
See also Dairy business
Millard, Alice K.
Vivisection, against; C....383; see also
EP..... 226
Milwaukee stays socialist. R. Levin; S..507; correction..... 653
Miners, coal. See Coal miners, American Ministers; Dt..... 539
Minneapolis, Minnesota; twin city liberals, call to. L. Ostrin; C..... 485
Mitchell, Charles E.; acquittal; EP..... 2
"Mob" and "best people," G. A. Baldwin;
C.....439; see also C..... 48
Moley, Raymond
Resignation; EP..... 253
Resignation. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 290 Return from London; EP..85; see also
C..... 189
Monetary conference. See World monetary and economic conference
Money. See Currency
Moore, Mayor J. Hampton; objects to nud-ism; EP..... 283
Morgan, Thomas Hunt; wins Nobel prize for medicine; EP..... 497 Morgenthau, Henry, junior. See Treasury department
Morris, Samuel
Utility profits in New Jersey; S..... 292 Mortgages
Cleveland home-owners in revolt. J.
Steele; S..... 266
Home loan act; fraud? H. Goldey, with reply by W. F. Stevenson; S..148;
E.....173; see also C..... 384
Relief; New York measures; S..... 173
Morton, David
Before the summer goes; P..... 274
Motion pictures. See Moving pictures
Motor trucks. See Roads
Moving pictures (For reviews of pictures, see names of pictures; also Troy, W.)
Bogy of Hollywood, the. W. Troy; S.. 26
"Educational"; E..... 145
Hays, Will H., czar; E..... 62
Summer solstice. W. Troy; S..... 55
Technicians' strike. Sympathizer; C.... 325
West, Mae, popularity; EP..... 497
See also Censorship, moving pictures
Murals, Orozco, at Dartmouth. E. M. Benson; A..... 546
Murder in the vanities. J. W. Krutch; D.. 362
Muscle shoals
Housing built by Tennessee valley authority. K. H. Amend; S..... 644 Rates announced by Tennessee Valley authority; EP..... 338
Whooping up. S. Clark; S..... 124
Music
American; review of book, American composers on American music, by H.
Cowell; review by A. Mendel; S.... 389
New school for social research, concerts at. K. Burke; M..... 633
Schönberg, sic. K. Burke; M..... 633 Musician and the depression. I. A. Hirsch-mann; S..... 565
Mussey, J. B.
Explains padding of books; C..299; see also C..... 133
Mydans, Carl M.
Ford strike; S..... 482
- Myers, James
Misery in coal fields; C..... 106
- N
- Nadejeda, Lydia
Schreiber, Georges; A..... 743
Nasby, Petroleum Vesuvius (David Ross
Locke), biographical material sought.
C. Clemens; C..... 47
Nathan, George Jean
Books I have never read; S..536; see also C..... 625
Nation, The
Editorial on class justice condemned. S.
S. Sampson; C..... 77
Germany, views cost Nation a subscriber.
C. J. Grimm; C..... 243
Hazlitt, H., leaves staff; J. W. Krutch to be literary editor; EP..... 423
Hudson county, New Jersey, readers, call to. A. Levine; C..... 243
Lincoln, Nebraska, club suggested. W.
E. Sanford; C..... 48 Reader in thorough agreement with views. C. W. Kirkpatrick; C..... 243 National board of arbitration. See National industrial recovery act
National emergency council, setting up; EP. 691
National farmers' holiday association. See Agriculture
National industrial recovery act Administration; activity. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 120
Administration; at work. P. Y. Anderson; S..181; S..402; see also EP.... 309 Administration; chaos in. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 11
American federation of labor and the act; EP..... 421
Arbitration, national board of; EP..... 169
Authority, abuse of; EP..... 523
Automobile manufacturers, code for;
EP.....309; see also..... 402
Beck attack ridiculed. P. Y. Anderson;
S..... 649
Blue eagle, two wings; I. The wing upon the left. J. Strachey; S..... 726
Boycott for "slackers"; EP..... 198 Cates, D. C., resignation as industrial adviser. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 348
Class struggle, underlying; EP..... 1
Coal code; E.....313; EP..... 337
Coal code, fight over. P. Y. Anderson;
S..... 234
Code, "blanket"; Roosevelt radio speech;
EP..... 113
Codes, consumers and. J. P. Warbasse;
S..... 374
Constitutionality. M. Finkelstein; S.... 428
Consumer and the NRA. W. F. Og-burn; S..... 318
Consumers' advisory board, criticism of.
P. Y. Anderson; S..290; see also C.. 438
Consumers, protection for; EP..... 226
Cooperation lagging; EP..... 57
Cooperatives and NRA. J. P. Warbasse; S..... 561
Criticism. P. Y. Anderson; S..290;
see also C..... 438
Dissatisfaction with working; EP..... 337
Drugstores, code for; EP..... 525
Effect in all directions; EP..... 311
Ford, Henry, campaign against; EP.... 523
Ford, Henry, opposition; EP..309; see also..... 402
Future of NRA; E..... 498
Helping the government; E..... 228
"Interference, disorderly," a new crime;
EP..... 253
Johnson, Hugh S., and freedom of the press. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 234
Labor, decision on. P. Y. Anderson; S.. 348
Labor, effect on; E..144; EP.....553; 732
Labor unions; in the codes; EP..... 225
Labor unions; statement for open shop;
EP..... 253
Labor unions; under act; EP..... 169 Newspaper code, and "freedom of the press." P. Y. Anderson; S..... 234 Newspapers; publishers and the national industrial recovery act. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 181
Parade, New York city; EP..... 340
Price movement and recovery program;
E..... 340
Prospects disquieting. P. Y. Anderson;
S..... 348
Restaurant chain announces compliance;
EP..... 553
Retail code; E..... 527
Sailors, code for. H. Garlick; C..... 299
Section 7-a, on labor rights; call for repeal. H. Rabinowitz; S..... 732
Start of operations. M. A. Hallgren;
S..... 38
Steel code; E..... 89
Success, chances for. A. Evans; S.... 345
Temporary or permanent? EP..... 393

- Theater code and ticket speculation. J. W. Krutch; D. 336
 Trouble for NRA. P. Y. Anderson; S. 595
 Unemployment and strikes under; EP. 337
 National recovery administration. See National industrial recovery act National socialism. See Austria; Germany
 Natural gas companies. See Public utilities Naturalization; Shelley case; pacifism involved; EP. 86 Navies
 American and Japanese; EP. 59
 British and others; EP. 608
 Navy. United States; enlargement, move for; EP. 114
 Nazis. See Austria; Germans in United States; Germany Negroes
 Alabama. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
 Crawford case. See Crawford, G.
 Firemen, railroad I. De A. Reid; C. 273; see also 44
 Juries, grand, in Virginia to admit Negroes; EP. 311
 Murders of Negroes for jobs. H. Butler; S. 44; see also C. 273
 Scottsboro case;
 Law in Alabama. J. H. Hammond, junior; S. 701
 Patterson, Heyward; verdict set aside; EP. 1; conviction; EP. 664
 Résumé of case; E. 584
 Trial; EP. 635
 Southern view. J. G. Fletcher; C, with editorial comment. 734
 See also Lynchings
 Nelson, Roger B.
 Underground Germany; S. 647
 Neuberger, Richard
 New Germany, the; S. 376; see also C. 511
 Neumann, Henry
 On correct thinking; C. 439; see also 316
 New Jersey public utilities. See Public utilities
 New school for social research; concerts. K. Burke; M. 633
 Graduate faculty of political and social science; E. 398
 New York Election:
 Campaign; EP. 171
 Campaign, Roosevelt position; EP. 496
 Farley defeat. P. Y. Anderson; S. 595
 Fusion victory seen; EP. 525
 LaGuardia and the New Deal. M. K. Simkhovitch; C. 511
 LaGuardia city's only hope; EP. 423
 LaGuardia, F. H., for mayor. A. G. Hays; S. 71; see also C. 132
 LaGuardia nomination. O. G. Villard; S. 231; see also 343
 LaGuardia versus McKee. P. Blanshard; S. 474
 McKee, J. V., case of; E. 472
 McKee statement on Jews in 1915. P. Blanshard; S. 475
 Open letter to Governor Lehman. O. G. Villard; S. 427
 Primary, results; E. 367
 Results; EP. 551
 Results. J. D. McGoldrick; S. 591
 Silent vote; EP. 394
 Thomas, N., and the election. O. G. Villard; S. 343; see also 231
 Finances; discharge of city employees suggested; EP. 608
 LaGuardia appointees; EP. 721
 Manhattan moment. E. White; C. 47
 Relief that does not relieve. M. B. Scheler; S. 538
 New York Edison company; "election" among employees; EP. 637
 New York Evening Post, purchase; EP. 691
 New York university; pacifist meeting; news suppressed; EP. 665
 News, restriction on. See Treasury department Newsboys' strike, Pittsburgh; EP. 115
 Newspapers
 Code. See National industrial recovery act
 Country; Dt. 17
 Editors as teachers; E. 174
 Italian; fascist regulations; EP. 720
 Items; Dt. 242
 New York, refuse to publish Untermyer reply to Macy advertisement; EP. 423 Newspaper men and women, unions. H. H. Ryan; C. 327; E. 370
 Reading; Dt. 678
 Reporters revolt; E. 668
 Suppression of Barton case news by some New York newspapers; EP. 115
 Suppression of news of pacifist meeting, New York university; EP. 665 Night flight. W. Troy; MP. 492
 Nobel prize for medicine; awarded to T. H. Morgan; EP. 497
 Noise; EP. 553
 North German Lloyd steamship line; boycott of Germany, effect on line; EP. 142
 Noyes, Philip Helmoop
 Armour and company stock juggling; S. 300
 Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific railway bankruptcy; S. 160
 Railroad receiverships and reorganizations; S. 411
 Regulating Wall street; S. 709
 Securities act; S. 20; S. 485
 Stock exchange "reforms"; C. 217
 Wall street and gold policy; S. 653
 Wall street "big shots"; S. 512
 Nudism; Philadelphia mayor objects; EP. 283
- O
- O'Brien, John P., views on journalism and literature; E. 557
 Ocean mail. See Shipping
 O'Connell kidnapping; EP. 87
 Offices, drive for. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
 Ogburn, William F.
 Consumer and the NRA; S. 318
 Protection for consumer; EP. 226
 Ohio; unemployment relief; EP. 198
 Olympic games. See Jews—German
 Ontario; public ownership. J. King; S. 532
 Opera; successful, in New York hippodrome; E. 34
 Opéra de quat' sous, l'. W. Troy; MP. 717
 Ormsby-Gore, William G. A.
 Speech at Geneva on Jews; EP. 422
 Orozco murals at Dartmouth. E. M. Benson; A. 546
 Ostrin, Louis
 Call to twin city liberals; C. 485
 Ownership, government
 Losses in five cities, wins in one; EP. 551; correction; C. 653
 Ontario. J. King; S. 532
 Tax-free cities. G. W. Greene; C. 46; L. Bartlett; C. 132
- P
- P. E. N. clubs. See International P. E. N. clubs
 Pach, Walter
 Exhibitions, New York; A. 576
 Modern art in perspective; A. 249
 Pacifism
 Brevet, Madame, expelled from Switzerland; EP. 2
 Machenauer, E., and Princess Juliana zu Stolberg arrested in Germany; EP. 2
 New York university meeting; news suppressed by newspapers; EP. 665
 Shelley naturalization case; EP. 86
 United States congress against war, meeting; EP. 394
 Palestine; prosperity. S. Zukerman; C. 47
 Pan-American conference; EP. 552
 Failure; E. 723
 Gruening, Ernest, appointment as adviser; EP. 580
 Issues; E. 640
 Opening; EP. 663
 Parks, Edd Winfield
 Books, inflated; C. 133; see also C. 299
 Party, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 336
 Passion of Joan of Arc. W. Troy; MP. 363
 Patriots, the. W. Troy; MP. 419
 Patronage. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
 Patterson, Heywood. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
 Peace; Labor party, British, stand; EP. 422
 Peace on earth (play). J. W. Krutch; D. 718
 See also Theater union
 Nurses, trained, and the depression. C. C. Van Blarcom; S. 406
 Pegler, Westbrook; defense of lynching; E. 723
 Pennroad corporation; stock collapse; E. 61
 Pennsylvania
 Alcoholic liquors, regulation of sale; EP. 636
 Labor, exploitation of; EP. 115
 Sweatshop investigation; nothing done; EP. 255
 See also Coal miners, American
 Pennsylvania railroad; president, salary reduction to $60,000 a year; EP. 394
 Perez, Henry L.
 Insurance and banking; C. 512; see also 322
 Perkins, Secretary Frances
 Attacks steel code; EP. 141
 Rights denied in Homestead, Pennsylvania; EP. 169 Philadelphia
 Election campaign; EP. 496
 Vare, Boss, end of. A. Kendrick; S. 621
 Phillips, H., and S. Fitz-Randolph
 Airship, airing the; S. 480
 Physical director and the depression. K. Ferguson; S. 504
 Physicians. See Medical profession
 Picketing. See Labor unions
 Pilgrimage. W. Troy; MP. 138
- Pinchot, Amos
 Lippmann, W.; S. 7; 36; 67 (see also C. 189) 126
 Pittsburgh newsboys' strike; EP. 115
 "Plaguy," spelling; Dt. 271
 Planning, economic. See Economics
 Plays. See Theater, the; names of plays; Krutch, J. W.
 Poems
 Ask no return. H. Gregory. 599
 Before the storm. C. D. Lewis. 134
 Before the summer goes. D. Morton. 274
 Conclusion. L. Reis. 679
 Dialogue of self and soul, a. W. B. Yeats 487
 Earth draws inward. H. S. White. 706
 Ecstatic, the. C. D. Lewis. 244
 Elegiac. L. N. Jennings. 49
 First day of autumn. E. L. Walton. 413
 Flight of fish. K. Boyle. 190
 Flying foxes and others. K. Boyle. 444
 Horse of poetry, the. H. Gregory. 302
 Iberian coast. G. Dillon. 107
 Image of a friend. M. Zaturenska. 385
 Logic of the rose, the. L. Dent. 354
 Memory of music, the. I. Edman. 100
 Moonlight over juniper. W. Maas. 562
 Night by day. D. Durling. 542
 On such a day as this one. M. Van Doren 645
 Poem. L. Reis. 738
 Prelude. C. Aiken. 162; 446; 570
 Somewhat more slowly. M. Van Doren. 711
 Sonnet. M. Van Doren. 218; 270
 Sorcery. R. L. Holberg. 514
 Ways not winds' ways. R. Benedict. 655
 You eyes. M. Van Doren. 626
 Police Gazette, revived; Dt. 325
 Politics; crime, connection with; E. 229
 Porto Rico. See Puerto Rico
 Postal subsidies. See Shipping
 Potamkin, Harry Alan; death; EP. 171
 Potamkin, Harry Alan, film school. W. Troy; S. 605
 Power and power industry
 Electricity, distribution of. A. B. Walton; C. 355 Light bills, reduction. J. King; S. 97
 Propaganda, more; E. 229
 Public ownership, Ontario. J. King; S. 532
 Rate reduction, New York city, paltry; EP. 226
 St. Lawrence development, fight against; E. 722
 Power and the glory, the. W. Troy; MP. 308
 Pratt, Nathaniel M.
 Strong, Josiah, biographical material sought; C. 356
 Price, Davis Lukens
 On Germany; C. 736
 Prices
 Agricultural adjustment administration; on effect of processing tax; E. 340
 Fatter, and thinner dollars; E. 638
 Higher, inevitable, under recovery program; EP. 365
 Movement and national industry recovery program; E. 340 Rise; EP. 57
 Princetonian, A.
 College salary cuts and dismissals; C. 356; see also 213; C. 410
 Private life of Henry VIII. W. Troy; MP. 492
 Prizefighter and the lady, the. W. Troy; MP. 605 Processing taxes. See Agriculture; Prices
 Professional men and women, unemployment. See Unemployment Professors. See College instructors and professors Profits. See Economic conditions
 Progressives; conference, Chicago; EP. 310 Prohibition
 "End"; EP. 581
 Repeal; EP. 663
 Repeal in sight; EP. 114
 See also Alcoholic liquors
 Propaganda. See Public utilities
 Public men; rationalizations. O. G. Villard; S. 175 Public ownership. See Ownership, government
 Public utilities
 Crisis in New York. J. Count; S. 211; correction, C. 243
 Gas companies, help for. T. Lawrence; S. 563
 New Jersey, profits in. S. Morris; S. 292
 Propaganda in new form; EP. 580
 Salaries and rates; E. 31; EP. 59
 Sioux City, Iowa, fight for lower rates. O. S. Dean; S. 40
 See also Ownership, government
 Public works
 Appropriations; EP. 366
 Government program; EP. 58
 Program under fire; EP. 365
 Puerto Rico; rebellion in. H. Herring; S. 618
 Pure food and drug bill. See Food and drug bill Pursuit of happiness, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 493

Q

- Quatorze Juillet. W. Troy; MP..... 520
 Que viva Mexico. W. Troy; MP..... 83;
 see also C..... 410

R

- Rabinowitz, Herbert
 Section 7-a; S..... 732
 Racketeering, labor. H. Seidman; S..... 431
 Radio
 Censorship. See Censorship, radio
 Educational programs, difficulties; EP.. 339
 Railroads
 Federal aid for; EP..... 394
 Firemen, Negro; murder for jobs. H. Butler; S..... 44; see also C..... 273
 Receiverships and reorganizations. P. H. Noyes; S..... 411
 Speed, more; E..... 286
 Wage cut, attempt. P. Y. Anderson; S. 11
 Rand school of social science; appeal for. J. Dewey; C..... 47
 Rascoe, Burton
 Books I have never read; S. 536; see also C..... 625
 Reading; Dt..... 215
 See also Books
 Reconstruction finance corporation
 Loan to Russia. P. Y. Anderson; S. 64
 Loan to Russia, contemplated; EP..... 338
 See also Banks
 Reforestation plan of R. Marshall; E..... 696
 Reichstag building fire. See Germany Record, George L., death. O. G. Villard; S. 399
 Reid, Ira De A.
 Negro fireman; C..... 273; see also.... 44
 Reis, Lincoln
 Conclusion; P..... 679
 Poem; P..... 738
 Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment
 Reporters. See Newspapers
 Research volunteers needed. L. Kramer; C. 48
 Restaurants; cafeteria chain announces compliance with National industrial recovery act; EP..... 553
 Retail stores and trade; code; E..... 527
 Rex (steamship); record, speed; EP..... 227
 Rich, Jacob C.
 Bridgeport goes socialist; S..... 646
 Richter, Julius, views on Hitler; E..... 557
 Rivera, Diego; at work at New workers' school; E..... 257
 Roads; trucks, heavy, use of roads; EP... 580
 Roberta, F. K.; D..... 661
 Robinson, William J.
 Nazi propaganda; C. 707; see also. 526, 615
 War or peace? C..... 484; see also E. 368
 Rockefeller, John D., junior; report on alcoholic liquor by R. B. Fosdick and A. L. Scott; E. 583; comment by O. G. Villard; S..... 529
 Rockefeller center murals; Dt..... 381
 Rodriguez, Theodore
 California, agrarian revolt; C..... 272
 Rolph, Governor James. See Lynchings
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
 Address on regeneration of America, and lynching. O. G. Villard; S..... 697 Administration:
 Attack by Republican national committee. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 699
 Measures, constitutionality. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 64
 Not breaking up. P. Y. Anderson; S. 649
 Offices; drive for spoils. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 208
 Progressiveness. P. Y. Anderson; S. 120
 Publicity; EP..... 691
 Review; E..... 695
 Scandal threatened. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 699
 Six months. O. G. Villard; S..... 287
 Afternoon at Hyde Park. M. Marshall; S..... 270 Agricultural recovery program; EP..... 551
 Appointments; E..... 4
 Civil service program; E..... 88
 Financial policy:
 Criticism by Secretary Wallace; EP. 719
 Dollar devaluation needed now; EP. 29
 Gold policy; E..... 609
 Statement on; EP..... 495
 Lenin to Roosevelt. L. Fischer; S..... 698
 National industrial recovery act; blanket code, radio address for; EP..... 113
 Revolution, the. O. G. Villard; S..... 91
 Swing to right, according to Steel. F. H. Ramsay; C..... 540
 Telegram to, on coal miners. A. B. Wieck; C..... 540
 Veterans' compensation, Chicago address to American legion; EP..... 393
 World monetary and economic conference, killing by president; E..... 60
 Root, James
 Marxism in Detroit; C..... 653
 Root, John W.
 Chrysler building, Chicago; C..... 216

- Rorty, James
 Advertising and the depression; S..... 703
 Rothschild, John
 Travel; not staged for tourists; S..... 16
 Russell, Bertrand
 Questions quotation by Nation; C. 652; see also..... 342
 Russia
 Ambassador Bullitt presents credentials; EP..... 720
 Cotton-purchase loan from United States, and method of repayment; EP..... 30
 Foreign policy. F. Fischer; S..... 403
 Justice to; reprint of editorial of January 4, 1919..... 582
 Last hard year. L. Fischer; S..... 154
 Loan by Reconstruction finance corporation. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 64
 Loan, Reconstruction finance corporation, and recognition; EP..... 338
 Mental revolution. L. Fischer; S..... 288
 Ministers to, unaccredited; EP..... 310
 Only gainer at London conference; EP... 59
 Puritanism in. E. Winter; C. 104; see also C..... 299
 Radio speech of G. H. Hoover censored. G. H. Hoover; C..... 272 Recognition by United States:
 Cartoon. W. Steig..... 613
 Consequences; EP..... 607
 Dinner to Litvinov; EP..... 637
 Litvinov, M., and recognition. O. G. Villard; S..... 558
 Move for; EP..... 495
 Newspaper views of; EP..... 524
 Revolution goes on. L. Fischer; S. 592; correction, C..... 625
 United States and Soviet Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 559
 Russian-Japanese relations. See Japanese-Russian relations
 Ryan, Herbert H.
 Newspaper writers' chance; C..... 327
 Ryder, David Warren
 Money—servant or master? S..... 505

S

- Sacco-Vanzetti; six years after; E..... 200;
 Ct..... 203
 Sailors, code for. H. Garlick; C..... 299
 Saint Lawrence development project; fight against; E..... 722
 Saint Paul, Minnesota. See Minneapolis
 Salaries, big. O. G. Villard; S. 501; E. 527
 Salvation army Christmas slogan; EP..... 719
 Samarang. W. Troy; MP..... 111
 Sampson, Sam S.
 On Nation editorial on class justice; C. 77
 Sanford, Wilber E.
 Lincoln, Nebraska, Nation club suggested; C..... 48
 Sang d'un poète, le. W. Troy; MP..... 577
 Scheidemann, Philip; persecution of relatives by Nazis; EP..... 87
 Scheler, Michael B.
 Relief that does not relieve; S..... 538
 Schnebly, Ellsworth M.
 Teaching on promises; C..... 105
 Schönberg music. K. Burke; M..... 633
 School for husbands, the. J. D. Krutch; D. 521 Schools
 Assault on; E..... 173
 Closing and shortening of terms; EP.. 665
 See also Teachers
 Schreiber, Georges. L. Nadejena; A..... 743
 Schulz, Ernest
 Germany prepares for war; S..... 353
 Schwartz, Irving H.
 Nazi propaganda; C. 707; see also 526, 615
 Schwimmer, Rosika
 Refugees from oppression; S..... 158
 Science; retardation, need for; EP..... 311
 Scottshoro case. See Negroes
 Seamen. See Sailors
 Section 7-a. See National industrial recovery act Securities act. See Stocks and bonds
 Security affiliates. See Banks
 Seidman, Harold
 Labor leaders, new, needed; and racketeering; S..... 431
 Labor-union racketeering; S..... 177; see also EP..... 170; C..... 411
 Seldes, George
 Hero Balbo; S..... 131
 Sellout, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 336
 Shah, S. K.
 India, tired; C..... 242
 She loves me not. J. W. Krutch; D..... 661
 Shelley, Rebecca, naturalization case; EP... 86
 Shipping; postal subsidies; E..... 396
 Ships, passing of; Dt..... 131
 Shoudy, W. A.
 Engineer and the depression; S..... 296
 Sidewalk cafe, the; Dt..... 355
 Silver; price, artificial stimulation; E..... 117
 Silverberg, S.
 Nazi propaganda; C. 707; see also 526; 615

- Simkhovitch, Mary Kingsbury
 LaGuardia, F. H., and the New deal; C..... 511
 Sinclair, Upton
 And S. Eisenstein. W. Troy; MP.. 83; see also C..... 410
 World, mad; C..... 243
 Sioux City, Iowa; fight for lower utility rates. O. S. Dean; S..... 40
 "Slum clearance." See Housing
 "Social credit," Douglas program. D. W. Ryder; S..... 505 Social workers, pro and con. E. von Eltz, C. Fastov and J. Fisher; C..... 76
 Socialism
 Marxian socialism in France, beginnings of. S. Bernstein; C. 484; see also... 23
 Marxism in Detroit. J. Root; C..... 653
 Marxism; letters by L. Trotsky and S. Hook; C..... 18
 Soil erosion. See Erosion, soil
 Soldiers; common; material for history sought. W. Wilson; C..... 384 Song of songs. W. Troy; MP..... 250
 Soviet Russia. See Russia
 Spain
 Political troubles; EP..... 692
 Revolution. I. Revolt from the top. A. Brenner; S..... 435
 II. Fear of fascism. A. Brenner; S. 508
 Revolution, unfinished. P. Blanshard; S. 260
 Socialist party test; EP..... 339
 Speculation. See Stocks and bonds
 Speech, free. See Freedom of speech
 Spinach; Dt..... 188; 271
 Spoils of office. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
 Sprague, Oliver Mitchell Wentworth; resignation; EP.. 636; comment by O. G. Villard; S..... 642
 Squirrels, migration; E..... 724
 Stamp, Sir Josiah; address to British association for advancement of science on need for retardation of science; EP.. 311
 Stansbury, David D., and J. P. Sullivan
 Life insurance, safety discussed; S. 322; see also C..... 512; C..... 567
 Statistical board, central. See Central statistical board
 Steamboats, river; Dt..... 624
 Steamships; speed record, race for; EP.... 227
 Steel
 On Roosevelt swing to right. F. H. Ramsay; C..... 540
 Steel and iron
 Code; E..... 89
 Code attacked by Secretary Perkins; EP. 141
 Code, labor provisions; EP..... 225
 Homestead, Pennsylvania, action against Secretary Perkins; EP..... 169
 Steele, James
 Home-owners in revolt; S..... 266
 Steig, William
 Lynching; Ct..... 667
 Recognition of Russia; Ct..... 613
 Stenographers. See Labor, middle-aged Stevenson, William F.
 Home loan act, defense of; S..... 148; E..... 173; see also C..... 384
 Stewart, Maxwell S.
 Currency inflation, meaning of; S..... 670
 World monetary and economic conference, failure; S..... 42
 Stocks and bonds
 Manipulation; E..... 61
 Price break; EP..... 113
 "Reforms" in exchange practices. P. H. Noyes; C..... 217 Securities act; E..... 314; E..... 555
 Securities act; effect. P. H. Noyes; S. 20 Securities act, Wall street wails against. P. H. Noyes; S..... 485
 Senate investigation:
 Comment. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 649
 Dillon, Read and company; E..... 425
 Investment banking; EP..... 468
 Portrait of a banker; E..... 556
 Speculation, checks on; EP..... 171
 Wall street, regulating. P. H. Noyes; S..... 709
 Stokes, Rose Pastor; death; EP..... 3
 Stolberg, Benjamin
 S. Bernstein replies to his review of Bernstein book, Beginnings of Marxian socialism in France; C. 484; see also 23
 Strachey, John
 Two wings of the blue eagle. I. The wing upon the left; S..... 726
 Strange case of Tom Mooney, the. W. Troy; MP..... 138
 Stranger's return. W. Troy; MP..... 196 Strikes
 Coal. See Coal miners, American Moving picture technicians. See Moving pictures
 Newsboys. See Newsboys, Pittsburgh
 Right to strike, the. M. A. Hallgren; S..... 530

Under national industrial recovery act; EP 169

Strong, Josiah; biographical material sought. N. M. Pratt; C. 356

Strong, Justice Selah B., decision against picketing; EP. 282

Students, foreign, to be permitted to work; EP 58

Subscriber

On criticism of "Another language" by W. Troy; C. 326; see also 250

Subsidies, postal. See Shipping

Sugar

Stabilization agreement, scrapping of; EP 422

See also Cuba

Sullivan, James P., and D. D. Stansbury

Life insurance, safety discussed; S. 322; see also C. 512; C. 567

Summer theater. See Theater, the Supreme court, United States, and Roosevelt measures. P. Y. Anderson; S. 64

Sweatshops. See Pennsylvania

Switzerland; expels Madame Brevet; EP. 2

Swope, Gerard, plan for business dictatorship; E. 554

Swope, Herbert Bayard, busy day; EP. 637

Sympathizer

Motion picture strike; C. 325

T

Tammany hall; Dt. 76

Defense by W. Lippmann in 1927. A. Pinchot; S. 36

Tampa, Florida; rioters, alleged, released; EP. 142

Tariff

Truce, failure of; EP. 580

Wallace, Secretary, on need for lowering. O. G. Villard; S. 669

Tariff, United States

Reduction needed for restoration of markets; EP. 366

Tarzan the fearless. W. Troy; MP. 250

Tax, processing. See Prices

Taxation

Cities, tax-free. G. W. Greene; C. 46; see also C. 132

Land values. B. Hall; C. 272

Taylor, Henry L.

Macy advertisement, suppressed; C (with editorial comment) 511; see also 478

Teachers

And the depression. E. Langdon; S. 182; see also E. 173

Dismissal, New York city; EP. 31

Teaching on promises. E. M. Schnebly; C. 105

Tennessee Valley authority. See Muscle shoals

Terzani, Athos ?

Accquitted of murder charge by Khaki shirts of America; EP. 721

Funds for Terzani needed. H. Mahler; C. 625

Murder and the Khaki shirts; Terzani case. J. N. Beffel; S. 620

Résumé of case; E. 584

Theater, the

Code and ticket speculation. J. W. Krutch; D. 336

Improvement in business; E. 472

Plays, current. J. W. Krutch; D. 745

Summer theater; EP. 90

See also G., L. S., K., F.; Krutch, J. W.

Theater union; production of "Peace on earth"; EP. 721

This is America. W. Troy; MP. 138

Thomas, Norman, and New York election. O. G. Villard; S. 343; see also 231

Thomas, William Burl

College instructors and the depression; S. 213; see also C. 356; C. 382

Three and one. M. M.; D. 548

Three-cornered moon. W. Troy; MP. 250

Three thieves. W. Troy; MP. 577

Thunder on the left. J. W. Krutch; D. 576

Thunder over Mexico. W. Troy; MP. 391

Tobacco road. J. W. Krutch; D. 718

Tompkins, J. H.

On Straus-Untermeyer situation; C, with editorial comment. 541; see also 478, 511

Towley, Louis

Anderson, Paul Y.; "dysentery"; C. 47

Townsend, William Benjamin Franklin; death; Dt. 17

Trained nurses. See Nurses

Tramps, women; EP. 143

Travel; not staged for tourists. J. Rothschild; S. 16

Treasury, department of Control, struggle for; EP. 141

Restriction on news by Acting secretary Morgenthau; EP. 646

Trotzky, Leon

Marxism; letter in reply to S. Hook; C. 18

Troy, William

Advice to the lovelorn; MP. 744

Another language; MP. 250; see also C. 326

Berkeley square; MP. 363

Bitter sweet; MP. 308

Bogy of Hollywood, the; S. 26

Counsellor-at-law; MP. 744

Cradle song; MP. 630

Design for living; MP. 660

Dinner at eight; MP. 308

Duck soup; MP. 688

Eisenstein, S.; S. 83; see also C. 410

Emperor Jones, the; MP. 419

Eskimo; MP. 630

Gala premiere; Mickey mouse cartoon; MP. 111

Golden goal, the; MP. 55

Gow; MP. 717

I'm no angel; MP. 547

Invisible man, the; MP. 688

Lilly Turner; MP. 55

Little women; MP. 630

Mama loves papa; MP. 196

Midnight club; MP. 196

Night flight; MP. 492

Opéra de quat' sous, l'; MP. 717

Passion of Joan of Arc; MP. 363

Patriots, the; MP. 419

Pilgrimage; MP. 138

Potamkin, Harry Alan, film school; S. 605

Power and the glory, the; MP. 308

Private life of Henry VIII; MP. 492

Prizefighter and the lady, the; MP. 605

Quatorze juillet; MP. 520

Que viva Mexico; MP. 83; see also C. 410

Samarang; MP. 111

Sang d'un poète, le; MP. 577

Song of songs; MP. 250

Strange case of Tom Mooney, the; MP. 138

Stranger's return; MP. 196

Tarzan the fearless; MP. 250

This is America; MP. 138

Summer solstice of films; MP. 55

Three-cornered moon; MP. 250

Three thieves; MP. 577

Thunder over Mexico; MP. 391

Turn back the clock; MP. 308

Twenty-six commissars; MP. 111

Waltz time; MP. 458

Wandering Jew, the; MP. 547

When ladies meet; MP. 55

Wild boys of the road; MP. 419; 458

Tshekedi, chief. See Bechuanaland

Tugwell (Copeland) bill. See Food and drug bill

Turn back the clock. W. Troy; MP. 308

Twenty-six commissars. W. Troy; MP. 111

Twin cities. See Minneapolis

Typists. See Labor, middle-aged

U

U. S. S. R. See Russia

Ulysses. See Joyce, J.

Under glass. J. W. Krutch; D. 576

Unemployment

And illness; E. 471

Business improvement and unemployment; EP. 141

Civil works administration provision for work; E. 694

Decrease, and rise in cost of living; EP. 311

Genius for sale; E. 314

Farming and jobless. J. G. Weisman; C. 485

Hard winter ahead; E. 424

Health; illness in idleness; E. 471

New York city, relief halts. G. Zilzer; Ct. 63

1933 model. J. Hauss; C. 541

Ohio, relief; EP. 198

Professional men and women: signed articles, 152, 182, 213, 236, 264, 296, 349, 406, 504, 565, 622, 703; editorials, 143, 173, 264, 314; letters, 356, 382, 653

Relief, crisis in. E. Abbott; S. 400

Relief, federal and state; EP. 197

Relief, still needed by millions; E. 146

Relief that does not relieve. M. B. Scheler; S. 538

Unions, labor. See American federation of labor; Labor unions

United States

And the next war. O. G. Villard; S. 725

Economy program, government; EP. 29

Government without congress. P. Y. Anderson; S. 11

Land of motion and emotion. W. H. Logue, junior; C. 133

Middle class; income and expenditures. J. R. Martin; S. 502; see also E. 500; C. 625

See also Government employees

United States congress against war

Meeting; EP. 394

"University in exile." See Germany

Untermeyer, Samuel

Reply to Macy advertisement declined by New York newspapers; EP. 423

See also Jews—Germany

Urschel case. See Kidnapping

Utah, liberalism in. M. E. King; S. 408

Utilities, public. See Ownership, government; Public utilities

V

Vaerting, Mathilde; dismissal by Nazis; EP. 170

Van Doren, Carl

Books I have never read; S. 536; see also C. 625

Caldwell, Erskine; S. 443

Van Doren, Mark

Education by books; S. 655

On such a day as this one; P. 645

Somewhat more slowly; P. 711

Sonnet; P. 218; 270

You eyes; P. 626

Van Kleeck, Mary; resignation from federal advisory board on labor; EP. 169

Vare, William S. See Philadelphia

Veterans; compensation, Roosevelt views; EP 393

Viereck, George Sylvester

Answers L. Lore on Nazi propaganda; C. 708; see also 526, 615

Villard, Oswald Garrison

Bankers and captains of industry and public questions; S. 259

Child labor, abolition, mentioned in article on Roosevelt administration; S. 287; see also C. 540

Farmers' strike; open letter to President Roosevelt; S. 585

Grey of Falloden, Viscount; S. 316; see also C. 439; C. 510

Hillquit and Adler; S. 473

Idealists to the front; S. 371

Inflation, effects of; S. 642

LaGuardia, Fiorello H.; S. 231; see also 343

Lehman, Governor, open letter to, on New York city politics; S. 427

Liberals; fusion movement; S. 147

Litvinov and recognition; S. 558

Nazi child-mind; S. 614

On making fun of Oswald G. Villard; S. 204

Rationalizations of public men; S. 175

Record, George L.; S. 399

Rockefeller, John D., junior, liquor report; S. 529

Roosevelt, F. D., six months of; S. 287; see also C. 540

Roosevelt address on regeneration of America, and lynching; S. 697

Roosevelt revolution, the; S. 91

Sprague, O. M. W., resignation; S. 642

Thomas, N., and New York election; S. 343; see also 231

United States and the next war; S. 725

Wallace, Secretary, on tariff; S. 669

Wiggin, Albert, case of; S. 501

World monetary and economic conference; S. 119

World monetary and economic conference, at work; S. 12

Vivisection; banned by Nazis; EP. 226; see also C. 383

Von Eltz, Eleonore

Social workers; C. 76

W

Wall street. See Currency; Stocks and bonds

Wall street "big shots." P. H. Noyes; S. 512

Wallace, Secretary Henry Agard

On tariff O. G. Villard; S. 669

Roosevelt currency policy, criticism; EP. 719

Walton, A. B.

Electricity, distribution of; C. 355

Walton, Eda Lou

First day of autumn; P. 413

Waltz time. W. Troy; MP. 458

Wandering Jew, the. W. Troy; MP. 547

War

German preparation for. E. Schulz; S. 353

German preparation for. W. J. Robinson; C. 484; see also E. 368

Outlook; E. 368; see also C. 484

Preparation for, active; EP. 524

United States and the next war. O. G. Villard; S. 725

See also Militarism; Military Training; Pacifism; Peace

War debts and reparations

British-American negotiations, failure; E. 611

Payments due December 15; EP. 719

Warbasse, James Peter

Cooperatives and National recovery administration; S. 561

Rumsey, Mrs. M. H., praise for; C. 438; see also 290

Warmke, Harry

Labor racketeering; C. 411; see also EP. 170, 177

Warner, Lloyd. See Lynchings—Missouri

Warren, George Frederick; "commodity" dollar; EP. 198

Wedekind, Arthur G.

On Germany; C. 737

- Weisman, Janet G.
Farming and jobless; C..... 485
- Weissman, Bernard
On Germany; C..... 737
- West, Mae; popularity; EP..... 497
- Whalen, Grover Aloysius; views on economic system; EP..... 226
- Wheat
Agreement, international; EP..254; EP. 282
Dumping by Agricultural adjustment administration; E..... 341
Price-fixing; EP..... 254
Surplus, problem of; EP..... 199
- Wheeler, R. S.
Nazi courts; S..... 45
- When ladies meet. W. Troy; MP..... 55
- Whitcomb, Robert
Milk farmers' strike; S..... 267
- White, Eliot
Manhattan moment; C..... 47
- White, Hal Saunders
Earth draws inward; P..... 706
- Wick, Agnes Burns
Coal miners, telegram to President Roosevelt; C..... 540
- Wiggin, Albert H.
Case of. O. G. Villard; S..... 501
Operations. P. H. Noyes; S..... 512
Portrait of a banker; E..... 556
- Wild boys of the road. W. Troy; MP..419; 458
- Wills; Dt..... 159
- Wilson, Walter
Asks material for history of common soldier; C..... 384
- Wine cups and drinking; Dt..... 706
- Winter, Ella
Puritanism in Russia; C.104; see also C. 299
- Wisconsin, university of
Bill for compulsory military training vetoed by Governor Schmedeman; EP.. 171
Military training made mandatory; EP. 142
- Witkin, Zara
Housing; C..... 132
- Women
Barring by Gridiron club; EP..... 693
Tramps; EP..... 143
- Woodin, William Hartman
Cartoon. E. Herrmann..... 639
Luncheon in New York; EP..... 609
Retirement, virtual; EP..... 141
- Woodward, Helen
Eisenstein and U. Sinclair; C..410; see also 83
- Workers, middle-aged. See Labor
- Works, public. See Public works
- World, mad. U. Sinclair; C..... 243
- World monetary and economic conference
American action, silly; EP..... 85
At work. O. G. Villard; S..... 85
Damage to America in London. O. G. Villard; S..... 119
Failure. H. J. Laski; S..... 65
Failure; if conference fails. M. S. Stewart; S..... 42
Failure; plan for saving; E..... 3
Killing by Roosevelt; E..... 60
Moley, R., return from London; EP..85; see also C..... 189
One view of conference. Low; Ct..... 66
Roosevelt declaration on dollar; EP.... 29
Russia only gainer; EP..... 59
- Wright, Joseph F.
Illinois university, finances; C..382; see also 213 and C..... 356
- Writers. See Authors
- Yeats, W. B.
Dialogue of self and soul, a; P..... 487
- Z
- Zaturenska, Marya
Image of a friend; P..... 385
- Zetkin, Clara; death; EP..... 3
- Zilzer, Gyula
Unemployment, New York city relief halts; Ct..... 63
- Zukerman, Samuel
Palestine's prosperity; C..... 47
- A
- Æ (G. W. Russell)
Avatars, the. A futurist fancy; AN... 519
- Abbot, Willis J.
Watching the world go by; AN..... 743
- Abelard, Peter. H. Waddell; B..628; correction of name of publisher..... 660
- Abercrombie, Lascelles
Poetry and its meaning; AN..... 743
- Academia. Cicero. Translated by H. Rackham; AN..... 138
- Ackerman, Phyllis
Tapestry the mirror of civilization; AN.. 248
- Adams, Grace; R..... 192
- Adams, James Truslow
March of democracy, the. Volume II; AN 224
After such pleasures. D. Parker; AN..... 715
- Agar, Herbert
People's choice, the; B..... 306
- Aldington, Richard
All men are enemies; B..... 134
- Alexander, grand duke of Russia
Always a grand duke; AN..... 168
- All men are brothers (Shui hu chuan). Translated by P. S. Buck; B..... 542
- All men are enemies. R. Aldington; B..... 134
- Allen, Hervey
Anthony Adverse; B..... 108
- Allport, Floyd Henry
Institutional behavior; B..... 572
- Along this way. J. W. Johnson; B..... 452
- Always a grand duke. Grand duke Alexander of Russia; AN..... 168
- America faces the next war. F. H. Simonds; article by O. G. Villard; S..... 725
- America through women's eyes. Edited by Mary R. Beard; B..... 331
- American composers on American music. H. Cowell. Review by A. Mendell; M.. 389
- American federation of labor, the. L. L. Lorwin; B..... 302
- American literature: An introduction. C. Van Doren; B..... 162
- Anatomy of criticism, the. H. Hazlitt; B.. 385
- Anderson, Maxwell; R..... 190
- André Spire and his poetry. S. Burnshaw; B..... 22
- Angell, Sir Norman
From chaos to control; B..... 278
- Anonymous
Gold falcon, the, or the haggard of love; AN 307
Mirrors of Wall street, the; B..... 276
- Anthology of Haiku ancient and modern. Translated and annotated by A. Miyamori; AN..... 54
- Anthony Adverse. H. Allen; B..... 108
- Appius and Virginia. G. E. Trevelyan; AN. 83
- Arches of the years, the. H. Sutherland; B..... 163
- Armstrong, Hamilton Fish
Hitler's reich; AN..... 248
- Art and artifice in Shakespeare. E. R. Stoll; B..... 414
- Arvin, Newton; R..... 50
- Asbury, Herbert
Barbary coast, the. An informal history of the San Francisco underworld; B.. 246
- Asch, Sholom
Three cities; II..... 450
- Austen, Jane
Volume the first; AN..... 334
- Authenticated contemporary portrait of Shakespeare, an. T. Kingman; AN..... 224
- Autobiography of a Liverpool Irish slummy, the. P. O'Mara; AN..... 247
- Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, the. G. Stein; B..... 274
- Avatars, the. A futurist fantasy. Æ. (G. W. Russell); AN..... 519
- Aveline, Claude
Madame Maillart; B..... 137
- Ayala, Ramón Pérez de
Tiger Juan; B..... 601
- B
- Ballads and sea songs of Newfoundland. Collected and edited by E. B. Greenleaf. Music recorded by G. Y. Mansfield and the author; AN..... 280
- Ballads of square-toed Americans. R. P. T. Coffin; AN..... 630
- Barbary coast, the. An informal history of the San Francisco underworld. H. Asbury; B..... 246
- Bare hands and stone walls. C. E. Russell; B..... 713
- Bartlett, Louis; R..... 246
- Bates, H. E.
Black boxer, the; B..... 329
- Bauer, Catherine; R..489...see also C.... 653
- Beals, Carleton
Crime of Cuba, the; B..... 275
- Beaver, kings, and cabins. C. L. Skinner; AN 418
- Bechterev, Vladimir M.
General principles of human reflexology; B..... 192
- Beckerath, Herbert von
Modern industrial organization: An economic interpretation. R. Newcomb and F. Krebs, translators; AN..... 492
- Beer, Thomas
Mrs. Egg and other barbarians; AN.. 247
- Beethoven. A. P. Jones; AN..... 279
- Beginning the twentieth century. J. W. Swain; B..... 137
- Beginnings of Marxian socialism in France, the. S. Bernstein; B..23; see also C.....327; C..... 484
- Benedict, Ruth; R..... 194
- Benét, William Rose
Fifty poets: An American auto-anthology; AN 167
- Bennett, Arnold
Journal of, 1921-1928, the; B..... 24
- Benson, E. F.
King Edward VII; B..... 359
- Benson, E. M.; R..... 24
- Benson, Stella
Pull devil, pull baker; B..... 136
- Bent, Silas; R..... 305
- Bentley, Phyllis
Carr; AN..... 223
- Beres, David; R..... 194, 387
- Bernstein, Samuel
Beginnings of Marxian socialism in France; B..23; see also C..327; C.. 484
- Best British short stories, 1933, the. Edited by E. J. O'Brien; B..... 657
- Best short stories, the. Edited by E. J. O'Brien; B..... 110
- Beswick, Eardley
Original design; AN..... 280
- Bibliography of the works of Robinson Jeffers; AN..... 307
- Birrell, Francis
Gladstone; AN..... 307
- Black boxer, the. H. E. Bates; B..... 329
- Blessington, Lady, biography. M. Sadleir; B. 656
- Bloody traffic, the. A. F. Brockway; AN.. 457
- Blossoming antlers. W. Welles; AN..... 492
- Boar and shibboleth, the, with other poems. E. Doro; B..... 739
- Bonfire. D. Canfield; AN..... 455
- Book of Talbot, the. V. Clifton; B..... 360
- Borsodi, Ralph
Flight from the city; R..... 489
- Boyd, Ernest; R..... 52, 137, 221
- Boyle, Kay
Gentlemen, I address you privately; AN. 630
- Bradford, Gamaliel, journal of. Edited by Van W. Brooks; B..... 358
- Bragg, Sir William
Universe of light, the; B..... 219
- Brameld, Theodore B.
Philosophic approach to communism, a; B. 712
- Brittain, Vera
Testament of youth; B..... 454
- Broadcast minds. R. Knox; B..... 51
- Brockway, A. Fenner
Bloody traffic, the; AN..... 457
- Brody, Alter; R.....111, 219, 328, 572, 740
- Brody, Catherine
Cash item; B..... 546
- Brogan, D. W.
Government of the people: A study in the American political system; B..... 487
- Broken arrow. R. Gessner; B..... 518
- Bromfield, Louis
Farm, the; B..... 277
- Brontës, the. I. C. Willis; AN..... 280
- Brown, E. T.
This Russian business; B..... 245
- Brown book of the Hitler terror, the; B.... 603
- Brownell, Gertrude Hall
William Cray Brownell. An anthology of his writings, together with biographical notes and impressions of the later years; AN..... 659
- Browning, Robert
Letters; B..... 50
- Brunngraber, Rudolph
Karl and the twentieth century; B..... 626
- Buck, Pearl S., translator
All men are brothers (Shui hu chuan); B..... 542
First wife, the, and other stories; B.... 79
- Bunzel, Bessie, and L. I. Dublin
To be or not to be: A study of suicide; AN 278
- Burnham, James; R..... 712
- Burnshaw, Stanley
André Spire and his poetry; B..... 22
- Business is business. B. D. Nicholson; AN. 248
- Business under the recovery act. L. Valenstein and E. B. Weiss; B..... 416
- C
- Caldwell, Erskine
God's little acre; B..... 443
- Caldwell, Erskine; R..... 277
- Calendar of saints for unbelievers, a. G. Westcott; B..... 80
- Calverton, V. F.; R..... 136
- Cambridge history of American literature, the. Edited by W. P. Trent, J. Erskine, S. P. Sherman, and C. Van Doren; B.. 680
- Cambridge history of the British empire, the. Volume VII: Part I: Australia. Part II. New Zealand; B..... 193
- Canfield, Dorothy
Bonfire; AN..... 455
- BOOK REVIEWS
- Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:
B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer
- A
- Æ (G. W. Russell)
Avatars, the. A futurist fancy; AN... 519
- Abbot, Willis J.
Watching the world go by; AN..... 743
- Abelard, Peter. H. Waddell; B..628; correction of name of publisher..... 660

- Carr, Edward Hallett
Romantic exiles, the; B..... 164
Carr, P. Bentley; AN..... 223
Case of N. P. Vitvitsky et al. Charged with wrecking activities at power stations in the soviet union; B..... 220
Cash item. C. Brody; B..... 546
Cecil, Algernon
Metternich: A study of his period and personality; B..... 53
Century of progress, a. Edited by C. A.
Beard; B..... 136
Chamberlain, Joseph, biography. Volume Two:
1885-1895. J. L. Garvin; B..... 163
Chamberlin, William Henry; R..... 245
Ch'ao-ting Chi; R..... 518
Chapman, Charles Edward
Colonial Hispanic America; AN..... 456
Characteristics of French art. R. Fry; B..... 24
Characters and commentaries. L. Strachey;
B..... 686
Charles II. J. Hayward; AN..... 279
Chase, Stuart
Promise of power, the; B..489; see also
C..... 653
Chevalier, Haakon M.; R.....81, 137
Chief Standing Bear
Land of the spotted eagle; B..... 50
Children's books. H. Colby; S..... 572
Children's books, list. S. L. Goldsmith; S..... 573
China's foreign relations, 1917-1931. R. T.
Pollard; AN..... 660
Chinese destinies: Sketches of present day
China. A. Smedley; B..... 518
Christian renaissance, the. With interpretations of Dante, Shakespeare, and Goethe, and a note on T. S. Eliot. G.
W. Knight; B..... 80
Churchill, Winston
Marlborough: His life and times. Volume
I, 1650-1688. Volume II, 1688-1702;
B..... 738
Cicero
Academia. Translated by H. Rackham;
AN..... 138
De natura deorum. Translated by H.
Rackham; AN..... 138
Clifton, Talbot, biography; B..... 360
Clifton, Violet
Book of Talbot, the; B..... 360
Cocteau, Jean
Orphée. C. Wildman, translator; B.... 244
Codman, Florence; R.....303, 601, 626
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Ballads of square-toed Americans; AN.. 630
Cohen, Albert
Solal. W. Benson, translator; B..... 332
Cohen-Portheim, Paul
Spirit of France, the. A. Harris, translator; B..... 658
Colby, Harriet
Children's books, article on; S..... 572
Colby, Merle
New road; AN..... 83
Cole, G. D. H. and Margaret Intelligent man's review of Europe today, the; B..... 514
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor
Unpublished letters. Edited by E. L.
Griggs; B..... 738
Colette
Pure and impure; B..... 222
Collected poems. W. B. Yeats; B..... 684
Collected verse of Robert Hillyer; AN..... 715 Colonial Hispanic America. C. E. Chapman; AN..... 456
Communist manifesto, the. K. Marx; review by J. W. Krutch; S..... 49
Congo solo, misadventures two degrees north.
E. Hahn; B..... 277
Conroy, Jack
Disinherited, the; B..... 714
Cooke, Morris Llewellyn; R..... 742
Corey, Lewis; R..... 304
Cowell, Henry
American composers on American music; review by A. Mendel; M..... 389
Craig, A. R.
When Adam wept; AN..... 195
Creative America: An anthology. Chosen and edited by L. Lewisohn; B..... 628
Crime of Cuba, the. C. Beals; B..... 275
Croce, Benedetto
History of Europe in the nineteenth century. H. Furst, translator; B..... 600
Cry havoc! Beverley Nichols; B..... 388
Cunliffe, John W.
English literature in the twentieth century; AN..... 389
- D
Daingerfield, Foxhall
Mrs. Haney; AN..... 743
Dangerous thoughts about the orient. F. R.
Eldridge; B..... 715
Dark hazard. W. R. Burnett; AN..... 389
Dark moon of March. E. Gowen; B..... 546
Darwin, Bernard
Dickens; AN..... 457
David, Wilfrid
Monsoon; AN..... 195
Dean, Vera Micheles; R..... 220 Death of a world, the. Volume IV of The soul enchanted. R. Rolland, Translated lated by A. de Alberti; B..... 516
Debts and production. B. Jones; B..... 218
Delicate fire, the. N. Mitchison; AN..... 418
Dell, Floyd
Homecoming; AN..... 659
Democracy, debts, and disarmament. W.
Newbold; AN..... 456
De natura deorum. Cicero. Translated by
H. Rackham; AN..... 138
Dennen, Leon; R.....387, 656 741
Dennett, Tyler
John Hay: From poetry to politics; B.. 545
Dennis, Lawrence; R..... 278
Description of Greece. Volume III. Paus-anias. Translated by W. H. S. Jones;
AN..... 138
De Valera. D. Gwynn; B..... 78
Diamant, Gertrude; R.....546, 741
Dickens, B. Darwin; AN..... 457
Dickman, R. E., and O. J. R. Howarth
Making of geography, the; AN..... 457
Dictionary of American biography. Volumes
IX and X; AN..... 335
Discovering poetry. E. Drew; AN..... 743
Disinherited, the. J. Conroy; B..... 714
Dobrée, Bonamy
John Wesley; AN..... 307
Doro, Edward
Boar and shibboleth, the, with other poems; B..... 739
Douglas, Paul H.; R..... 51, 416
Down and out in Paris and London. G.
Orwell; AN..... 279
Drew, Elizabeth
Discovering poetry; AN..... 743
Drinkwater, John
Shakespeare; AN..... 248
Dublin, Louis I., and B. Bunzell
To be or not to be: A study of suicide;
AN..... 278
Dunlap, Knight
Habits: Their making and unmaking; B.. 192
Durant, Will
Tragedy of Russia, the; B..... 245
- E
Eakins, Thomas, biography. L. Goodrich;
AN..... 195
Economic cycles and crises. W. C. Schluter;
B..... 329
Edman, Irwin; R.....135, 385
Edward VII, two biographies; B..... 359
Edward VII. H. E. Wortham; B..... 359
Edwardian era, the. A. Maurois; B..... 626
Ehrmann, Herbert B.
Untried case, the: The Sacco-Vanzetti case and the Morelli gang; B..... 305
Einstein, Albert
On the method of theoretical physics;
E.....342; see also C..... 652
Einstein, Albert, and S. Freud
International series of open letters, an.
Why war?; AN..... 55
Eldridge, F. R.
Dangerous thoughts about the orient; B.. 715
Eliot, T. S.
Use of poetry, the; S..... 679
Energies of men, the. W. McDougall; B.. 192 England, their England. A. G. Macdonnell;
B..... 386
English eccentrics, the. E. Sitwell; AN.... 742
English literature in the twentieth century.
J. W. Cunliffe; AN..... 389
Epstein, Abraham
Insecurity: A challenge to America; B.. 51
European nations in the West Indies, 1493-1688, the. The pioneer histories. A.
P. Newton; AN..... 419
Evans, Margiad
Wooden doctor, the; B..... 219
- F
Fadiman, Clifton; R..... 449
Fall list
Far eastern front. E. Snow; B..... 629
Farm, the. L. Bromfield; B..... 277
Farrell, James T.; R..... 714
Fay, Sidney B.; R.....658, 683
Fels, Samuel S.
This changing world; B..... 741
Fergusson, Harvey
Rio Grande; B..... 190
Fierro, Antonio de
Journey of the flame, the. Englished by
W. de Steiguer; B..... 542
Fifty poets: An American auto-antology.
W. R. Benét; AN..... 167
Fineman, Irving
Hear, ye sons; B..... 359
First to go back. I. Skariatina; B..... 518
First wife, the, and other stories. P. S.
Buck; B..... 79
First world war, the: A photographic history.
Edited by L. Stallings; B..... 162
Fisher, A. E.
Requiem; B..... 546
Flight from the city. R. Borsodi; R..... 489
Flores, Angel; R..... 329
Flush. A. biography. V. Woolf; B..... 450 Forced labor in the United States. W. Wilson; B..... 165
Ford, Adelbert
Story of scientific psychology, the; B... 192
Ford, Ford Madox
It was the nightingale; B..... 544
Rash act, the; AN..... 138
Foreign investments in China. C. F. Remer;
AN..... 82
Form in modern poetry. H. Read; B..... 333
Forman, Henry James
Our movie-made children; review by W.
Troy; S..... 26
Fosdick, Raymond B., and A. L. Scott
Toward liquor control; E..... 583
Fracchia, Umberto
Robino and other stories. Sir S. H.
Scott, translator; B..... 329
Fraenkel, Osmond K.; R..... 361
Framework of an ordered society, the. Sir
A. Salter; B..... 78
Fresco painting, G. Hale; AN..... 716
Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's city. A. Mac-Leish; AN..... 168
Freud, Sigmund, and A. Einstein
International series of open letters, an.
Why war?; AN..... 55
From an Ozark holler. V. Randolph; B.... 546
From chaos to control. Sir N. Angell; B.... 278
Fry, Roger Characteristics of French Art; B..... 24
- G
Galsworthy, John
One more river; B..... 601
Galt, William
Phyloanalysis; AN..... 83
Gannett, Lewis S.; R..... 715
Garvin, J. L.
Life of Joseph Chamberlain, the. Volume
Two: 1885-1895; B..... 163
Geiger, George R.
Philosophy of Henry George, the; B.... 166
General principles of human reflexology. V.
M. Bechterev; B..... 192
Gentlemen, I address you privately. K.
Boyle; AN..... 630
Geography of Strabo, the. Volume VIII.
Translated by H. L. Jones; AN..... 138
German Jew, the: His share in modern culture. A. Myerson and I. Goldberg;
AN..... 195
Germany enters the third reich. C. B.
Hoover; B..... 357
Gessner, Robert
Broken arrow; B..... 518
Giacomo Puccini: The man—his life—his work. R. Specht. Translated by C. A.
Phillips; AN..... 456
Gibbon. G. M. Young; AN..... 54
Gipsy wagon. S. Kaye-Smith; B..... 601
Give your heart to the hawks, and other poems. R. Jeffers; B..... 712
Gladstone. F. Birrell; AN..... 307 Gloomy egoist, the: Moods and themes of melancholy from Gray to Keats; AN.. 25
God's little acre. E. Caldwell; B..... 443
God's tenth. D. Wallace; AN..... 418
Gogarty, Oliver St. John
Selected poems; AN..... 743
Gold falcon, the, or the haggard of love.
Anonymous; AN..... 307
Goldberg, Isaac, and A. Myerson
German Jew, the: His share in modern culture; AN..... 195
Goodrich, Lloyd
Thomas Eakins; AN..... 195
Gorki, Maxim
On guard for the soviet union. With introduction by R. Rolland; B..... 306
Gorki, Maxim, biography. M. J. Olgin;
AN..... 167
Gorman, Herbert
Jonathan Bishop; B..... 741
Government of the people; a study in the American political system. D. W.
Brogan; B..... 487
Gowen, Emmett
Dark moon of March; B..... 546
Grattan, C. Hartley; R.....193, 328
Great offensive, the. M. Hindus; B..... 741 Great tradition, the: An interpretation of American literature since the civil war.
G. Hicks; B..... 449
Gregory, Horace; R.....107, 163, 447, 629, 656
Grossman, William L.; R..... 658
Gruen, William; R.....81, 219, 543
Gruening, Martha; R.....452, 518
Gwynn, Denis
De Valera; B..... 78
Gwynn, Stephen
Life and friendships of Dean Swift, the;
B..... 600

H

- H. M. Stanley. A. J. A. Symons; AN.... 575
 Habits: Their making and unmaking. K. Dunlap; B..... 192
 Hacker, Louis M.; R. 108 (see also 302).. 544
 Hahn, Emily
 Congo solo, misadventures two degrees north; B..... 277
 Hale, Gardner
 Fresco painting; AN..... 716
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.
 Seeds of revolt; B..... 454
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.; R..... 137, 194, 388, 629
 Hansen, Alvin Harvey; R..... 329
 Harris, Abram L.; R..... 165
 Harrison, Samuel B.
 Yonder lies Jericho; AN..... 280
 Hausleiter, Leo
 Machine unchained, the. M. M. Green, translator; B..... 602
 Hay, John, biography. T. Dennett; B..... 545
 Hayek, Friedrich A.
 Monetary theory and the trade cycle; B.. 329
 Hays, Arthur Garfield
 Trial by prejudice; B..... 361
 Hayward, John
 Charles II.; AN..... 279
 Hazlitt, Henry
 Anatomy of criticism, the; B..... 385
 Hazlitt, Henry; R..... 21 (see also 383); 78, 218, 413, 446
 Health and environment. E. Sydenstricker; B..... 193
 Hear, ye sons. I. Fineman; B..... 359
 Heibredner, Edna
 Seven psychologies; B..... 192
 Heine, L. Marcuse; B..... 629
 Hemingway, Ernest
 Winner take nothing; B..... 570
 Herbst, Josephine
 Pity is not enough; B..... 52
 Herrick, Robert
 Sometime; AN..... 54
 Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 277
 Hicks, Granville
 Great tradition, the: An interpretation of American literature since the civil war; B..... 449
 Hicks, Granville; R..... 305, 358
 Hillyer, Robert Collected verse; AN..... 715
 Hindus, Maurice
 Great offensive, the; B..... 741
 History and epidemiology of syphilis, the. W. A. Pusey; B..... 387
 History of Europe in the nineteenth century. B. Croce. Translated by H. Furst; B..... 600
 History of Germany. H. Pinnow. Translated by M. Brailsford; AN..... 138
 History of the far east in modern times, the. H. M. Vinacke; B..... 629
 Hitler, Adolf
 My battle. Abridged and translated by E. T. S. Dugdale; B..... 515
 Hitler's reich. H. F. Armstrong; AN..... 248
 Hitler's kampf um die macht. Der nationalsozialismus und die ereignisse des jahres 1932. E. von Schmidt-Pauli; AN..... 167
 Hobart, Alice Tisdale
 Oil for the lamps of China; B..... 740
 Holby, Winifred
 Mandao, Mandao!; AN..... 334
 Home, Michael Return; B..... 601
 Homecoming. F. Dell; AN..... 659
 Hoover, Calvin B.
 Germany enters the third reich; B..... 357
 How safe is life insurance? L. S. Schnitman; B..... 658
 Howarth, O. J. R., and R. E. Dickman
 Making of geography, the; AN..... 457

I

- Ida Elisabeth. S. Undset; AN..... 660
 India-Burma. Laymen's foreign missions inquiry; AN..... 224
 Indian air. Impressions of travel in South America. P. Morand. Translated by D. Flower; B..... 244
 Ingstad, Helge
 Land of feast and famine, the. E. Gay-Tift, translator; B..... 194
 Insecurity: A challenge to America. A. Epstein; B..... 51
 Institutional behavior. F. H. Allport; B..... 572 Intelligent man's review of Europe today, the. G. D. H. and M. Cole; B..... 514
 Internal debts of the United States, the. Edited by E. Clark and G. B. Gallo-way; B..... 81
 International politics: An introduction to the western state system. F. L. Schuman; B..... 221 International series of open letters, an. Volume II. Why war? A. Einstein and S. Freud; AN..... 55

- Introduction to Robinson Jeffers, an. L. C. Powell; B..... 712
 It was the nightingale. F. M. Ford; B..... 544
 Italian corporative state, the. F. Pitigliani; B..... 448

J

- Jacks, L. P.
 My American friends; B..... 79
 Janosky, Oscar I.
 Jews and minority rights (1898-1919), the; B..... 191
 Jarrett, Cora
 Night over Fitch's pond; AN..... 455
 Jealous mountains. G. Whitsett; AN..... 335
 Jeans, Sir James
 New background of science, the; B.... 81
 Jeffers, Robinson
 Give your heart to the hawks, and other poems; B..... 712
 Jeffers, Robinson, an introduction to. L. C. Powell; B..... 712
 Jeffers, Robinson. Bibliography of the works of S. S. Alberts; AN..... 307
 Jenks, Leland Hamilton; R..... 275
 Jennings, H. S.
 Universe and life, the; B..... 514
 Jews and minority rights (1898-1919), the. O. I. Janowsky; B..... 191
 John Hay: From poetry to politics. T. Dennett; B..... 545
 John Henry Newman. J. E. Ross; AN..... 630
 John Ruskin. An introduction to further study of his life and work. R. H. Wilenski; B..... 488
 John Wesley. B. Dobrée; AN..... 307
 Johnson, James Weldon
 Along this way; B..... 452
 Jonathan Bishop. H. Gorman; B..... 741
 Jones, Alan Pryce
 Beethoven; AN..... 279
 Jones, Bassett
 Debt and production; B..... 218
 Josephson, Matthew
 Nazi culture: The brown darkness over Germany; AN..... 418
 Joshua Reynolds. J. Steegman; AN..... 280
 Journal of Arnold Bennett, 1921-1928, the; B..... 24
 Journal of Gamaliel Bradford, the. Edited by Van W. Brooks; B..... 358
 Journey of the flame, the. A. de Fierro. Englished by W. de Steiguer; B..... 542
 Julia Newberry's diary; AN..... 25
 Junipero Serra. A. Repplier; B..... 627

K

- Kaiser goes, the: The generals remain. T. Plivier. Translated by A. W. Wheen; B..... 328
 Kang, Younghill; R..... 79
 Karl and the twentieth century. B. Brunngraber; B..... 626
 Kataev, Valentine
 Time forward. C. Malamuth, translator; B..... 656
 Kaye-Smith, Sheila
 Gipsy wagon; B..... 601
 Kent, Rockwell
 Rockwellkentiana: Few words and many pictures; AN..... 575
 Keynes, John Maynard
 Means to prosperity, the; B.... 21; see also C..... 383
 King Edward VII. E. F. Benson; B..... 359
 Kingman, Tracy
 Authenticated contemporary portrait of Shakespeare, an; AN..... 224
 Kirkland, Edward C.; R..... 306
 Kirsh, Benjamin S., and H. R. Shapiro
 National industrial recovery act, the: An analysis; B..... 78
 Knight G. Wilson
 Christian renaissance, the. With interpretations of Dante, Shakespeare, and Goethe, and a note on T. S. Eliot; B..... 80
 Knox, Ronald
 Broadcast minds; B..... 51
 Kosok, Paul
 Modern Germany: A study of conflicting loyalties; B..... 247
 Kroetch, Victor John; R..... 53
 Krupskaya, N. K.
 Memories of Lenin. Volume II; AN... 54
 Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..... 49, 134, 162, 357, 414, 514, 599, 679, 711
 Kurtz, Benjamin P.
 Pursuit of death, the. A study of Shelley's poetry; AN..... 660

L

- La Follette, Suzanne; R..... 454
 Labor relations under the recovery act. O. Tead and H. C. Metcalfe; B..... 416
 Laidler, Harry W.; R..... 81
 Lamont, Corliss and Margaret
 Russia day by day; B..... 245

- Land of feast and famine, the. H. Ingstad. Translated by E. Gay-Tift; B..... 194
 Land of the spotted eagle. Chief Standing Bear; B..... 50
 Laski, Harold J.; R..... 514
 Laver, James
 Wesley; AN..... 307
 Lenin, N.
 Memories. Volume II. N. K. Krupskaya; AN..... 54
 Leon, Derrick
 Livingstones; B..... 191
 Letters of Robert Browning; B..... 50
 Life and friendships of Dean Swift, the. S. Gwynn; B..... 600
 Life in the United States; B..... 454
 Life of Joseph Chamberlain, the. Volume Two: 1885-1895. J. L. Garvin; B... 163
 Limitations of science, the. J. W. N. Sullivan; B..... 543
 Lipsky, Abram
 Martin Luther: God's angry man; B... 571
 Livingston, Arthur; R..... 682
 Livingstones. D. Leon; B..... 191
 Lloyd George, David
 War memoirs, 1914-1916, the; B..... 683
 Local government in the United States. M. Seasingood; AN..... 195
 Lockhart, J. G.
 Cecil Rhodes; B..... 415
 Log of the Betsy Ann, the. F. Way, junior; B..... 624
 Lore, Ludwig; R..... 515, 603
 Lorwin, Lewis L.
 American federation of labor, the; B.. 302
 Loving, Pierre; R..... 222
 Lowe, Robert Liddell; R..... 386
 Lowenthal, Marvin; R..... 22, 191, 221, 332, 359
 Luther, Martin, biography. A. Lipsky; B.. 571

M

- MacDonald, William; R..... 78, 331, 626, 738
 Macdonell, A. G.
 England, their England; B..... 386
 Machine age in the hills. M. Ross; B..... 165 Machine unchained, the. L. Hausleiter. Translated by M. M. Green; B..... 602
 MacLeish, Archibald
 Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's city; AN..... 168
 Madame Maillart. C. Aveline; B..... 137
 Making of geography, the. R. E. Dickman and O. J. R. Howrath; AN..... 457
 Man of the renaissance, the. R. Roeder; B..... 682
 Man wants but little. W. Wright; AN..... 55
 Mandao, Mandao! W. Holby; AN..... 334
 Mann, Thomas
 Past masters. H. T. Lowe-Porter, translator; B..... 599
 Mannin, Ethel
 Venetian blinds; AN..... 223
 Many happy returns. R. Strachey; B..... 49
 March of democracy, the. Volume II. J. T. Adams; AN..... 224
 Marcuse, Ludwig
 Heine; B..... 629
 Marlborough: His life and times. Volume I, 1650-1688. Volume II, 1688-1702. W. Churchill; B..... 738
 Martin Luther: God's angry man. A. Lipsky; B..... 571
 Martyr, the. L. O'Flaherty; B..... 165
 Marx, Karl
 Communist manifesto, the; review by J. W. Krutch; S..... 49
 Maxim Gorky, writer and revolutionist. M. J. Olgin; AN..... 167
 McDougall, William
 Energies of men, the; B..... 192
 McKeon, Richard; R..... 628
 McWilliams, Carey; R..... 246
 Maurois, André
 Edwardian era, the; B..... 626
 Means to prosperity, the. J. M. Keynes; B..... 21; see also C..... 383
 Mehnert, Klaus
 Youth in soviet Russia. M. Davidson, translator; B..... 387
 Mellon's millions: The biography of a fortune. H. O'Connor; B..... 304
 Memoirs of a bolshevik. O. Piatnitsky; B... 111
 Memories of Lenin. Volume II. N. K. Krupskaya; AN..... 54
 Menace of fascism, the. J. Strachey; B... 413
 Mencken, H. L.; R..... 79, 487
 Mendel, Arthur; R..... 24, 389
 Menken, Alice Davis
 On the side of mercy; AN..... 716
 Mere living, the. B. B. Spiro; AN..... 418
 Metcalfe, Henry C., and O. Tead
 Labor relations under the recovery act; B..... 416
 Metternich: A study of his period and personality. A. Cecil; B..... 53
 Milburn, George
 No more trumpets; B..... 386

- Millin, Sarah Gertrude
Cecil Rhodes; B. 415
- Mirrors of Wall street, the. Anonymous;
B. 276
- Mitchell, Broadus; R. 602
- Mitchison, Naomi
Delicate fire, the; AN. 418
- Modern composers. G. Pannain. Translated by M. R. Bonavia; B. 24
- Modern Germany: A study of conflicting loyalties. P. Kosok; B. 247
- Modern industrial organization: An economic interpretation. H. von Beckerath.
Translated by R. Newcomb and F.
Krebs; AN. 492
- Monetary theory and the trade cycle. F. A.
Hayek; B. 329
- Monsoon. W. David; AN. 195
- Moore, T. Sturge
Poems. Collected edition. Volumes I, II, and III; B. 53
- Mordell, Albert
Quaker militant: John Greenleaf Whittier; B. 107
- Morand, Paul
Indian air. Impressions of travel in South America. D. Flower, translator; B. 244
- Mrs. Barry. F. Niven; AN. 248
- Mrs. Egg and other barbarians. T. Beer;
AN. 247
- Mrs. Haney. F. Daingerfield; AN. 743
- Music of our day. Essentials and prophecies.
L. Saminsky; B. 24
- My American friends. L. P. Jacks; B. 79
- My battle. A. Hitler; abridged and translated by E. T. S. Dugdale; B. 515
- My life as German and Jew. Jacob Wassermann; B. 740
- Myerson, Abraham, and I. Goldberg
German Jew, the: His share in modern culture; AN. 195
- N
- National industrial recovery act, the: An analysis. B. S. Kirsh and H. R.
Shapiro; B. 78
- National industrial recovery act; two books on; B. 416
- Nazi culture: The brown darkness over Germany. M. Josephson; AN. 418
- New background of science, the. Sir J.
Jeans; B. 81
- New road. M. Colby; AN. 83
- Newberry, Julia
Diary; AN. 25
- Newbold, Walton
Democracy, debts, and disarmament; AN. 456
- Newman, John Henry, biography. J. E.
Ross; AN. 630
- Newton, Arthur Percival
Pioneer histories, the. The European nations in the West Indies, 1493-1688;
AN. 419
- Nichols, Beverley
Cry havoc; B. 388
- Nicholson, Basil D.
Business is business; AN. 248
- Nicolson, Harold
Peacemaking; B. 451
- Night over Fitch's pond. C. Jarrett; AN. 455
- Niven, Frederick
Mrs. Barry; AN. 248
- No more trumpets. G. Milburn; B. 386
- Noyes, Peter Helmoop; R. 276
- Nuhn, Ferner; R. 135, 657
- O
- O. Henry memorial award prize stories of 1933. Edited by H. Hansen; B. 657
- O'Connor, Harvey
Mellon's millions: The biography of a fortune; B. 304
- O'Flaherty, Liam
Martyr, the; B. 165
- Oil for the lamps of China. A. T. Hobart;
B. 740
- Olgin, Moissaye J.
Maxim Gorky, writer and revolutionist;
AN. 167
- O'Mara, Pat
Autobiography of a Liverpool Irish slummy, the; AN. 247
- On guard for the soviet union. M. Gorki.
With introduction by R. Rolland; B. 306
- On reading Shakespeare. L. P. Smith; B. 414
- On the method of theoretical physics. A.
Einstein; Editorial. 342; see also letter
On the side of mercy. A. D. Menken;
AN. 716
- One more river. J. Galsworthy; B. 601
- Ordinary families. E. A. Robertson; AN. 456
- Original design. E. Beswick; AN. 280
- Orphée. J. Cocteau. Translated by C. Wildman; B. 244
- Orwell, George
Down and out in Paris and London;
AN. 279
- O'Ryan, John F.; R. 389
- O'Sullivan, Maurice
Twenty years a-growing; B. 221
- Our movie-made children. H. J. Forman; review by W. Troy; MP. 26
- P
- Pannain, Guido
Modern composers. M. R. Bonavia, translator; B. 24
- Parker, Dorothy
After such pleasures; AN. 715
- Parkes, H. B.; R. 386
- Parshley, H. M.
Science of human reproduction, the;
AN. 83
- Parsons, Alice Beals; R. 491
- Past masters. T. Mann. Translated by H.
T. Lowe-Porter; B. 599
- Pastures and other poems. L. W. Reese;
B. 571
- Pausanias
Description of Greece. Volume III.
Translated by W. H. S. Jones; AN. 138
- Peacemaking. H. Nicolson; B. 451
- Pearson, Frank A., and G. F. Warren
Prices; AN. 659
- People's choice, the. H. Agar; B. 306
- Persov, Anne
Whatever you reap; AN. 167
- Peter Abelard. H. Waddell; B. 628; correction of name of publisher. 660
- Philosophic approach to communism, a. T.
B. Brameld; B. 712
- Philosophy of Henry George, the. G. R.
Geiger; B. 166
- Phyloanalysis. W. Galt; AN. 83
- Piatnitsky, O.
Memoirs of a bolshevik; B. 111
- Pinnow, Herman
History of Germany. M. Brailsford, translator; AN. 138
- Pioneer histories, the. The European nations in the West Indies, 1493-1688.
A. P. Newton; AN. 419
- Pitigliani, Fausto
Italian corporative state, the; B. 448
- Pity is not enough. J. Herbst; B. 52
- Plebeians' progress, the. F. Tilsley; B. 305
- Plivier, Theodor
Kaiser goes, the: The generals remain.
A. W. Wheen, translator; B. 328
- Plomer, William
Cecil Rhodes; B. 415
- Poems. M. De L. Welch; AN. 604
- Poems of T. Sturge Moore. Collected edition. Volumes I, II, and III; B. 53
- Poetry and its meaning. L. Abercrombie;
AN. 743
- Poetry, two books on; AN. 743
- Polakov, Walter N.
Power age, the; B. 602
- Pollard, Robert T.
China's foreign relations, 1917-1931;
AN. 660
- Ponsonby, Arthur
Victoria; AN. 458
- Poor, splendid wings. F. Winwar; B. 447
- Powell, Lawrence Clark
Introduction to Robinson Jeffers; B. 712
- Power age, the. W. N. Polakov; B. 602
- Praz, Mario
Romantic agony, the. A. Davidson, translator; B. 417
- Prendergast, William A.
Public utilities and the people; B. 246
- Price, Ernest Batson
Russo-Japanese treaties of 1907-16 concerning Manchuria and Mongolia;
AN. 279
- Prices. G. F. Warren and F. A. Pearson;
AN. 659
- Priestley, J. B.
Wonder hero; AN. 519
- Problèmes européens. J. Romain; B. 357
- Promise of power, the. S. Chase; B. 489;
see also C. 653
- Psychology: five books on; B. 192
- Public utilities and the people. W. A.
Prendergast; B. 246
- Puccini, G., biography; AN. 456
- Pull devil, pull baker. S. Benson; B. 136
- Pure and the impure. Colette; B. 222
- Pursuit of death, the. A study of Shelley's poetry. B. P. Kurtz; AN. 660
- Pusey, William Allen
History and epidemiology of syphilis, the;
B. 387
- Q
- Quaker militant: John Greenleaf Whittier.
A. Mordell; B. 107
- R
- Radetzky march. J. Roth; B. 601
- Radziwill, Catherine; R. 518
- Randolph, Vance
From an Ozark holler; B. 546
- Rash act, the. F. M. Ford; AN. 138
- Ratcliffe, S. K.; R. 163
- Read, Herbert
Form in modern poetry; B. 333
- Rees, Goronwy
Summer flood, the; AN. 334
- Reese, Lizette Woodworth
Pastures and other poems; B. 571
- Remer, C. F.
Foreign investments in China; AN. 82
- Renascent India: from Ram Mohan Roy to Mohandas Gandhi. H. C. Zacharias;
AN. 223
- Repplier, Agnes
Junipero Serra; B. 627
- Requiem. A. E. Fisher; B. 546
- Return. M. Home; B. 601
- Reynolds, Joshua, biography. J. Stegman;
AN. 280
- Rhodes, Cecil, three biographies; B. 415
- Ringel, Fred J.; R. 454
- Rio Grande. H. Fergusson; B. 190
- Robertson, E. Arnot
Ordinary families; AN. 456
- Robino and other stories. U. Fracchia.
Translated by Sir S. H. Scott; B. 329
- Robinson, Edwin Arlington
Talifer; B. 415
- Robinson, James Harvey; R. 600
- Rockwellkentiana: Few words and many pictures. R. Kent; AN. 575
- Roeder, Ralph
Man of the renaissance, the; B. 682
- Rogers, Arthur Kenyon
Socratic problems, the; B. 135
- Rolland, Romain
Death of a world, the. Volume IV of The soul enchanted. A. de Alberti, translator; B. 516
- Romains, Jules
Problèmes européens; B. 357
- Romantic agony, the. M. Praz. Translated by A. Davidson; B. 417
- Romantic exiles, the. E. H. Carr; B. 164
- Rorty, James; B. 712
- Ross, J. Eliot
John Henry Newman; AN. 630
- Ross, Malcolm
Machine age in the hills; B. 165
- Roth, Joseph
Radetzky march; B. 601
- Rourke, Constance; R. 543
- Ruskin, John, biography; B. 488
- Russell, Charles Edward Bare hands and stone walls; B. 712
- Russell, George (Æ)
Avatars, the. A Futurist fantasy; AN. 519
- Russia day by day. C. and M. Lamont; B. 245
- Russia, three books on; B. 245
- Russo-Japanese treaties of 1907-16 concerning Manchuria and Mongolia, the. E.
B. Price; AN. 279
- S
- Sadler, Michael
Strange life of Lady Blessington, the;
B. 656
- Saint-Exupéry, Antoine
Southern mail. S. Gilbert, translator;
AN. 659
- Salter, Sir Arthur
Framework of an ordered society, the;
B. 78
- Saminsky, Lazare
Music of our day. Essentials and prophecies; B. 24
- Samson, Leon
Toward a united front; AN. 456
- Santayana, George
Some turns of thought in modern philosophy; B. 446
- Schluter, William C.
Economic cycles and crises; B. 329
- Schmidt-Pauli, Edgar
Hitlers kampf um die macht. Der na-tionalsozialismus und die ereignisse des jahres 1932; AN. 167
- Schneider, Isidor; R. 164, 415, 450
- Schnitman, L. Seth
How safe is life insurance? B. 658
- Schuman, Frederick L.
International politics: An introduction to the western state system; B. 221
- Schuyler, Robert Livingston; R. 359
- Science of human reproduction, the. H. M.
Parshley; AN. 83
- Scott, Albert L., and R. B. Fosdick
Toward liquor control; E. 583
- Scott, Evelyn; R. 244
- Sea wall. L. A. G. Strong; AN. 604
- Seasongood, Murray
Local government in the United States;
AN. 195
- Seeds of revolt. M. A. Hallgren; B. 454
- Seldes, George
World panorama: 1918-1933; AN. 25
- Selected letters of George Edward Woodberry; AN. 25
- Selected poems. O. St. J. Gogarty; AN. 743

- Selected poems of George Edward Woodberry; AN..... 25
- Sergeant, Elizabeth Shepley; R..... 740
- Serra, Junipero, biography. A. Repplier; B..... 627
- Seven psychologies. E. Heidbreder; B..... 192
- Shakespeare. J. Drinkwater; AN..... 248
- Shakespeare, William, two books on; B..... 414
- Shape of things to come, the. H. G. Wells; B..... 328
- Shapiro, Harold Roland, and B. S. Kirsh
National industrial recovery act, the: AN analysis; B..... 78
- Shelley, Percy Bysshe, study of his poetry.
B. P. Kurtz; AN..... 660
- Sheridan, Richard Brinsley, biography; AN..... 389
- Sheridan. W. A. Darlington; AN..... 389
- Significance of sections in American history, the. F. J. Turner; B..... 108; see also. 302
- Simonds, Frank H.
America faces the next war; article by
O. G. Villard; S..... 725
- Sitwell, Edith
English eccentrics, the; AN..... 742
- Skariatina, Irina
First to go back; B..... 518
- Skinner, Constance Lindsay
Beaver, kings, and cabins; AN..... 418
- Smedley, Agnes
Chinese destinies: Sketches of present-day
China; B..... 518
- Smith, Logan Pearsall
On reading Shakespeare; B..... 414
- Snow, Edgar
Far eastern front; B..... 629
- Snows of Helicon, the. H. M. Tomlinson;
B..... 303
- Socrates. A. E. Taylor; B..... 135
- Socratic problem, the. A. K. Rogers; B..... 135
- Solal. A. Cohen. Translated by W. Benson;
B..... 332
- Some turns of thought in modern philosophy.
G. Santayana; B..... 446
- Sometime. R. Herrick; AN..... 54
- Southern mail. A. de Saint-Exupéry. Translated by S. Gilbert; AN..... 659
- Specht, Richard
Giacomo Puccini: The man—his life—his work. C. A. Phillips, translator;
SN..... 456
- Spire, André, and his poetry. S. Burnshaw;
B..... 22
- Spirit of France, the. P. Cohen-Portheim.
Translated by A. Harris; B..... 658
- Spiro, B. Bergson
Mere living, the; AN..... 418
- Stanley, H. M., biography. A. J. A. Symons;
AN..... 575
- Steegman, John
Joshua Reynolds; AN..... 280
- Steffens, Lincoln; R..... 713
- Stein, Gertrude
Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, the;
B..... 274
- Steinbeck, John
To a god unknown; AN..... 456
- Stewart, George
White armies of Russia, the; B..... 194
- Stillman, Clara Gruening; R..... 571, 686
- Stolberg, Benjamin; R..... 23 (see also C, 327;
C, 484)..... 302
- Stoll, E. R.
Art and artifice in Shakespeare; B..... 414
- Stong, Phil
Stranger's return; B..... 135
- Story anthology, a. Edited by W. Burnet and M. Foley; B..... 657
- Story of scientific psychology, the. A. Ford;
B..... 192
- Strabo
Geography. Volume VIII. Translated by H. L. Jones; AN..... 138
- Strachey, John
Menace of fascism, the; B..... 413
- Strachey, Lytton
Characters and commentaries; B..... 686
- Strachey, Richard
Many happy returns; B..... 491
- Strange life of Lady Blessington. M. Sadleir;
B..... 656
- Strange victory. S. Teasdale; AN..... 520
- Stranger's return. P. Stong; B..... 135
- Strong, L. A. G.
Sea wall; AN..... 604
- Stuart, Francis
Try the sky; AN..... 54
- Summer flood, the. G. Rees; AN..... 334
- Sullivan, J. W. N.
Limitations of science, the; B..... 543
- Sutherland, Halliday
Arches of the years, the; B..... 163
- Swain, Joseph Ward
Beginning the twentieth century; B..... 137
- Swift, Dean, biography. S. Gwynn; B..... 600
- Sydenstricker, Edgar
Health and environment; B..... 193
- Symons, A. J. A.
H. M. Stanley; AN..... 575
- T
- Talifer. E. A. Robinson; B..... 415
- Tapestry the mirror of civilization. P. Ackerman; AN..... 248
- Taylor, A. E.
Socrates; B..... 135
- Tead, Ordway, and H. C. Metcalfe
Labor relations under the recovery act;
B..... 416
- Teasdale, Sara
Strange victory; AN..... 520
- Testament of youth. V. Brittain; B..... 454
- This changing world. S. S. Fels; B..... 741
- This Russian business. E. T. Brown; B..... 245
- Thomas, Jean
Traipsin' woman, the; AN..... 248
- Thomas Eakins. L. Goodrich; AN..... 195
- Three cities. S. Asch; B..... 450
- Tiger Juan. R. P. de Ayala; B..... 601
- Tilsley, Frank
Plebeian's progress, the; B..... 305
- Time, forward. V. Kataev. Translated by
C. Malamuth; B..... 656
- To a god unknown. J. Steinbeck; AN..... 456
- To be or not to be: A study of suicide. L.
I. Dublin and B. Bunzell; AN..... 278
- Tomlinson, H. M.
Snows of Helicon, the; B..... 303
- Toward a united front. L. Samson; AN..... 456
- Toward liquor control. R. B. Fosdick and A. L. Scott; E..... 583
- Townsend, Ralph
Ways that are dark: The truth about
China; B..... 715
- Tragedy of Russia, the. W. Durant; B..... 245
- Traipsin' woman, the. J. Thomas; AN..... 248
- Traveler's library. Compiled with notes by W. S. Maugham; S..... 711
- Trevelyan, G. E.
Appius and Virginia; AN..... 83
- Trial by prejudice. A. G. Hays; B..... 361
- Trilling, Lionel; R..... 488, 738
- Troy, William; R..... 26, 52, 110, 165, 244, 274, 417, 570
- Try the sky. F. Stuart; AN..... 54
- Turner, Frederick Jackson
Significance of sections in American history, the; B..... 108; see also..... 302
- Turner, W. J.
Wagner; AN..... 279
- Twentieth century short stories. Selected by
S. C. Bates; B..... 110
- Twenty years a-growing. M. O'Sullivan; B..... 221
- U
- Undset, Sigrid
Ida Elisabeth; AN..... 660
- Universe and life, the. H. S. Jennings; B..... 514
- Universe of light, the. Sir W. Bragg; B..... 219
- Unpublished letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Edited by E. L. Griggs; B..... 738
- Untried case, the: The Sacco-Vanzetti case and the Morelli gang. H. B. Ehr-
mann; B..... 305
- Use of poetry, the. T. S. Eliot. J. W.
Krutch; S..... 679
- V
- Valenstein, Lawrence, and E. B. Weiss.
Business under the recovery act; B..... 416
- Van Doren, Carl
American literature: An introduction; B..... 162
- Van Doren, Carl; R..... 443, 544, 600, 628, 680
- Van Doren, Dorothy; R..... 24, 108, 191
- Van Doren, Mark; R..... 50, 80, 450, 542
- Vanessa. H. Walpole; B..... 601
- Venetian blinds. E. Mannin; AN..... 223
- Victoria. A. Ponsonby; AN..... 458
- Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 162, 247, 357, 451
- Vinacke, Harold M.
History of the far east in modern times,
a; B..... 629
- Volume the first. J. Austen; AN..... 334
- W
- Waddell, Helen
Peter Abelard; B..... 628; correction of name of publisher..... 660
- Wagner. W. J. Turner; AN..... 279
- Wallace, Doreen
God's tenth; AN..... 418
- Walpole, Hugh
Vanessa; B..... 601
- Walton, Eda Lou; R..... 333, 415, 516, 571, 627, 684, 739
- War memoirs of David Lloyd George, 1914-
1916, the; B..... 683
- Warren, George F., and F. A. Pearson
Prices; AN..... 659
- Wassermann, Jacob
My life as German and Jew; B..... 740
- Watching the world go by. W. J. Abbot;
AN..... 743
- Way, Frederick, Junior
Log of the Betsy Ann, the; Dt..... 624
- Ways that are dark: The truth about China.
R. Townsend; B..... 715
- Weiss, E. B., and L. Valenstein
Business under the recovery act; B..... 416
- Welch, Marie De L.
Poems; AN..... 604
- Welles, Winifred
Blossoming antlers; AN..... 492
- Wells, H. G.
Shape of things to come, the; B..... 328
- Wescott, Glenway
Calendar of saints for unbelievers, a; B..... 80
- Wesley. J. Laver; AN..... 307
- Wesley, John, two biographies; AN..... 307
- What electricity costs. Edited by M. L.
Cooke; B..... 97
- What would be the character of a new war?
Inquiry ordered by the interparliamen-tary union, Geneva. By eighteen experts; B..... 389
- Whatever you reap. A. Persov; AN..... 167
- When Adam wept. A. R. Craig; AN..... 195
- White armies of Russia, the. G. Stewart; B..... 194
- Whitsett, George
Jealous mountains; AN..... 335
- Whittier, John Greenleaf, biography. A. Mordell; B..... 107
- Why war? A. Einstein and S. Freud; AN..... 55
- Wilenski, R. H.
John Ruskin. An introduction to further study of his life and work; B..... 488
- William Cray Brownell. An anthology of his writings, together with biographical notes and impressions of the later years. G. H. Brownell; AN..... 659
- Williamson, Thames
Woods colt, the; B..... 546
- Willis, Irene Cooper
Brontës, the; AN..... 280
- Wilson, Walter
Forced labor in the United States; B..... 165
- Winding stair and other poems, the. W.
B. Yeats; B..... 684
- Winner take nothing. E. Hemingway; B..... 570
- Winwar, Frances
Poor, splendid wings; B..... 447
- Wonder hero. J. B. Priestley; AN..... 519
- Woodberry, George Edward
Selected letters; AN..... 25
- Selected poems; AN..... 25
- Wooden doctor, the. M. Evans; B..... 219
- Woods colt, the. T. Williamson; B..... 546
- Woolf, Virginia
Flush. A biography; B..... 450
- World panorama: 1918-1933. G. Seldes; AN..... 25
- Wortham, H. E.
Edward VII; B..... 359
- Wright, Wilson
Man wants but little; AN..... 55
- Y
- Yeats, William Butler
Collected poems; B..... 684
- Winding stair and other poems, the; B..... 684
- Yonder lies Jericho. S. B. Harrison; AN..... 280
- Young, G. M.
Gibbon; AN..... 54
- Youth in soviet Russia. K. Mehnert. Translated by M. Davidson; B..... 387
- Z
- Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R..... 53
- Zacharias, H. C.
Renascent India: From Ram Mohan Roy to Mohandas Gandhi; AN..... 223

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 5, 1933

No. 3548

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	1
EDITORIALS:
To Save the Conference	3
President Roosevelt's Appointments	4
Boneheaded Economy	6
WALTER LIPPMANN. I. "THE GREAT ELUCIDATOR." By	7
Amos Pinchot	7
GOVERNMENT WITHOUT CONGRESS. By Paul Y. Anderson	11
THE WORLD CONFERENCE AT WORK. By Oswald Garrison	12
Villard	12
"AUSTRIA IS NOT GERMANY." By O. W. Holden	14
NOT STAGED FOR TOURISTS. By John Rothschild	16
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	17
CORRESPONDENCE	18
FINANCE: WALL STREET FACES THE NEW SECURITIES	20
ACT. By Peter Helmoop Noyes	20
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	20
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Mr. Keynes's Way Out. By Henry Hazlitt	21
Lone Poet of the Loire. By Marvin Lowenthal	22
Marxism in France. By Benjamin Stolberg	23
Modern Music. By Arthur Mendel	24
Arnold Bennett's Journal Ends. By Dorothy Van Doren	24
Mr. Fry on French Art. By E. M. Benson	24
Shorter Notices	25
Films: The Bogy of Hollywood. By William Troy	26

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

NOT ALL THE BRISK TALK about team work and cooperation is going to obscure for long the fundamental conflict inherent in the administration of the Industrial Recovery Act. That conflict is none other than our old friend the class struggle. Sharper and clearer the issue is being drawn. On one side is labor, glimpsing an opportunity to reestablish the power of the unions, to bargain collectively, to salt away gains in wages and hours—labor, not revolutionary but very desperate, hungry after lean years during which unemployment has drained its membership and its treasuries. On the other side are the employers, lean and hungry too, in many cases; eager for rescue from failure or dwindling reserves but unwilling to share even the hope of profits with their old enemy, organized labor. This description, we know, draws the line too sharply. Many employers are prepared to recognize the union and pay a living wage if they can also be offered the chance of profits. But the division is there, and we predict that it will grow wider as the public hearings on the various industrial codes begin to bring out into the open the elements of conflict. Hugh S. Johnson, in his effective radio talk explaining the methods and purposes of the recovery act, insisted upon the necessity of a minimum wage and reduced hours. In answer to the imaginary question: "What should be the shorter week and what should be the minimum wage?" he advocated, "under present conditions and ■ far as the lowest-priced class of workers are concerned, an average of about thirty-two hours ■ week at not less than forty-five cents an hour." It is noteworthy that the newspapers which reported his speech printed in another column the text of the code drafted for the retail drygoods stores of the country proposing a minimum wage ranging from $10 to $12 for women workers and from $12 to $18 for men. The women, presumably the "lowest-priced class of workers," would thus receive from $2.40 to $4.40 a week less than the least suggested by the federal administrator.

BUT WAGES AND HOURS are secondary sources of conflict. The primary difficulty will certainly arise over the question of forcing employers to recognize and deal with independent unions. So far Mr. Johnson has dodged this issue; he has merely repeated the provision of the law that industrial codes must "contain a covenant to recognize collective bargaining and not to require men to join a company union as a condition of employment." This would seem to outlaw those company unions now being hastily and coercively set up, according to reports, in the coal fields and steel mills. But it does not reveal the administration's attitude toward company unions already established. Labor leaders have vociferously announced that they will fight to prevent such organizations from representing labor in any field, and the Labor Advisory Board headed by Frances Perkins is obviously working in the closest collaboration with organized labor. The employers, on the other hand, especially those in the great unorganized industries, will never willingly permit free union activities in their domain, much less engage in collective bargaining with "outside" unions. We look for ■ battle over this issue, and the outcome will do more to clarify the real aims and attitude of the powers that control the administration of the new industrial-control law than could any number of official pronouncements.

MOST AMERICANS, including many in the South, will rejoice in the action of Judge Horton of Alabama in setting aside the verdict of guilty found against Heywood Patterson in his second trial. Patterson, it will be recalled, is one of the nine Negro boys arrested in Scottsboro more than two years ago, charged with rape upon two white girls in a freight car. After seven of the boys had been sentenced to death, the United States Supreme Court ordered a new trial on the ground that they had not had proper representation by counsel. Patterson alone was then retried, and again convicted. In overthrowing this conviction and ordering a new trial, Judge Horton pointed out that the verdict rested solely on an improbable story by one of the alleged victims, flatly contradicted by the other. He also noted that the prosecution refused to call as a witness a white hobo on the train, when he refused to support the State's case. Judge Horton's action does not in itself free any of the boys, but we may hope for their release shortly, as the State's case appears to be completely destroyed by the decision and further trials would be obvious persecution. The praise bestowed upon Judge Horton is tempered in some quarters by the assertion that his action was taken in order to prevent the United States Supreme Court from passing upon the legitimacy of excluding Negroes from Southern juries. This point was one of three raised in the appeal to the federal bench, but only the question of inadequate counsel was passed on. It was the intention of the defense, though, to concentrate on the race issue if a second appeal should become necessary. Undoubtedly sentiment in the South was for preventing this, and Judge Horton, in his recent decision, may have been as much of a politician as a jurist. This, however, is a criticism which may be made of our wisest and most upright judges. It is scarcely more than saying that Judge Horton is human. The Nation gives him all credit for extricating his State from an ugly position. By unyielding stubbornness in similar circumstances the late Judge Thayer brought upon Massachusetts the shame and tragedy of the Sacco-Vanzetti execution.

THOUGH HE ESCAPED JAIL when tried on a charge of evading his income tax, Charles E. Mitchell is still the man who during his fifteen years as head of the National City Company foisted on the public billions of dollars' worth of dubious securities and loaned himself and his fellow-officers of the National City Bank $2,400,000 of the stockholders' money without security or interest, while compelling the clerks to continue payments on National City stock crowded upon them at inflated values. Mr. Mitchell is likewise still the man who unloaded $31,000,000 of worthless Cuban sugar paper on the National City's stockholders. A super-salesman, a go-getter, the beau ideal of the late new era! "Why single out Mitchell?" Mr. Steuer asked repeatedly. Why, indeed? Given his vindication at the hands of the jury, the line between the Mitchells and the rest of the muscle-men of the Street becomes shadowy, almost vanishes. But the Morgans were smarter. Good public-relations counsel has kept them smiling, serene, and sparkling before the public gaze. With similar professional assistance Mr. Mitchell could shortly be reestablished before the world as the patriot, philanthropist, builder, and loving husband whom Mr. Steuer successfully presented to the jury.

THE HORRORS of the overcrowded German prison camps are being intensified as the boundaries of Nazi proscription widen. Social Democrats are being arrested by the hundreds following the dissolution of their political party. In smaller numbers, Catholics also, including priests, are being interned. Stahlhelm leaders are hourly expecting the same fate. Most despicable of all, the wives and children of victims whom the Nazis have been unable to capture are being seized as hostages and subjected to unspeakable cruelties. It is the deliberate purpose to compel the escaped refugees to return from the countries to which they have fled and submit to whatever outrages the Hitlerites hold in store. Meanwhile, every act of the National Socialists belies the alleged pacific intent of Hitler's recently declared foreign policy. The deliberate attempt to seize Austria by bombing and violence has been checkmated, temporarily at least, by the stern measures of Chancellor Dollfuss. A mythical air raid of anti-German propaganda airplanes dropping "disparaging" leaflets has been widely publicized by the servile press to bolster up German demands for an air fleet. The Prussian Ministry of Justice has decreed that judges are henceforth to engage in service in military camps to train them in martial pursuits. Abstract justice is abolished; Nazi patriotism and Nazi philosophy will determine judicial decisions. Within the Reich the Protestant church has fallen before the Hitler policy of leveling, and the newly inducted choice of the clergy, Bishop von Bodelschwing, has been forced to doff his miter. The new Nazi doctrine with respect to women demands that they retire from all forms of professional or commercial activity to the traditional sphere of "church, children, and kitchen," and devote themselves exclusively to child-bearing. The future of the Teuton-Aryan race, it is announced, calls for a family of five children as a normal unit. Meanwhile the propaganda for increased armament proceeds unabated. The old cry, "He who is not for us is against us," has become the watchword to destroy the livelihoods of all those who are not militant Nazis. "A ruthless and brutal cleaning up in shops and offices" is called for by Dr. Robert Ley, leader of the German labor front. All the standards that civilization had painstakingly erected are being uprooted. As Hamilton Fish Armstrong points out in a comprehensive summary in the current Foreign Affairs, the young Nazis today make a virtue of being ignorant and of despising the skill and attainments which generations of German culture slowly achieved.

THE OUTCRY of German officials over anti-German propaganda has its amusing corollary in the pro-Nazi agitation in this and other countries. Thus Bernard Ridder, one of the owners of the New York Staats-Zeitung, the Journal of Commerce, and other newspapers in this country, returned from Germany recently with the astounding news that Hitler, "when coming into power, found 62 per cent of all governmental offices filled with Jews." At the time of the 1930 census Germany had a Jewish population of 560,000, not quite 1 per cent of the total population of the country. According to the "Statistische Jahrbuch," the German Reich, including state and municipal governments, employs 970,000 salaried officials. This would mean, if what Mr. Ridder says is true, that 601,400 Jews, or more than 40,000 more than there were Jewish men, women, and children in the Reich in 1930, were in public positions when Hitler came to power. As to Mr. Ridder's assurance that the persecution of the Jew in the Fatherland is subsiding, we call attention to a circular letter sent out by the government to all postmasters demanding reports on the life history of every postal employee, with special attention to racial origin to the third degree. The implication is plain, especially when we recall that five Jews in high positions in the German postal system recently have received their discharge.

THE ASTOUNDING DECISION of the Swiss government to expel the international secretary of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom is a challenge to the peace movement that cannot be ignored. Madame Brevet must leave the country before July 14, the government has declared, because she is a "revolutionary propagandist" and an anti-militarist! Her revolutionary propaganda seems to have consisted mostly in getting before the world the horrible facts of the killing of thirteen workers and the wounding of sixty others by Swiss troops who shot into an unarmed crowd of demonstrators in Geneva on November 9 of last year. But she is also being expelled as an anti-militarist. This can only be because of her connection with the Women's International League. It is obvious that if Madame Brevet can be deported for anti-militarism, no one can safely work for peace in Geneva. (A Swiss citizen would face jail instead of deportation under the same circumstances.) And if the world peace movement is not to be permitted to center its activities in Geneva, the seat of the League of Nations and the disarmament conference, its effectiveness will be immeasurably impaired. The upsurge of Swiss nationalism and militarism, of which the November 9 massacre was only a single manifestation, appears to be bent on destroying not only Switzerland's ancient tradition of freedom but the world peace movement as well. The news from Germany, though hardly surprising, is no less ominous. Emma Machenauer, head of the Munich section of the Women's International League, was arrested by Nazi auxiliary police a few days ago and since then has disappeared. Efforts to find her have failed. Another officer of the Munich section, Princess Juliana zu Stolberg, was also arrested and is now under guard in a hospital to which she was taken from a sickbed at home. The residences of both Fräulein Machenauer and Princess Juliana are now being used as living quarters by the Nazis. Anti-militarists in this country must awaken to the significance of these developments before the black reaction against the peace movement sweeps over the entire world.

THE RADICAL CAUSE has lost two women leaders in the death almost at the same time of Clara Zetkin and Rose Pastor Stokes. A life of victorious achievement ending in heart-rending defeat—that is the tragedy of Clara Zetkin. For fifty years she stood in the forefront of the German Socialist movement and saw it grow from small beginnings into the largest and most influential labor movement of the world. Shoulder to shoulder with Karl Kautsky, August Bebel, and Rosa Luxemburg, she fought against Edward Bernstein's revisionism for a revolutionary Marxian conception, only to see the trade-union and political movements of German labor succumb to opportunistic reform. In 1914 she opposed Socialist support of imperialist war and, with Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, was among the first to be imprisoned. Parting with Karl Kautsky, who had been her idol and political mentor for more than a generation, she joined the Communist Party and remained from that time on one of the outstanding figures in the Third International. The last years of her life, years of physical suffering and invalidism, were spent in Moscow, where she was worshiped by the masses as the one monument that remained of the glorious past of the international labor movement. She was one of the most impressive speakers and clearest writers that the German revolutionary movement produced, one who did the work of the movement and left it to others to write its songs. Rose Pastor, once a cigarette-factory worker, came into the limelight through her marriage to the wealthy J. G. Phelps Stokes and their work together for the American Socialist Party. When America entered the World War Mr. Stokes quit the party and supported the government policy. His wife stuck by her principles, denounced the war, was convicted under the espionage act, and sentenced to ten years in prison. The verdict was set aside on appeal and the case was dropped. The later years of Mrs. Stokes's life were identified with the American Communist Party.

MRS. O. C. A. COMPTON, one of whose sons is a college president and another the famous physicist, has recently received an honorary degree "in motherhood." The incident suggests fascinating possibilities, among which would seem to be the logical necessity of giving a similar degree to the grandmother of the Compton boys—since the mother of a distinguished mother would seem to have the same claim as the mother of a distinguished son. Even this prospect, however, is not so exhilarating as that opened up by a headline in the New York Herald Tribune which states (quite accurately): "Degree Given to Farley for Political Honesty." In sober fact, Sewanee University has made our Postmaster General a Doctor of Civil Law "for conspicuous service to his country as a statesman and for his honesty in the administration of political affairs." We pass over the obvious fact that the authorities at Sewanee do not assume that "conspicuous service to his country as a statesman" necessarily implies "honesty in the administration of political affairs." But has virtue become so rare that persons are henceforth to be given marks of distinction for not being crooks? Must we erect a statue to the grocer who does not put sand in his sugar and give little Johnny a double star on his report card for not murdering his grandmother?

CAREFUL READING of the long dispatch displayed in two-column type under a six-column head on the front page of the Scripps-Howard World-Telegram, "copyright in all countries" by the United Press, leaves us with the firm conviction that Mr. Roy Howard was received by Hirohito, Emperor of Japan, and that it was an important day in the life of His Imperial Majesty.

To Save the Conference

IF, as now seems extremely probable, the World Economic Conference should end in almost complete failure, the United States will enjoy the dubious distinction of having done more to bring about its collapse than any other nation.

Three major objectives were possible for such a conference: the adjustment of war debts, the return of stabilized currencies, and the downward revision of tariff and other trade barriers. The first we specifically excluded from discussion even before the conference opened. The second we refused to discuss as "untimely" as soon as the conference got under way. The third Secretary Hull has proposed in general terms; but our delegates have been given no real authority to agree to a reduction of American tariffs even if they wanted to, and the whole attitude of the Moley wing of the Administration makes it improbable that they will even recommend such a course in concrete terms. Small wonder that the French press asks why we wanted to participate in the first place.

The Administration's belief that it would be untimely to agree to any stabilization of the dollar now is due mainly to a lack of monetary understanding. It wishes, naturally and justifiably, to establish and maintain a higher American wholesale price level than that now prevailing. But it seems to be under two or three false impressions. One is that "stabilization" means either agreement to return to the former gold parity or, at best, adherence to the present discount from gold parity of less than 20 per cent. Stabilization need mean neither of these things. In so far as it is possible to control the price level from the side of money rather than that of goods, the promptest, surest, safest way is through a return to free gold convertibility at a reduction in the gold content of the dollar. It is just possible for us to decide now what price level we want as it will ever be. If we want a price level, say, about 10 to 15 per cent below that prevailing in 1926, then the most probable way of reaching it would be by the reduction of the former gold content of the dollar by 25 to 30 per cent. The Administration seems to be going ahead on the strange supposition that monetary uncertainty is more likely to bring a vigorous advance of prices and a confident resumption of business activity than monetary certainty is. The truth, it need hardly be said, is precisely the opposite.

As long as no agreement on currency stabilization exists, it does not seem probable that any tariff agreement can be obtained. The gold-standard countries will quite naturally refuse to agree to reduce or even not to raise their tariff walls as long as they fear that these tariff walls may be scaled by further currency depreciation. Even apart from this particular obstacle, however, the prospects for real tariff reduction are almost negligible. In their intellectual panic, the statesmen of the world have returned to all the foreign-trade fallacies and policies of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, and so far as they are concerned, five generations of economists might just as well never have written. They see clearly enough that the tariffs erected by other nations help to produce a depression in their own country, but hardly any of them recognize that the tariffs they themselves erect injure their own people quite as much as they injure the rest of the world. Because it seems so impossible to rid them of these fallacies in the immediate future, The Nation ventures to propose a plan which might save the conference by offering some measure of temporary relief to a throttled international trade, while it would also provide the world with a desperately needed education in the inevitable two-sidedness of that trade.

The plan, briefly, calls for the establishment of an International Barter Corporation. It presupposes, as part of a general agreement, reasonably stabilized currencies and a continuation of the existing tariff truce. A branch of the corporation would be established in every country that became a member. It would admit goods into that country free of duty provided that the exporting country took an equivalent amount of goods from the importing country. Let us assume, for example, that the two countries are the United States and France, and let us say that France has shoes to sell to the United States. We may take shoes as the example because this is one of the products with which, it is alleged, we would be "flooded" if we reduced our tariff wall. (The fact is, however, that in spite of our higher wage levels we somehow managed to export about $1,500,000 worth of shoes last year against about $2,000,000 worth of shoe imports.)

If a French manufacturer had $100,000 worth of shoes to sell to the United States, these shoes would be admitted through the Barter Corporation provided a French importer at the same time were taking $100,000 worth of, say, American wheat. If American shoe manufacturers complained about the import of French shoes, the complaint, instead of being forwarded to Congress, would be forwarded to the wheat exporter. If he preferred to hurt his own business rather than the shoe manufacturer's, he could forgo his sale of wheat. The corporation, in short, would dramatize the fact that whenever imports are prohibited by artificial barriers, some American exporter's ox is gored. In each case, with the barter plan established, some specific American exporter would be able to see just what the American tariff wall had been doing to him. Every time we forbid imports from foreign countries we forbid an equal amount of American exports to foreign countries; for now that we have stopped loans, new exports can be paid for only out of the credits built up by new imports. To strike at our export trade, as our high tariff does, would be tolerable only if we had not through generations built up an economy in which many of our industries are expanded to take care of an export market: we normally sell abroad, for example, 55 per cent of our cotton, 18 per cent of our wheat, 36 per cent of our copper, 40 per cent of our typewriters, 30 per cent of our printing machinery, 14 per cent of our automobiles, and so on. When we kill our export trade, we throw out of employment the workers previously engaged in it. The people who remark that our export trade is "only 10 per cent" of our total trade, and therefore not important, or who separate "domestic recovery" from international co-operation, miss the whole significance of the problem which is involved.

A barter corporation such as that proposed would afford only a mild relief. Once it was established, it might begin to allow for triangular barter, instead of direct barter between two countries, and it could permit the building up of short-term credits and debits. The only solution ultimately possible, of course, would be the much simpler one of a reduction of tariff barriers. But meanwhile the corporation would be performing daily and dramatically that educational work without which tariff reduction seems impossible.

President Roosevelt's Appointments

THE success of President Roosevelt's far-reaching program depends on the way it is carried out. Legislation, it is almost axiomatic to assert, can be no better than those intrusted with its administration. The character of Mr. Roosevelt's appointments is therefore of the utmost importance in the execution of his policies and for the attainment of the hoped-for reconstruction. What is their character? Many have been excellent, and it is regrettable that the high standards set in them have not been more widely applied. As it is, a greater disparity exists in the quality of the Roosevelt appointees than in those of any other recent Administration.

The Nation found occasion to praise Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet highly. We deemed particularly good the choice of Thomas J. Walsh, Harold L. Ickes, Henry A. Wallace, and Frances Perkins. The appointment of Mr. Woodin as Secretary of the Treasury we declared most unfortunate, a view which the lapse of time has not altered. Mr. Walsh's death was an irreparable loss to the Department of Justice. Homer S. Cummings, appointed in his place, with no similar record of stern rectitude, has nevertheless had the opportunity to prove his worth.

We hoped he aspired to fill Mr. Walsh's shoes and were inclined to give him the benefit of every doubt, but up to now his record has been most disappointing. The next most important appointment in the Department of Justice, that of Solicitor General, went to James Crawford Biggs. In fairness to President Roosevelt it should be stated that this post had previously been offered to two supremely qualified men, both of whom found themselves unable to accept it. But why not continue to nominate such men? Plenty of other good timber was available. Mr. Biggs, a political appointee, worked closely with J. Mitchell Palmer in the days of the infamous red raids. A stenographic transcript of the testimony taken in the Teapot Dome investigation showed that he was inclined to favor the Southern Pacific Railway and other corporate interests ■ against the public welfare. He was one of the supporters of Judge John J. Parker, whom President Hoover sought unsuccessfully to elevate to the Supreme Court.

At the request of the patronage boss of the Administration, Postmaster General Farley, Mr. Cummings accepted as Assistant Attorney General ■ second-rate lawyer from Oklahoma, Patrick Malloy, whom Secretary Ickes had rejected as Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Farley sought to place Mr. Malloy somewhere, and finally got him into the Department of Justice. The failure to name first-rate assistants, the acceptance of men who are either political appointees or suspect on account of their past sympathy for vested interests, have characterized Mr. Cummings's four months' tenure as Attorney General. The "malefactors of great wealth" may breathe easy. There is no new deal here.

Nor do the appointments in the fiscal departments of the government, from Secretary Woodin down, inspire much confidence. Mr. Woodin's connections with the house of Morgan have already been amply aired. With respect to Dean Acheson, Under Secretary of the Treasury, it should be pointed out that the principal partner of his law firm appeared as personal attorney for Charles E. Mitchell before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, and that his firm handled ■ great deal of the Morgan business in Washington.

The Commissionership of Internal Revenue, in view of the flagrant tax evasions of recent years, is an extremely important post. Guy T. Helvering's appointment to it is thoroughly bad. After his record had been aired in the Senate, such conscientious Senators as Borah, Couzens, Cutting, La Follette, Norris, and Walsh were among those to vote against confirmation. But the party steam roller triumphed. The appointment, like that of M. S. Szymczak of Chicago to the Federal Reserve Board, is purely political. Lewis Douglas, Director of the Budget, is an efficient young man, highly conscious of his merits, whose economic philosophy closely resembles that of Ogden Mills. If either he or the benevolent Barney Baruch succeeds Mr. Woodin, Wall Street will continue to deem the Administration "sound."

As one inspects the new administrative personnel, the uniformly bad appointments in the Department of Justice, the none-too-good appointments in the Department of the Treasury, the varyingly good and bad appointments elsewhere, one contrasts them with the superb determination of Secretary Ickes to make the Department of the Interior excellent from top to bottom. There will be no collusion, no alienation of the public domain, no pillage in that department, in which for so long betrayal of the public interest in behalf of powerful private interests has been the rule. Theodore A. Walters, First Assistant Secretary; Oscar L. Chapman, Second Assistant Secretary; Harry Slattery, personal assistant to Mr. Ickes; Nathan R. Margold, Solicitor; John Collier, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Louis R. Glavis, head of the department's Division of Investigations—these are public servants in the best sense of the word, vigilant, devoted, able, enlightened.

Servants of the same high type are to be found elsewhere. Secretary Wallace's department ranks high with Rexford G. Tugwell ■ Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. Jerome Frank, counsel for the administration of the agricultural-relief bill, has called first-rate younger lawyers to collaborate with him, ■ have also Mr. Margold in the Interior and Charles Wyzanski in the Labor Department—such aids are important in the erection of ■ sound administrative structure. It is heartening to find men of such high caliber as Arthur E. Morgan, president of Antioch College, and David E. Lilienthal as directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The latter's service on the Wisconsin Railroad Commission has established him ■ one of the outstanding public-utility authorities in the country. The appointment of Joseph B. Eastman of the Interstate Commerce Commission as Federal Rail Coordinator cannot be praised too highly. Among those called in to collaborate in the Industrial Recovery Act, the Home Loan Board, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, such men as Leo Wolman, John H. Fahey, Sidney Hillman, Louis E. Kirstein, and John J. Blaine inspire confidence.

In the Department of State we may count, despite their limited experience in foreign affairs, on the high purpose and integrity of Secretary Cordell Hull and Assistant Secretary Moley. The diplomatic appointments show the usual variation between good and bad, with mediocrities preponderating. Professor Dodd's appointment to Germany, Sumner Welles's to Cuba, Mrs. Ruth Bryan Owen's to Denmark may be praised. Less can be said for the rest. The appointment of Robert H. Gore, Florida newspaper-chain publisher, as governor of Puerto Rico is deplorable. He "wanted something else"—as ■ reward for early Roosevelt support—but "was given Puerto Rico." It is time to stop making that unhappy province, whose high hopes of progress and plenty under the Stars and Stripes have been betrayed, a football of political spoilsmanship. An excellent candidate, ■ native of Puerto Rico educated in the United States, was available in Martin Travieso. At least, someone conversant with Hispanic culture should have been appointed. Latin American affairs, incidentally, need to be placed in competent and sympathetic hands. At present no Assistant Secretary fills this bill.

It is too early to give a final judgment on the Department of Commerce. John Dickinson, Assistant Secretary, has much to recommend him, but it remains to be seen whether he will merely be an echo of his chief, Mr. Roper, and complacent to the demands of big business. Mr. Roper seems to be afflicted with the idea that his old associates and friends would make ideal administrators of the supremely important Industrial Recovery Act. The evidence mounts that this part of the reconstruction program, as well as the emergency building program, is to be the happy hunting ground for political spoilsmen. Contracts are being sought and placed through local Democratic leaders back home. Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans are dependent on the O. K. of the local Democratic boss.

The Roosevelt appointments reveal the conflicting interests that coalesced under his banner. There are the high-minded, devoted public servants—starting with the “brain trust.” There are the representatives of vested interests, the practical men who know exactly what their bosses want and how to get it. And there are the political hangers-on, the lame ducks, the hordes of “deserving Democrats,” the nuts and bolts with which Jim Farley is ruthlessly building up a great political machine, with no regard for the public welfare. Mr. Roosevelt, now more than ever, must be vigilant lest his good nature, like Mr. Harding’s, be betrayed by his friends.

Boneheaded Economy

HAVE Americans lost their sense of balance, or are they blinded by the Roosevelt glamor, in that they are able to watch with apparent unconcern the discharge by the federal government of thousands of its faithful regular employees in useful, organized services in order—in order, if you please, to have money with which to hire other unemployed on unorganized projects of frankly “made work” or of problematical usefulness? This creation of one army of unemployed in order to put to work another seems so fantastic outside “Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland” that one could hardly believe it to be true were it not for daily dispatches in the newspapers reciting details of the absurd and cruel program.

In the last few days, for instance, drastic cuts have been made in the work and personnel of the Department of Agriculture, reducing its expenses 37 per cent below those of 1932, as ordered by the little czar of federal economy, Director of the Budget Douglas. Many employees have been sent out to join the ranks of the unemployed, while important scientific and technical work has been dropped, such as the agricultural market news service, regarded as of great value to the farmers for whom the Roosevelt Administration pretends to be so solicitous. While the navy is to be increased by thirty-two new warships at a cost of $238,000,000, in order allegedly to create work for the unemployed, the War Department is discharging 10 per cent of its civilian personnel, numbering nearly 50,000 persons, most of whom are engaged on river and harbor work of presumptive utility. The Bureau of Internal Revenue has discharged 5 per cent of its force, while, among other efforts to economize, the Department of Commerce lately ordered 106 of its European attachés—men with homes on lease and children in school—to sail for America on a week’s notice and join the bread line.

This fantastic exhibition of robbing Peter to pay Paul is a result of the boneheaded policy of economy of the federal government in the face of an unparalleled emergency which called not for a balanced budget but for a large bond issue as during the World War. Instead of cutting expenditures, the full appropriations of 1929 should have been maintained for labor, at least, and if anything increased. The going services of the federal government are predominatingly of recognized usefulness and carried on honestly and economically.

The picture of the government employee as an overpaid drone is a comic-supplement caricature which was never true, less than ever during a generation of rising prices in which increases in federal pay have generally been several jumps behind advances in the cost of living. The Nation advocates a liberal policy of public works but in addition to, not in place of, the regular services of the federal government. Such services provide useful work for both sexes, all ages, and for nearly every kind of ability. New public works, if and when they materialize, will cater to a narrower range of workers, while the projects themselves, although they may prove useful, cannot in most cases qualify as necessities.

It is not too late to rectify, at least in part, the folly of turning regular employees of the federal government out into the streets without jobs in order to have money to relieve the unemployed. The cuts in department appropriations cannot well be restored before another session of Congress, but Mr. Roosevelt can direct that government employees discharged from the regular services because of lack of funds shall have first call on the jobs created by our new machinery for relieving unemployment. It is announced, for instance, that the administration of the Industrial Recovery Act will require some 35,000 persons whose appointment will be in the hands of the party patronage dispenser, Postmaster General Farley. This would mean, in normal course, that the jobs would go to organization Democrats most of whom would not be picked from the unemployed but would be men using their party affiliations to pass from lower- to higher-paid employment. Mr. Roosevelt should see that the victims of his own mistaken policy are cared for ahead of “deserving Democrats.”

We are aware that the industrial depression has cut down work in several government services and left them, until recently, overmanned. But reorganization and redistribution of work could be effected without cutting down the total number of employees. We think, indeed, that the federal departmental organization could be used to give socially useful employment to an increased number of persons. The pay of government employees, it will be recalled, was lately reduced by 15 per cent. It is not unfair that such workers should bear their share of current losses, especially since it was shown at the time the cut was made that living costs had declined 22 per cent since 1928. We should have preferred to see all government salaries cut to a maximum of $10,000 a year, with the 15 per cent reduction applying only to persons actually earning $2,500 or more. As it is, the cut applies even to substitute post-office clerks, who are estimated to be averaging less than $10 a week. We think, too, that the reduction in pay should have been accompanied by a corresponding lessening of hours. This would not only have relieved overmanning in so far as it existed but would have opened places for new workers. It would have been wiser to use the money saved in salary reduction to hire such workers in regularly organized useful service than to spend an equivalent amount on new unemployment-relief schemes of unproved value to the country.

Walter Lippmann

I. "The Great Elucidator"

By AMOS PINCHOT

[Since the creation of an informed public opinion is indispensable to the functioning of democratic government, the factors which tend to mold that opinion require vigilant scrutiny. Walter Lippmann's column in the Herald Tribune is now syndicated to 126 American dailies, including newspapers in Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Philippines, with a total circulation of 8,000,000, and is further reprinted abroad. Mr. Lippmann is probably the most influential journalist of our time. Mr. Pinchot's analysis of Mr. Lippmann as publicist and interpreter of events is, therefore, in this period of great social change, pertinent and useful.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

IN discussing Walter Lippmann I confess that I approach my subject with a feeling of awe. Success in any case is impressive; eminency is still more so. And yet, when there pass before my mind's eye those hordes of good people who read Mr. Lippmann in 126 daily newspapers and agree with him almost as regularly as the sun rises, I find myself not quite sure that in the "Man with the Flashlight Mind, the Great Elucidator," as the Herald Tribune calls him in its promotion pamphlet, America has at last produced a great publicist.

But whether great or not, Mr. Lippmann is certainly a distinguished writer. The best style, said Matthew Arnold, is one that gives the impression of speech at considered leisure. I think Mr. Lippmann has such a style. It is simple; yet it is assured. It carries conviction by its temperance and quiet authority. Moreover, Mr. Lippman is an earnest writer, whose gaze never roves for an instant from the moral values.

Nevertheless, as I reread "Drift and Mastery" (1914) and "A Preface to Morals" (1929), which are perhaps his two most important books, and as I read the expression of his philosophy in his "Today and Tomorrow" in the Herald Tribune, with attention to substance rather than to form, and separating as far as I can the thought from the grace of the words that contain it, I find myself disappointed. I find myself questioning the quality of his thinking. I inquire whether his popularity is not, after all, a much a commentary on his devoted followers as on himself. I ask whether, despite the excellence of his language, he is not telling his flock substantially what it wants to hear—in fact, what it has already heard on the piazza of the country club. And I speculate whether, with all his talents, Walter Lippmann has not sacrificed a rather fine future for a successful present.

It takes a long while to establish the rank of a writer. This is especially true if the writer happens to be a publicist. For, in addition to writing well, he must inform himself well. He must make shrewd deductions which only time can test. Does time seem to prove Mr. Lippmann's deductions, or, on the contrary, does it disprove them? Is he an informed person, or is his unusual erudition literary rather than factual, and therefore of comparatively little help in his role of publicist? As a writer on politics and economics does he go to the sources of things? Does he know his facts, or does he form his ideas, not from facts, but from other people's opinions about them? And above all, has he the liberal and democratic point of view? Or, despite what amounts almost to a genius for never quite saying the thing, is he the prophet, the avant-coureur, of big-business fascism?

Mr. Lippmann would no doubt be shocked at the thought that he is a salesman of plutocracy. Doubtless he could point to innumerable passages in his writings that refute any such contention. Not the least of the benefits of reading Mr. Lippmann is that he can be quoted on either side of almost any question. Like the Bible in this respect, one can turn to his new testament and prove that God is love, or to his old testament and show that He is hate and vengeance. Or one can discover by later authoritative gospel that, equally removed from love and hate, God is disinterestedness. As a commentator on politics and economics—who writes, as the Herald Tribune pamphlet tells us, in a sound-proof penthouse studio where "autographed portraits" of Thomas Cochran of J. P. Morgan and Company and the British Ambassador look down from the wall—just who are Mr. Lippmann's gods?

In "Drift and Mastery," which deals mainly with politics and economics in the era immediately preceding the World War, Mr. Lippmann makes his answers to such questions. He points out, first, that the cloven hoof of big business is, after all, something of an illusion, and that in the leaders of the great trusts and banking houses our country has a group of administrators fitted by ideology and training for the highest responsibilities; and, second, that there exists in the higher regions of big business a regenerative, self-rectifying principle that combats greed and makes for the subordination of sordid to enlightened aims.

In order that this regenerative principle shall function freely in the public interest, Mr. Lippmann holds that we should protect big business on the one hand from overzealous muckraking and on the other from unwise government interference. It is true, he concedes, that the muckrakers have in the past been useful in awakening the country to real evils in the economic system. But they have gone too far. "Big Business and its ruthless tentacles," he writes, "have become the material for the feverish fantasy of illiterate thousands thrown out of kilter by the rack and strain of modern life." Mischievous nonsense is being spread in regard to the power of "men like Morgan and Rockefeller," which "ten minutes of cold sanity would reduce to a barbarous myth." The very magnitude of the problems involved in the administration of great corporations has disquieted those who do not realize that their "administration is becoming an applied science." Even so able a thinker as Louis Brandeis, he complains, has "turned against the modern trust," has "turned decentralizer." And as for Woodrow Wilson—"He becomes quite reckless in his denunciation of the New Devil—Monopoly."

In "Drift and Mastery" Mr. Lippmann does not write with the pontifical authority he attains fifteen years later in "A Preface to Morals." But he argues with his usual clarity that large mergers like the Steel Corporation, which, in his writings, invariably wears the halo of the good trust, are now being conducted as public rather than private institutions. He chides his erstwhile friends, to whom he refers with scant patience as "amateur Socialists," for continuing to urge nationalization of our big industries. For, says he, they are already nationalized in effect, though still nominally private property. So that now (1914) "there is no very essential difference between holding the securities of the steel trust and those of the United States government."

Mr. Lippmann finds "a widespread rebellion against the profit motive." And this rebellion, extending to big business, is creating new incentives and a new point of view. "No doubt," he admits, "there are trusts badly administered. No doubt there are inflated monopolies created for purely financial reasons." But the men at the head of big business are "revolutionizing the discipline, the incentives, and the vision of the business world." And "the real news about business, it seems to me, is that it is being administered by men who are not profiteers. The managers are on salary, divorced from ownership and from bargaining. They represent the revolution in business incentives at its very heart. For they conduct gigantic enterprises and they stand outside the higgling of the market, outside the shrewdness and strategy of competition. The motive of profit is not their personal motive. That is an astounding change."

Harking back to Mr. Morgan's Steel Corporation, Mr. Lippmann finds it notable not merely for its public spirit, but also for its efficiency. Indeed, it is so efficient that its autocratic methods of administration might well be adopted by the government. "If the steel trust is efficient," he writes, "it is not due to the existence of its 200,000 stockholders. It is due to the fact that the management is autocratic, that administrators are highly paid and given power adequate to their responsibility. When governments are willing to pursue that course, they can be just as efficient as private management." And again: "It is obvious," he says, "that the trusts have created a demand for a new type of business man—for a man whose motives resemble those of the applied scientist and whose responsibility is that of a public servant."

And having invested the industrial corporations with an odor of sanctity, he then turns to the bankers and sprays them with the same precious incense, designating them as "investment experts." "In the great industries," he writes, "it is important to notice that with the diminishing importance of ownership the control has passed for the time being into the hands of investment experts, the banking interests."

For these conclusions, and more like them, Mr. Lippmann offers no premises. They are, of course, egregious nonsense, flatly contradicted by the facts, but nonsense so persuasively stated as to sound convincing even while it outrages one's intelligence. But what is most astounding about his thesis of the regeneration of big business is that, at the moment when he wrote "Drift and Mastery," as luck would have it, there had just been completed a series of investigations which, had he taken the trouble to follow them, would have shown him not merely that no regeneration existed, but that big business, drunk with stock-jobbing and monopoly profits, was entering upon the wild debauch of profiteering that reached its climax in 1929.

In the winter of 1911 and 1912 a committee of the House of Representatives, headed by Augustus O. Stanley, later United States Senator from Kentucky, and assisted by Louis D. Brandeis, spread on a record of 5,594 pages the story of the formation, policies, and administration of the particular trust that, first in "Drift and Mastery" and later in "A Preface to Morals," Mr. Lippmann held aloft as a shining example of what a corporation ought to be. The evidence, which was based on the trust's own records, and on the testimony of its officers, directors, accountants, and engineers, was condensed and printed in a clear, readable report of two hundred pages. From the so-called Stanley report, which he could have had at the cost of a letter to his Congressman, Mr. Lippmann might have learned that for their services in organizing the United States Steel Corporation and floating its billion-dollar issue of common stock (which had no actual value, since the bond issue and the preferred stock more than equaled its assets) the underwriters and promoters, headed by Morgan, received stock of the par value of $130,000,000, which they proceeded to sell to a confiding public at a cash profit, above all expenses, of $62,500,000. In the nine years covered by the Stanley inquiry the trust netted an annual profit of 40 per cent on the cost of production on every pound of metal it sold. In 1914, when "Drift and Mastery" appeared, its earnings applicable to dividends on the common stock were $23,496,768. By 1917 its net earnings rose to just under half a billion, largely as the result of cold-blooded extortion in the sale of war supplies to the French and English governments, for which J. P. Morgan and Company was fiscal agent.

Meantime, as the enlightened administrators held up the price of steel with one hand, they held down labor charges with the other, underpaying their men, crushing their every attempt to organize and better the almost subhuman conditions under which they lived; working 50,000 employees twelve hours a day and from seventy-two to eighty-four hours a week—the average working week for similar labor in the English steel industry being fifty-four hours. Incidentally, by 1919, as admitted by Gary on the stand, the number of twelve-hour men had increased to 69,000.

On January 30, 1912, Mr. Brandeis testified before the Stanley committee as follows:

I say these are conditions which have driven out American labor; and the most important thing I want to impress upon you in regard to that is not merely the long hours or the low wages, but it is that it has been and is attended with conditions of repression the like of which you cannot find, I believe, this side of Russia.

As shedding light on Mr. Lippmann's statement that the trusts were being "administered by men who are not profiteers," in 1902 the Steel Corporation organized the Union Supply Company, a chain store dealing almost wholly with its own employees. With a capitalization of $500,000, it declared dividends as follows:

1903.....	$250,000	1907.....	$500,000
1904.....	250,000	1908.....	320,000
1905.....	405,000	1909.....	440,000
1906.....	805,000	1910.....	520,000

In order to protect from political attacks the railroad and raw-material differentials with which Morgan and Gary destroyed competition and raised prices, the Morgan interests went heavily into politics. In 1914 I had occasion to visit nine steel towns in the heart of the Morgan empire in Pennsylvania. I shall never forget the poverty and squalor in that God-forsaken region—the huge, sprawling plants, the unbelievably forlorn habitations. Boise Penrose was running for reelection. On the Thursday before election day I saw 5,000 men discharged from one plant, with the admonition, given them by the foreman at the gate, that unless Senator Penrose were returned, the plant would stay closed indefinitely.

Control of the executive branch of the government was, however, the main objective of the Morgan strategy, which at this time was directed to shielding the steel monopoly from federal interference. Consequently, the Cabinet and various key offices were duly packed, and the White House was surrounded, with friends and attorneys of Morgan and Company. In the Roosevelt and Taft regimes, when the big money was in steel—just as it was in oil in Harding's time and in utilities in Hoover's—Elihu Root, former attorney of the Carnegie Company, a subsidiary of the Steel Corporation, was Secretary of State. George W. Wickersham, formerly attorney of the Steel Corporation was Attorney-General. Truman Newberry, president of a subsidiary of the Steel Corporation, was Secretary of the Navy, an important post in steel politics. Herbert Satterlee, son-in-law of Mr. Morgan, was Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Robert Bacon, Mr. Morgan's partner and director of the Steel Corporation, was Secretary of State. Philander Knox, attorney of the Steel Corporation, was Attorney-General and later Secretary of State. Judge Gary, chairman of the executive committee of the Steel Corporation and Mr. Morgan's factotum, as the Tarbell biography discloses, was confidential adviser to the White House on economic matters.

In the interim—as Mr. Lippmann in his capacity of publicist should certainly have known—substantially what Brandeis and Stanley found in the Morgan territory of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Minnesota, and Alabama, Edward P. Costigan, then a Denver lawyer, now United States Senator, was discovering as counsel in the Congressional inquiry into the Rockefeller hegemony in Colorado. Robert F. Wagner, then State Senator at Albany, now United States Senator, was meanwhile delving into the medieval labor conditions in the harvester trust, the preliminary report of his commission having been published in 1912.

The facts developed by these inquiries and a dozen similar ones—including the investigation into the Morgan-Guggenheim attempt to gain, by fraudulent entries, a monopoly of the high-grade coal deposits of Alaska, which was blocked by Gifford Pinchot, Brandeis, and Glavis—pitilessly contradicted Mr. Lippmann's thesis of a regenerate big business. They showed that, instead of upward, the trend was strongly downward; that with a few honorable exceptions the administrators were comporting themselves with the avidity of pigs in clover. Is it conceivable that our Elucidator wrote, first, "Drift and Mastery" and then "A Preface to Morals" in ignorance of this mass of available evidence? Or, on the contrary, was he writing with full knowledge, and in a conscious effort to offset its effect?

Turning for a moment to "A Preface to Morals," we find in the eleventh and twelfth chapters, respectively entitled The Cure of Souls and The Business of the Great Society, the passages which carry forward Mr. Lippmann's 1914 brief for big business perhaps as well as anything he has written. It can be shown, the thread of his argument runs, that the qualities which civilized men agree to call virtues "have disinterestedness as their inner principle." Men have virtue in so far as they hold themselves to an ideal of conduct, however "inconvenient, unprofitable, or dangerous it may be to do so." Escape from the perplexities of modern life lies, therefore, along the path of disinterestedness.

The cardinal virtues, however, and especially this greatest virtue, disinterestedness, do not thrive "unless events conspire" to drive us toward them. But luckily the progress of science, and especially the discipline involved in the scientific method used by great corporations, is forcing big business to the disinterested point of view, weaning it from its past acquisitiveness to a social state of mind. "Great corporations," he points out, "have established laboratories of their own, not merely for the perfecting of their own processes, but for the promotion of pure research." The scientific method "provides a body in which the spirit of disinterestedness can live." The universities have done the same. The insight of a high religion, "which moves mankind more profoundly than anything else in human affairs," is made available by the coming of the scientific method. "Therefore, what was once a personal attitude on the part of a few who were somewhat withdrawn and disregarded has become the central principle in the careers of innumerable, immensely influential, men."

With an array of citations from foreign commentators—Graham Wallas, Buffon, Adam Smith, Ruskin, Morris, Maynard Keynes—but with never a word from anyone with a notion of what is going on in America, Mr. Lippmann then works his way to his grand denouement, which he reaches in a glow of fervor in the last section of the twelfth chapter, entitled Ideals. But, gentle reader, do not let your hopes of the denouement rise too high. For it proves a rather tame rehash of his 1914 glorification of Wall Street, with the difference that, to his honor roll of the regenerate, he now adds the banks, the insurance companies, and the General Electric Company.

When the machine technology is really advanced, that is to say, when it has drawn great masses of men within the orbit of its influence, when a corporation has become really great, the old distinction between public and private interest becomes very dim. I think it is destined largely to disappear. It is difficult even today to say whether the great railways, the General Electric Company, the United States Steel Corporation, the bigger insurance companies and banks are public or private institutions.

The fact that Mr. Lippmann should choose, as an example of a disinterested corporation, the General Electric Company, which by 1929 had become the heart and soul of the Morgan utility power, is, let us hope, but additional evidence of his talent for preserving his theories from the contamination of facts; since, for scientific extortion, for remarkably successful assaults on the integrity of government, as well as on education and the press, for reckless financing and huge profits for the insiders, raked in to the accompaniment of peculiarly disgusting and untruthful "service talk," the story of the utilities presided over in part by the high command of General Electric rather more than equals anything in business annals. Even the halcyon days when Fiske, Gould, and Huntington built their fortunes on the wreck of the railroads could boast nothing quite so raw. For the industrial buccaneers of the nineteenth century at least had the grace to refrain from sanctimony.

And yet Mr. Lippmann writes his high romance of industrialism with such gentle zeal, and in such sound yet melodious prose, that to the uninformed reader even the General Electric becomes proof that with Morgan in the heavens all's well with the world.

Why Mr. Lippmann wrote as he did, in the face of all that was known and knowable about a subject with which he dealt extensively in two books separated by a fifteen-year interval, is a mystery which would perhaps have remained unsolved had he not solved it himself in the opening pages of "Drift and Mastery," in what I believe is one of the strangest passages ever penned by a man whose business is admittedly to advise the public on matters economic and political. Turning to pages 6 and 7, we find that, though aware of the existence of the investigations, he considers the task of "trying to classify" them, as a preparation to writing his book, to be an impossible and useless one. "A mere list of investigations would fill this book, and I abandoned the attempt with the mental reservation that if anyone really desired that kind of proof, a few German scholars, young and in perfect health, should be imported to furnish it." In other words, the facts being antipathetic to his thesis, he waves them aside with a gesture of contempt. Thus, by his own account, at the very outset of his inquiry, he rejects his authentic sources of information, and abandons the scientific method which he hails throughout his books as the unique regenerative agent of the modern world.

However, that Mr. Lippmann spurns the scientific spirit, and with it the services of the healthy German boys, is of no great importance. Nor does it matter that, once a votary in the house of Marx, our Elucidator now worships in the house of Morgan. Nor is it strange that, being a rather suggestible person and having no compass of his own, Mr. Lippmann should have been steered into port by the captains of big business. "Big business has always respected Mr. Lippmann's utterances," said Mr. Thomas Lamont, in proposing a resolution expressing gratitude for Mr. Lippmann's public services at the dinner of the Academy of Political Science on March 25, 1931. "They have always been constructive. He has those rare qualities of investigation and judgment."

But what matters, I think, is that, inconsequential as his writings appear to people who understand the political and economic structure, the illusion of intellectuality which they produce, largely by references to irrelevant authorities but partly by a good journalistic technique, causes him to be regarded by unthinking people as a seer whose lips are wet with water from the well of truth. Again—and this is perhaps the chief objection to be urged against Mr. Lippmann as a publicist—though he maintains a certain footing as a liberal by being on the popular side of such adjudicated issues as collective bargaining, the Ku Klux Klan, the bonus, and economy in government, the general message of his writings is neither liberal nor democratic. Their effect is to counteract the efforts of the men and women of good-will who, under heavy enough difficulties it must be admitted, are trying to check plutocracy's advance and bring into American life a saner division of power and a more decent distribution of wealth and opportunity.

In effect, Mr. Lippmann warns his readers not to listen to such people. He warns them that their criticisms and exposures of big business are exaggerated and on the whole unwarranted. How, indeed, could they be otherwise if, as Mr. Lippmann tells us, big business is in the hands of disinterested men inspired by the religion of science? He tells us, in effect, that there is no cause for anxiety, no need for worry, for effort, for struggle. Big business is taking care of things for all of us. Let us suspend judgment. Let us wait; let us learn. Let us remain calmly above the battle.

Mr. Lippmann thinks as if we had an eternity of time. He writes as though there were no hungry people in the world. He writes as though the privileged class in this country were ready to take its responsibilities seriously, and seriously become the friends and shepherds of the people; and as if this were a desirable consummation. And consistently he denies what is axiomatic, and I fear long will be so, that is, that the only way to advance toward what he calls the Great Society lies in recognizing the problem that confronts us in plutocracy; in seeing big business for what it is, namely, a cynical money-making machine; in destroying the privileges that sustain its power, and in forcing it to behave by the strength of law and the scourge of public opinion.

Sometimes I reread Ignatius Donnelly's fascinating book about the lost continent of Atlantis. According to Donnelly's theory, for which, it must be confessed, he adduces considerable proof, the gods of ancient mythology were once men and women. They were the captains of finance and industry, the aristocracy and outstanding citizens of the kingdom of Atlantis. And when that unfortunate land sank into the sea leaving only the tips of its mountains, the Azores, to mark its place, the personalities and achievements of these eminent citizens, plus the magic action of time, raised them to divinity, for the worship of credulous peoples to come. Jupiter was perhaps a distinguished figure in politics; Vulcan, a noted ironmaster; Neptune, the leading spirit in the merchant marine; Mercury, head of the intercommunication and utility trust; Venus, the hostess of a smart speakeasy; Orpheus, possibly an inspired pastor who, like Dr. Guthrie of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, inaugurated an aesthetic ritual of dance and song.

Even until today, though Atlantis is gone, the Atlantean impulse persists, according to Donnelly, in certain animals of the lesser order, especially the leamings. These trusting rodents still swim out from the mainland, and searching for the lost continent and its dead divinities, drown in their fruitless quest.

And so, out of his heroes of Wall Street—an Atlantis which, if sinkable, is at least not quite sunk—Mr. Lippmann creates his own theogony, with Mr. Lamont and Mr. Morgan sitting on the peak of Olympus, and his lesser gods taking their proper and respective places on the Olympian slope.

That the panic and the great deflation have likewise deflated Mr. Lippmann's theogony, restoring its members to human shape almost before divinity had set in, is not Mr. Lippmann's fault. It is but another proof of his shockingly bad luck. Here he has his batch of hero-gods, all baked and ready for the market, and along comes the depression—and alas, at what price can he peddle them now?

[The second article in the series on Mr. Lippmann, entitled "The New Tammany," will appear in the next issue.]

Government Without Congress

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, June 24

TO a judicious observer it would seem that the Administration is deliberately maneuvering toward a point where it will dust off its hands and say to the nations of the earth: "Now you can all go to hell!" Recent events in Washington and London are hardly open to any other interpretation. All the tangible evidence not only says that we are steering toward a policy of economic nationalism, coupled with naval and military preparedness, but says that Roosevelt has believed from the start that such a policy was inevitable. Our crisp refusal to stabilize the dollar lest it impede the rise of domestic prices, our curt retort to the debt defaulters, and the announcement of an impressive naval building program are sufficient proof that Roosevelt has staked his faith on the domestic-recovery program rather than on the London and Geneva conferences. This might have been obvious to a discerning eye some time ago. The provisions in the national-recovery bill authorizing the President to declare embargoes and fix quotas on imports do not argue that he expected the London conference to arrive at satisfactory trade agreements or tariff reductions; the provisions in the public-works section enabling him to expand naval and military expenditures suggest that he was none too hopeful over the outcome at Geneva. Indeed, the whole measure clearly reveals that Administration policies have consistently been formulated on the assumption that both conferences would flop. These observations are not made in a spirit of either praise or blame. Being by nature a man of peace, I regard all wars, whether military, naval, or economic, as the pastimes of romantic barbarians. On the other hand, diagnosing the military hydrophobia which afflicts Japan, and noting how the nations of Europe ganged up on Uncle Sam in London, I am forcibly reminded that the good Lord continues to help them that help themselves. With the exception of Russia we are the only great nation to display an ounce of international altruism. Well, what has it got us? It has got us the same old run-around. If we are driven to a policy of economic self-sufficiency and military preparedness, what then? The next logical step would be an understanding with that other international "villain," Soviet Russia. In time of trouble it would be quite a comfort to know that the finest army in the world was at Japan's back door, and industrial recovery would hardly be retarded by having the largest foreign market thrown open to American goods. And if that, my masters, be chauvinism, or Ku Kluxism, or Hearstism, or bolshevism, make the most of it.

* * * * *

THE inauguration of the industrial-recovery program has precipitated a spectacle of chaos without a parallel, even in war time. This is especially true of the industrial-control administration, headed by General Hugh S. Johnson. We see the dynamic General, with few competent assistants and no money, struggling to perfect his organization, discover his powers, determine his policies, and define his objectives—all in the space of a week. In short, we see him trying to complete in a few days a job that would normally require several months. Hamstrung by the jealous bureaucrats of the Commerce Department, he threatens to pack up and move his entire organization to another building—a threat which he may execute before these lines are printed. The Bureau of the Budget moves him to profane eloquence by vetoing his salary schedule of $25 a day for certain men who have been accustomed, even in these depressed years, to salaries of $40,000 a year and upward. It is like a madhouse. But for the aid and comfort of a few such men as Donald Richberg, Dr. Leo Wolman, and Sidney Hillman, and the sympathetic cooperation of Secretary Perkins, the doughty General, with all his energy and fire, would simply be swamped. But if industrial-control headquarters present a scene of chaos, let us consider the spectacle presented by industry itself. We perceive not less than 2,000 trade-association lawyers whipping up their respective clients to rush in with codes governing trade practices, wages, and working hours—all of them impelled solely by a desire to escape the operation of the federal anti-trust laws. We perceive that about 30 per cent of the captains of industry continue to hold back—although they send delegations to Washington to find out whether there is any danger that they may be left out in the cold. Strangest of all, we discover the Steel Corporation in a frantic rush to organize its employees, even to the extent of notifying them formally of their right to select their own representatives and to bargain collectively. Meanwhile the bituminous coal operators goggle incredulously at the opportunity to organize themselves, while striving to retain the gory privilege of cutting each others' throats, and the throats of their employees.

* * * * *

HARDLY have the operators begun to quarrel among themselves, before President Lewis of the United Mine Workers launches a campaign to unionize the entire industry. This is followed promptly by reports of mines being closed and families evicted from company shacks. The mad dogs of American industry are fighting back. It is a profound relief to find a large number of industries actually trying to comply with the letter and the spirit of the law. Foremost among them are the manufacturers of electrical appliances, obviously influenced by the intelligent counsel of Gerard Swope. General Johnson believes that the example set by these employers will be followed almost unanimously. The General, however, is a born optimist. If previous form means anything, he is slated for plenty of trouble with the reactionary element led by Jim Emery and President Lund of the National Manufacturers Association. Those gentlemen continue to issue intensely patriotic statements, but it will be interesting to see how they perform. The fact is that American industrialists are in a state of unprecedented uncertainty. Their lawyers tell them one thing, their consciences tell them another, and always they are haunted by fear of the Roosevelt Big Stick. Not over-equipped with brains in the first place, their immediate predicament is truly pathetic, and it would be easy to sympathize with them if all one's sympathies were not already exhausted over the poor devils who do their work and buy their goods.

* * * * *

AS forecast in this place two weeks ago (if you don't mind a good old journalistic bromide), the attempt of the railroads to superimpose a wage cut of 12½ per cent on the 10 per cent deduction now prevailing met with a crushing rebuff at the hands of the Administration. Seeking a reduction in the basic rate of pay of their employees (the 10 per cent is a deduction, not a reduction), the rail owners were routed at every point. The best they could get was an extension of the 10 per cent deduction for another eight months.

At the end of that period, the basic rate automatically will be in effect. Official statements on the outcome were carefully composed to save the operators' feelings, but the fact is they were badly licked. It was a fool enterprise from the beginning, and confronted with the judicious and impassive authority of Coordinator Joseph Eastman, backed to the limit by President Roosevelt, they wound up ignominiously by signing an agreement drafted by Richberg, representing the rail workers. To a man from Mars it probably would seem that the rail barons had learned their lesson, but I am of the earth, earthy, and extremely skeptical about their ability to learn anything. Long after we have government ownership they will be mumbling into their beards, and wondering how it all happened.

The World Conference at Work

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

London, June 17

"THAT conference opened at the beginning of this week in an atmosphere of gloom and almost of despair"—these are the words of General Smuts in an address made at Oxford last night. They are no exaggeration. I have attended a number of such international gatherings, but not even the totally abortive one at Genoa in 1922 opened in so listless and hopeless a spirit as this one. The inaugural speeches of the King and of Ramsay MacDonald were excellent and were well received. But from that moment the conference was blanketed by the debt-payment issue and the question of the stabilization of the pound sterling and the dollar. A high and impeccable authority assures me that the World Economic Conference was deliberately called together on June 12, three days before the half-yearly debt payments to the United States were due, in the belief that this was a smart trick. Apparently the idea was that the conference itself would throw the debt payments into the background and that because of the existence of the conference, which was to solve every problem and straighten out the whole world, the American government and public opinion would look leniently upon a default by England and renewed defaults by others.

This may have been sound strategy; I doubt it. It not only relegated the conference to second place in the news, but increased the feeling that the important decisions, if any, will not be reached in the conference itself but in the several chancelleries or the board room of the Bank of England. And no sooner was the British offer of seven millions accepted and out of the way than the question of the stabilization of the dollar and pound became the all-important issue. The juxtaposition of the conference and the debt payment did, however, have one good result—it improved the spirit of the conference and increased such faint cordiality as existed between the English and American delegations. Had the President not accepted the British offer, and in such graceful and happy terms as he did, General Smuts would not have been able to add to the words at the head of this article his opinion that there was a "perceptible" change for the better in the spirit of the conference by the end of the first week. None the less, if General Smuts were to be cross-examined as to the grounds for his optimism, I am sure that he would have to fall back upon the belief that when the choice is clearly between sinking and swimming, men usually manage to swim. A slight reed to lean upon! The General was indubitably right when in his opening address he pointed out that this conference, and the highly alarming state of the world, were the direct result of the madness of Versailles. No one else could have said this so well because it was Jan Smuts himself who had the supreme courage to protest against the treaty in that last direful session in Paris.

Today the most that close observers expect of the conference is action to prevent further tariff strife and to achieve the cessation of currency warfare, together with an agreement for an eventual return to the gold standard at some far-off period. One of the greatest English experts, whose Cassandra-like prophecies have too often come true, has just said to me: "I do not expect much of this conference. It is the next one that will really act." "The next," I said, appalled, "when will that meet?" "A year hence—in Washington, I hope. The reason for it? Well, this one aims to stop further national bankruptcies and will achieve something along that line. The next will have to deal with the question of grave national revolutions." At least he was more cheerful than one of our foremost American experts. To my reminder that this was the eleventh hour for the nations, he replied cynically: "I am not sure that it is not the thirteenth."

To the bad start of the conference our own American delegation contributed not a little. Despite the presence on it of Secretary Hull and Senator Couzens, it is not one to be proud of. Nor has its conduct been distinguished by tact and the best of manners. Why did President Roosevelt have to send over a group of men utterly inexperienced in European affairs and especially in gatherings of this kind? That is like sending men into battle with shotguns to oppose others with machine-guns. Our delegation could see nothing wrong in its leading members absenting themselves the first session of the first working day. Mr. Hull himself apparently did not realize that his failure to speak at the opening on Tuesday cast away an extraordinary opportunity for the United States to dominate the whole proceedings—and threw those proceedings into such disarray that Ramsay MacDonald had to adjourn the conference early for lack of prepared speeches to take the place of Mr. Hull's announced address.

The excuse was that the Secretary's speech had to be cabled to the President at the last moment for his approval. The White House suggested a few changes and it took nearly twenty-four hours to make these in London, although the speech could have been written three months ago and could have remained unaltered thereafter. Indeed, as one of the foreign delegates put it to me: "It was a perfectly sound utterance which would have been an excellent progressive speech when William J. Bryan was running for your Presidency." The French press was not so polite. It spoke of the speech as one of "appalling inanity." The truth is that Mr. Hull was in a deep hole because, incredible as it seems, the commission was sent over here apparently without any definite program, and because its members are not with Mr. Hull in his admirable tariff views; I doubt if the President is. Most statesmen would have refused to assume the headship of the delegation under these conditions, but Mr. Hull is a good soldier and obeyed his President's orders to lead his divided delegation.

That does not mitigate the fact that so far our delegates have contributed nothing whatever to the proceedings, that some of them appear almost as if dazed, and that they are here purely on an opportunist basis—that is, to feel their way and jump in where they can. Mr. Hull is interested only in tariff reduction; he and his associates cannot even talk on debts or on the stabilization of the dollar and pound, which is in the hands of others—they have nothing whatever to do with it. They were delighted with their success in getting Jim Cox into the chairmanship of the monetary committee when they might better have wept. For what on earth does that ex-Governor of Ohio know about the question? It would have been far wiser if the able Dutchman suggested for the place had received it. More than that, the conference knows perfectly that if Mr. Hull could obtain the world-wide 10 per cent lateral tariff cut which he wishes, there is no prospect that Congress would agree to it. So, as the situation stands today and unless there is a great change, the prospects are that our delegates will not pull their weight in the conference boat, much less steer it. The American press correspondents here do not conceal their mortification; one told me that after crossing the ocean with the delegates he seriously considered cabling that he wished another assignment. You may hear of serious dissension in the delegation before this article arrives.

On the other hand, it can be said of the delegates that they are kindly, well-meaning, and personally harmonious. They do not agree with Mr. Hull, but they realize that this simple and modest Secretary of State has no desire to steal the spotlight, or play the dominating role of Woodrow Wilson at Paris. Of course, far abler and more experienced men than these would find their situation almost impossible. They are supposed to be in London to clear the channels of international trade and to restore normality of life everywhere, and they cannot vote to reduce the tariff obstacles, first, because they do not wish to, and second, because they have no authority to do so. They may help the conference to an agreement on cheap money, enlarged credits, wholesale public works, an international reduction of hours of labor, and so forth, even to world-wide currency stabilization—at least by tentative agreement. But as long as there is no radical grappling with the tariff, and the war-debt question is not settled, trade will not be freed of its worst restrictions.

Professor Raymond Moley is on his way over to buck up the American delegation and help it to a great success. But this is the same Raymond Moley who on May 20 made a radio speech saying that there was not much to be hoped from the World Conference and that it would not make much difference to the United States anyway, since it must "build the basis of its prosperity at home." That speech alone might well have kept Professor Moley away. It, too, made a bad impression here. I confess to complete surprise that Franklin Roosevelt, who has himself been abroad so much, does not realize the weakness of such an emissary. One thing is sure: the Europeans cannot understand procedure of this kind.

To return to the conference, there have been so far only three notable speeches—those of General Smuts, Neville Chamberlain, and Maxim Litvinov. Indeed, I should be justified in saying that the Litvinov speech was the only really valuable one. Smuts made some excellent suggestions about getting the conference down to work. Chamberlain stated the English case, clearly, concretely, and ably—a refreshing change from the platitudes of almost everybody else, and in the best House of Commons manner. But Litvinov, unhampered by capitalist tradition, spoke with freedom and frankness and offered the golden bait of a billion dollars' worth of immediate additional business if only the other nations would extend credits, remove embargoes, enter into diplomatic relations with Russia, and generally "play the game." Like the Russian disarmament offers at Geneva, Mr. Litvinov's proposals were ignored. As if with deliberate discourtesy, Mr. Hull got up in the middle of Litvinov's speech and walked out—sublimely unconscious, of course, that any significance might attach to his doing so—just as he is probably entirely unaware that he made a speech on his arrival at Queenstown that was as tactless as it was offensive to the British. To add to his offending, Litvinov offered a resolution of general purport to suspend all embargoes and reprisals of one country against another during the conference, which would undo the latest English boycott of Russia. His proposals are, of course, too sensible for adoption.

As for Neville Chamberlain's speech, it had the additional merit of showing England's hand. Unfortunately that means that he asked messieurs les autres to do away with their quotas and embargoes and tariffs, while making it quite clear that the quotas imposed by England and her dominions were, bless your soul, on a wholly different footing from the arbitrary quotas of other people. He, too, sought to define "reasonable tariffs"—which, it appears, are our old friends the tariffs to equalize costs of production—without in the least understanding the impossibility of doing this in the face of ever-shifting labor and currency and trade conditions, or paying any attention to what such tariffs mean to the home consumer. If it left the conference somewhat clearer as to the task ahead of it, the Chancellor's speech also revealed exactly the stubborn national obstinacies upon which it is most likely to be wrecked. As the Spectator well puts it, if the conference does its job, "that involves the resolute destruction of the barriers each nation has built up around its frontiers. It means exposing protected industries to external competition." Who will begin? Not the United States or England! Hence the bewilderment as to how anything much more worth while can come out of this conference than out of the various disarmament conferences. Perhaps my friend is right: perhaps we must go nearer to destruction than we are before the nations of the earth will really apply themselves to putting to work the 30,000,000 unemployed and the 60,000,000 additional human beings who, as Litvinov phrased it, "are eking out a semi-starved existence in countries embraced by the crisis."

If this conference is largely composed of men who will not see, it is at least a great advance over the fatal one at Versailles, only three members of which have seats in this assembly. Thank heaven, there is not a single professional soldier present, and none of the bloodstained premiers of 1919. There are even a few women in evidence. But the question to be answered is simply whether these successors to the counselors of Versailles have sufficient wisdom, courage, and freedom of action to save that wreck which is the world.

"Austria Is Not Germany"

By O. W. HOLDEN

Vienna, June 2

I WASTED a good deal of valuable energy in passionate outbursts of indignation against Austrian friends who refused to be aroused even in private conversation to any more violent protest against Hitlerism than a shrug of the shoulders, before it began to dawn on me what an effective front a whole nation of shoulder-shruggers can put up.

"But this is just the attitude on the part of intelligent people," I used to insist, "that makes situations like the persecution of the Jews in Germany possible. How can you feel so calm about such stupid injustice?"

"There is stupidity and injustice everywhere in the world and all the time," they answered. "If one doesn't accept it philosophically one must be every moment aufgeregt. In America, for instance—"

"Yes," I would interrupt hastily (Scottsboro only too well in mind), "but people of my own kind at home don't take such things so quietly. As individuals they feel a certain responsibility to take some definite stand."

Again that shrug—"But what's the use? What can they accomplish?"

"Not much—not enough," I would have to answer, "but every person has a small circle of influence—a few people who can't think for themselves may be swayed by your opinion, and this thing is threatening at your very door. Austria has a bigger percentage of Jews than Germany, and the Nazi movement has been almost exclusively nourished on anti-Semitism. If it sweeps over Austria finally, how can you and people like you feel entirely guiltless?"

And then I got my first positive reaction. "Austria is not Germany," they answered with frigid finality.

And now I am beginning to get the point. At first, as German Nazis cavorted with noisy expectancy along Austrian borders and Nazi ministers smiled confidently toward Austria in "unauthorized" speeches about a "united Germania," I waited impatiently for an unequivocal government stand. It seemed to me that the poor Social Democrats were the only ones whose spirits were to be broken by the Regierung's blanket measures against organized opposition. Up to May 1 Austrian Nazis might have been supposed to be almost nonexistent as a national group, for all the direct official notice taken of them. Nazis themselves, officially unrebuked, chose clamorously to interpret each new prohibitive ordinance as a missile aimed exclusively at the Social Democrats.

German Nazis received their first intimation that a united Austria might not be waiting for them with open arms when some of the resort towns decided it might be more peaceful for visitors taking the cure if other visitors in the uniforms of the several political armies were not squabbling over politics. After thinking it over the mayors of these towns came to the conclusion that of course no "good Germans" would vacation where obviously they were not wanted—and an official boycott was on.

Austrian Nazis immediately launched a campaign of patriotic fervor in defense of the tourist trade, speaking sternly to the offending mayors for their shortsighted and unpatriotic behavior. These gentlemen responded with round-eyed surprise to such misreading of their motives; of course their German neighbors would be welcomed to Austria with the customary warmth of former years, and so forth, and so forth. Polite shoulders were all prepared to meet further angry denunciations I am sure, but meanwhile the cartoonists' festival was on. It became difficult for any Nazi who could read to ignore the fact that he was being pretty universally laughed at—as he saw himself pictured fending off with a mammoth paw from the mountain beer garden great hordes of English and Americans and Swiss, while Fritz and his family, including the natty uniformed son, lunched expansively among the empty tables.

And then came May Day, which the government made an occasion for an impressive demonstration of its military strength by a complete one-day barricade of the Inner Town. The Nazis, as they stalked back and forth in front of massed machine-guns, behaved much like schoolboys who manage to establish a sense of innocence in their own breasts by puffing out their chests and looking meaningfully at the other fellows when the schoolmaster begins to test his birch. The Social Democrats, after one bitter outburst of angry chagrin at being deprived of their traditional festivities for that day, have been unaccustomedly silent. It looks as if they wisely realize that they will be stronger eventually if they keep to the role of the problem child, temporarily willing in the interests of family solidarity to cease annoying its parents while they are dealing with the troublesome outsider.

And at last "Little Dollfuss" has begun to hand out that deal with the smoothness of a practiced magician. After May Day the next holiday on the calendar was May 14, the anniversary of the freeing of Austria from the Turks. Nazi ministers were planning to come from Berlin to help celebrate the historic occasion. Austrian Nazis so far forgot themselves as to depart from the suave and devious ways of traditional Austrian politics by headlining their papers with "In fourteen days we are coming!" Then the devious methods of government began to stir in response. First the ban on uniforms went out for all private guards except the Heimwehr. The Schutzbund of the Social Democrats having been dissolved before this, there was no major group left to be affected except the Nazis, and they could not fail to recognize the implication. Their public protest was a most delightful evidence that "Austria is not Germany," for one can hardly imagine German Nazis laying aside their sober brown uniforms for high silk hats and whatever other adjuncts to the attire of aristocratic elegance each individual could muster. Unfortunately, this has been the only government action which the Nazis had an excuse to construe ■ specially directed against themselves; otherwise we might have been treated to other heartening forms of devastating sarcasm on the part of the Austrian branch, which would have further distinguished them from the humorless parent stem.

Next came the announcement that an oath of allegiance to the Regierung was to be required of all active civil employees and pensioners, with the loss of jobs or pensions for those refusing—or failing to qualify. Among the latter would be included any persons wearing the insignia of a party considered anti-governmental by the administrators of the oath. The details of this have not been entirely worked out, but there are to be no high-handed methods—no throwing people out of jobs wholesale because of their opinions, indeed not. Everyone has a right to think as he pleases. But a lot of Nazis are having to weigh carefully at the moment the choice between active party affiliation and a pay check. And the Austrians are not a nation of impractical idealists. Also they are not conspicuously fitted by temperament for the long-continued strain of secret allegiance. What good is ■ political club if ■ man can't go publicly to his cafe and consort with his fellows?

Bludgeoning Nazi raids on Heimwehr and Social Democratic students in the university and technical schools have been increasing in violence and bloodiness this month; numbers of youngsters are laid up in hospitals with severe injuries. There seemed to be a disquieting lack of cooperation on the part of many government-paid professors in quelling these unfortunate disturbances. Since wholesale arrests of rioters did little good, the order has lately gone out that the next school which is the scene of ■ student battle will be closed for a period of time to be fixed by the government, all teachers to receive half-pay during this period. The outlook is bright for the peaceful progress of education.

But none of this was as interesting to me as the approaching visit from Germany. I was reserving May 13 in my mind as the deciding date after which I could conscientiously answer the inquiries of American friends as to whether in my opinion Austria would be a reasonably peaceful vacation ground. Official Austria's polite refusal to recognize the visit officially might mean something and it might not. There was also to be considered a pointed suggestion from high German quarters that such discourtesy might necessitate sending further ranks of German Nazis to Vienna to bolster up the honor of the Austrian division. More significant was the elevating of Fey, a notorious foe of the Nazis, from the simple rank of ■ Heimwehr captain to the lofty position of Minister of Public Safety. This took place a few days before the thirteenth.

All very hopeful, I thought, but—I was still from Missouri. Now I have been shown and it took just three days to show me. On Saturday, the thirteenth, the airplane from Berlin landed on schedule, and Herren Frank and Kerl and entourage were greeted with a handsome speech at the field by Vice-Police President Skubal, who regretted that as official guests they were unwelcome but tendered them as private citizens the most respectful greetings on the part of his government, which intended to express its good-will not only in words but by providing them with ■ police escort for the length of their stay. It was unfortunately necessary, however, to warn the honored guests to confine their public remarks to the subject of the historical occasion being celebrated. The rest of the day passed fairly smoothly, with 14,000 Nazis in prearranged assemblies receiving from their German comrades greetings which were only occasionally interrupted by mild suggestions from the police.

On Sunday the visitors went to Mödling near Vienna, where, in their professional capacity as German jurists, they were warmly but briefly addressed by the mayor. But on Sunday something more interesting was happening in Vienna. The delivery of the country from the Turks was being spectacularly celebrated by ■ monster parade of 40,000 Heimwehr members called in from every province of Austria.

On Monday the German party with its faithful escort proceeded by automobile to Graz. There Herr Frank lamentably forgot his private status and attempted an undeniably political speech. It was just too bad, but the commanding police officer must with profound apologies request Herr Frank and companions to enter their cars at once and take the direct route to the German border. There were answering suggestions that such brusque action would undoubtedly reap dire consequences, but again the shrugged shoulder indicated that orders were orders.

At St. Gilgen near Salzburg the Germans were hungry and wished to stop to eat. The chief of the Salzburg police obligingly put through ■ call to Vienna and received gracious permission for the departing guests to pause for refreshment only. But eating was a long and leisurely affair, and somehow the Gasthaus got very full of friends of Herr Frank during its process. It was only natural that he should wish to make a few comradely remarks of farewell to them as he rose to depart. But this time the kindly police hand fell on his shoulder with ■ propulsive firmness not to be disregarded, and before he realized it the honored guest had been escorted to the door, bundled solicitously with his companions into the waiting cars, and whisked straight over the border into Germany. On the same afternoon the Vienna papers, in their accounts of the Heimwehr parade, mentioned that so many of the trains carrying homeward-bound divisions had been stoned by Nazis that a government investigation would be necessary to determine if the attacks had been by an chance organized from a central source.

Since the government has decided to look this far over its shoulder, it will undoubtedly discover, perhaps by the time this is read, that those gangs of obstreperous youngsters, the Austrian divisions of the Hitler storm troops, are a shocking anomaly in a suave and civilized state, and must disband or go somewhere else to play.

"A bit late," the Social Democrats will remark balefully—but probably not without a small secret share in the generally mounting Austrian pride in smart Little Dollfus.

Not Staged for Tourists

By JOHN ROTHSCILD

IT is not the relics of the past which draw most of us abroad, but rather the wish to sample another way of living than our own. Every summer there are events in Europe which are not staged for tourists, which are little advertised or known, and which present in a few days, a day, or some hours a whole broad phase of culture. We have assembled here advance information regarding some of these incidents.

Music. Besides the great music festivals, to which added interest attaches this year because of the Wagner and Brahms memorials, lesser musical events offer delight to the music lover. One of the most interesting is the Haslemere Festival of Chamber Music, which will be held from July 17 to 29 in Surrey, England. This is conducted by the remarkable Dolmetsch family, makers of old instruments. The charm of the event flows from the intimate family circle of musician-craftsmen as well as from the lovely old chamber music which they revive on the original instruments. This year the Dolmetsches will present a Bach concerto for four harpsichords, many compositions for the clavichord, works of the English fantasy writers, and folk music from the Middle Ages to the sixteenth century. The medieval English harp with brass strings has been added to their ensemble.

Drama. A great peasant audience riding in carts or trudging the dusty roads assembles at Orange in the south of France the last three days in July for the series of Greek plays in the old Roman theater. The Opéra Comique of Paris performs them. The brightly costumed audience is as fascinating as the plays.

The Malvern Festival becomes more important as a center of English dramatic production with each summer's presentation. This year Sir Barry Jackson offers a historical cycle beginning with a fifteenth-century miracle play. For the modern play he has chosen "The Sleeping Clergyman," by James Bridie. This is a departure from the Festival tradition of presenting new Shaw plays as representative of modern English drama. The cycle includes "Gammer Gurton's Needle"; "The Fair Maid of the West," by Thomas Heywood; "All for Love," by Dryden; "The Love Chase," by Sheridan Knowles; and "The Dancing Girl," by Henry Arthur Jones. A series of morning lectures accompanies the Festival. Allardyce Nicoll, who recently was appointed to the post held by George Pierce Baker in the Yale School of the Drama, will be one of four eminent lecturers. A fee of ten dollars is charged for the lecture course. Tickets for the week's plays cost from eleven to fifteen dollars, but one may buy seats for single performances. The cycle is given three times, between July 24 and August 12. Arrangements may be made through the Drama League Travel Bureau, Barbizon Plaza Hotel, New York.

Festivals. Religious observances in Europe are inseparable from pageantry and folk festivals. Whether or not one is a believer, one must recognize a vital form of human expression in the Pardons of Brittany or the blessing of the fishermen's nets in some little seacoast town.

During July, August, and early September there are processions and harvest thanksgivings in every countryside.

They vary with the local harvest in size and splendor and are not announced far in advance; but one may often stumble upon them in the course of a Sunday drive along the Rhine, or in Austria, or in any of the Latin countries. Folk dancing and singing, pageants, the wearing of ancestral costumes are part of such festivals, as well as much drinking and merriment. There may even be a little fair or market, at which products of local handicrafts are for sale.

The Feast of the Redemption is celebrated in Venice on July 16 with solemn masses in the church and high carnival on the canals. This is one occasion when the visitor need not be a passive watcher, but may merge into the crowd of merrymakers. Your gondola will be caught up in one of the many processions, and young Venetians will perhaps leap in to visit you.

The Palio at Siena (Italy) is a colorful occasion. The peasants come into town with their sturdy hill ponies and lead them into the church to be blessed. The town dwellers hang out banners and rugs from every window and cornice. In the great Piazza del Campo a pageant of the ancient Sienese republic is performed with spirit. As the procession moves through the square, the standard bearers wave their flags, throw them into the air, and perform a thousand miracles of color. Finally, the blessed horses are ridden in an exciting bareback race around the square. For the rest of the day the festival is celebrated in the streets with dancing and singing. It takes place twice during the summer, on July 2 and August 16.

Art. There are fewer art exhibitions of consequence in Europe this year because of the World's Fair in Chicago, which has absorbed funds and exhibits. However, the Triennial Exhibition of Modern Art and Architecture in Milan, which opened in May and can be seen all summer, is excellent. It is held under the patronage of the Italian government in the new Palace of Arts. Every imaginable development of the decorative arts is represented. There are extensive exhibits of glass, ceramics, metals, sculpture, painting, furniture, textiles, and even an "international show of furniture for ships and trains." The architectural division contains real houses fully equipped.

For the "Dresden Jubilee Summer" (Germany) the city is showing the art treasures of King August the Strong, who ruled Saxony in the early eighteenth century and was a prodigious collector. The porcelains and jewels are especially fine. Many curious souvenirs of this fantastic ruler are on display, each neatly incased in its own legend—the horse-shoe he broke when he was forty-one years old, the hunting rifles which no other man could fire, the jeweled mementos he presented to a mistress whom he afterwards imprisoned for forty years.

Toruń (Poland) celebrates the 700th anniversary of its founding this summer with expositions of contemporary arts and handicrafts and a rare collection of old religious art.

Politics. The Institute of World Affairs at Mondsee (Austria) offers lectures on international questions by a distinguished faculty, including Roscoe Pound, dean of the Harvard Law School; Eduard Benes, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Czecho-Slovakia; Georges Oprescu, Rumanian member of the Secretariat of the League of Nations; André Siegfried; Paul Monroe, president of Robert College, Istanbul; and others. Lectures will be in English. The program lasts from July 1 to August 11, with a week's extension at the Geneva Institute of International Relations. This includes lectures by members of the League Secretariat and other experts in international relations. It is possible to register for a shorter period. The rate for one week is forty dollars, which includes lodging and meals, lectures, and local sightseeing and outings. The fee for the Geneva Institute is ten dollars. Further information can be obtained from the Institute of International Education, 2 West Forty-fifth Street, New York.

The Assembly of the League of Nations convenes on September 4. The Council meets about two days before the Assembly, concurrently with it, and continues for about a week after the Assembly adjourns. Other committees of the League meet during the summer months. Students of international affairs may obtain tickets for the meetings of the Council, the Assembly, and the various other League organizations from the American Committee of the League of Nations Association, 53 Quai Wilson, Geneva.

A World Congress of Youth against War and Fascism is to be held in Paris on August 5, 6, and 7. An American committee has been organized to make known the aims of the congress and to urge the young people of this country to support it. Inquiries may be addressed to Carl Geiser, secretary, at 104 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Sports. A sports competition that escapes the twin evils of professionalism and commercialism is the Turnfest at Stuttgart (Germany) the last four days in July. It is an international event held every year in some German city, and is joyously amateur in spirit. Individual feats are less highly regarded than group gymnastics, mass rhythmic, and general all-round athletic proficiency. Folk dancing and singing, choruses, processions, and bonfires, a performance of Schiller's "Robbers" in an open-air theater in the Bopser Forest are among the festive events.

[This is the last of a series of articles giving travel information of interest to Nation readers.]

In the Driftway

THE Drifter was set to speculating on the future of country newspapers when he read the other day of the death of William Benjamin Franklin Townsend, printer-editor of the Dahlonega (Georgia) Nugget. Dahlonega was once a gold-mining town—so the obituaries said, the Drifter had never known it—of enough importance to have a government mint, and for some forty years Townsend got out the Nugget once a week, single-handed. According to a technique once not uncommon but now probably almost extinct, Townsend composed the contents of the paper as he stood before his printer's case, setting the type by hand as he went along. It is said that he never read proof and never looked at his paper after it came off his old-fashioned hand press. If there were errors, he was happily oblivious until somebody else called them to his attention. Wise editor! For there will always be errors in a paper anyhow. The Drifter knows one nearer home than Dahlonega where people write in, telephone, and call belligerently to protest against errors even after the most scrupulous editing and proofreading. Townsend had three dictionaries but said he was too busy ever to consult them. Another good editorial principle! Looking up words in a dictionary is a habit which grows on an editor, sapping his self-confidence. He never lives long enough to get all the plaguey words looked up.

* * * * *

"SOMETIMES in preparing an article for the Nugget," Townsend once wrote, "we do not take a single bite of grammar, but tell it plainly like we were talking to our darling baby." Although the editor of the Nugget had a family with which he was on good terms, he liked privacy and for many years had lived alone in a shack beside the other one in which he printed his paper. He slept from sundown to 2 a. m. with his feet hanging over the footboard of the bed, and once let his readers in for a glimpse of his sleeping habits by saying in the Nugget: "When retiring last night it was still warm enough for us to pull off our breeches, as is our custom on warm nights." The last thing Townsend did was to finish a column of local news with the sentence "The editor is sick." Then he sat down to rest for a moment—and never got up. He was seventy-eight years old.

* * * * *

THE printer-editor is a disappearing type, but the personal journalism which he exemplified and the country newspaper where he flourished are on the upgrade, the Drifter thinks. Anonymous and colorless journalism reached its zenith in this country at least a generation ago, since when there has not only been an injection of more personality through signed columns but a greater demand for individual writing in the unsigned material. The country weekly, too, seems destined for a renaissance. The reason for this, as the Drifter sees it, is the back-to-the-country movement from our cities, insuring better support for the small-community press, coupled with a tendency on the part of big-city papers to become more and more national in character and circulation. As yet America has no national dailies in the sense, say, that France has, where the leading Parisian dailies go all over the republic. The Matin, the Journal, the Petit Parisien are on sale even in remote hamlets, to a large extent on the day of publication. Nothing of this sort has been possible hitherto in America because of our great distances and difficulties of transportation, but the Drifter looks for the day when a few great metropolitan dailies, delivered by airplane and automobile, will cover the country with general news and comment. The weaker city papers will disappear.

* * * * *

AT the same time the field will be greatly extended for local papers giving the home news and gossip while ignoring national and international happenings. Many of our metropolitan newspapers already are so general as to leave a field in their own area for regional journalism. The outlying boroughs of New York, for instance, have their own dailies as well as weeklies. As metropolitan newspapers become fewer and more national in circulation, the small-town and country press will come back. All success to it!

THE DRIFTER

It Pays to Fight for Lower Rates, by O. S. Dean, the seventh in a series of articles on electric power and the consumer, will appear in next week's issue.

Correspondence

Trotsky and Sidney Hook

[Leon Trotsky has given The Nation permission to use his letter to Sidney Hook which follows. It contains comment on Professor Hook's article, Marxism—Dogma or Method? which appeared in our issue of March 15. Comment by Professor Hook on Trotsky's remarks is appended.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

DEAR PROFESSOR HOOK:

I read with interest your article in The Nation and it provoked in me some doubts.

1. The title of your article, Marxism—Dogma or Method? provokes a certain disquietude. The alternative does not cover the question. Marxism is not a dogma; but it is not only a method; it is also a doctrine. The materialist dialectic is a method. Marx, however, not only formulated this method, but applied it in two domains, by creating the theory of capitalist economy (science) and the theory of the historical processes (the "philosophy of history"—more exactly, a science).

2. The concluding phrase of your article declares that "it [Marxism] is neither dogma, myth, nor objective science, but a realistic method of class action." What means here the word "realistic"? Obviously it means based upon the true knowledge of the objective—in that case, social—processes; the knowledge of the objective is a science. The Marxian policy is realistic in so far as it is based upon Marxism as a science.

3. You say that the Marxian doctrine can no more be understood independent of its revolutionary aims than the prescriptions of a physician independent of the concern of health. Within certain limits it is possible to accept this comparison. But the only physician capable of giving useful prescriptions is one who bases his action upon anatomy, physiology, pathology, and a series of other positive sciences. How is it possible to detach the realistic practice from the scientific theory? In the final analysis all scientific knowledge—not only regarding medicine—grows from practical needs and serves these needs.

4. You write: "From the theoretical postulates of this science of Marxism, it followed that revolutionary opposition to the World War in 1914 was utopian, because the war and the war psychology inevitably flowed from the objective constellation of socio-economic forces of the time." This counterposing, it seems to me, is not understandable. The struggle against war would be "utopian" because the war flows inevitably from the objective circumstances. In the first place, the utopian ideas flow also from the objective circumstances. Secondly, the struggle against the "inevitable" events is not necessarily utopian, because the inevitable events are limited in time and space. Particularly, the war, being a historical "inevitability," proved "utopian" as a means of issuing out of the imperialist impasse.

5. You state: "Marx's gravest mistake was in not assigning greater values to the temporal coefficients of the process." This remark is just when applied to a great number of vulgar Marxists, especially of the epoch of the Second International, but it is absolutely false in relation to Marx himself.

When conditions permit I will return to this question in more comprehensive form; meanwhile, I remain, with comradesly greetings,

Buyukada, Turkey, April 11

L. TROTSKY

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Leon Trotsky's letter affords me a welcome opportunity to clarify some points in my article which, judging by several inquiries I have received, have perplexed many readers of The Nation. First, I wish to indicate that Trotsky's final point (5) is based upon a linguistic misunderstanding of the sense in which I used the term "values." I use the term in its technical mathematical sense—as when we speak of the values of a function, variable, or argument. Trotsky takes the word in its ordinary connotation of "value" and consequently interprets me as saying that Marx's greatest error consisted in allowing capitalism too much time to run its course. My meaning is precisely the opposite. Marx expected the social revolution, at least in Western Europe, much sooner than it has come; the orthodox Marxists of the Second International, on the other hand, postponed the date to a future so indefinite that nothing they could do could have an appreciable effect upon it.

Points 1, 2, and 3 in Trotsky's letter are different facets of the same question, namely, whether Marxism is a science. I use the term "science" in its strict sense. Not everything which is called a science has a right to the name. It is well to remember that theology was once regarded as a science, and Hegel called his philosophy of absolute idealism Wissenschaft. By a science, as distinct from scientific method, I mean a body of knowledge consisting of sets of general propositions which systematize a mass of facts in such a way that by their means one group of facts may be inferred from another group of facts. All propositions of science are publicly verifiable and universal agreement about them is possible. Judgments of value or worth are consequently excluded. To be sure, human values or ideals may become the subject matter of scientific inquiry, but the scientific propositions which relate them with causal antecedents are not themselves normative.

From this point of view Marxism is more than an "objective science." It is a scientific method of achieving a class goal. It involves a series of normative judgments without which it becomes nothing but a set of "if—then" propositions, emasculated of class content and relevance, and devoid of revolutionary implications for action. Marxism asserts categorically that something should be done, and not merely neutral hypotheticals such as "if you want this, do that." All of Marx's objectively true descriptions of society are relevant to his revolutionary purposes, and it was Engels who defined communism as "the doctrine of the requisites for the emancipation of the proletariat." One who grants the truth of the "science" of Marxism and stops there is not yet a Marxist. If this is denied, Hilferding's contention that it is possible to be a Marxist and yet violently oppose socialism cannot be met.

It is a commonplace that the physician's regulative prescriptions are conditioned by his knowledge of chemistry, anatomy, physiology, and the like. But the science of chemistry as such is indifferent to any regulative ideal. The social uses to which a science is put, as well as its social effects, are not constitutive parts of its subject matter, for they are evaluated from irreconcilably different class viewpoints. I do not deny that objective scientific truths have been discovered in the course of the systematic attempt to gratify practical needs—even class needs. But the distinction between the general propositions whose validity is independent of class values, and the specific application of these propositions to a context in which evaluations are made from conflicting class axes, cannot be called into question without reading the class struggle back into nature or taking it out of social life. To be sure, there are no hard and fast distinctions. But that is no excuse for lumping everything together. Further, it is far from clear that all scientific knowledge grows out of practical needs. Such a statement is either a tautology or a patent error: a tautology if practical need is identified to mean any kind of human interest; an error if it is assumed that every human interest is practical. What practical need, to use some stock examples, was behind the invention of the theory of conic sections in the fourth century B. C. (used by Kepler 1,900 years later in discovering the laws of planetary motion), of symbolic logic, the general theory of relativity—and, indeed, most of astronomy.

Point 4 in Trotsky's letter refers to the Social-Democratic conception of the science of Marxism. I claimed that its monistic, organic determinism was logically indistinguishable from fatalism, and that it made no adequate theoretical provision for the historical effects of class-consciousness, relative contingencies arising from qualities of leadership, favorable or unfavorable conjunctions of natural phenomena, and so on—not all of which were strictly deducible from socio-economic data alone. When the Second International spoke of the inevitability of socialism, it did not use quotation marks. That it fell into inconsistency by condemning acts of which it disapproved, when on its own dogma of inevitability such acts would have no consequence on the final outcome, is only additional evidence that any theory which overlooks the limited but important creative role of human knowledge and consciousness in history is useless.

In conclusion: Marxism is a scientific method of achieving a classless society. Its doctrines, in so far as they are verified by experience, are as objective as the propositions of any science. Here only insight is necessary. But as for its goal—the abolition of a class society—this expresses a philosophy, a morality, a creative commitment. It is not necessary—nor, on the theory of Marxism, is it possible—to convince the capitalist class of the superior ethical validity of a classless society. "Up to the present time," says Engels, "all ethical theory is in the last instance a testimony to the existence of certain economic conditions prevailing in any community at any particular time. We have not yet advanced beyond class morals. Real human morality, superior to class morality and its traditions, will not be possible until a stage in human history has been reached in which class antagonisms have not only been overcome but have been forgotten."

New York, May 10

SIDNEY HOOK

You can go abroad

IN YOUR 2 WEEKS' VACATION—BECAUSE

BREMEN EUROPA

ARE THE FASTEST LINERS AFLOAT

All-Expense Tours
(Third Class Atlantic)

$189⁰⁰

PARIS—Four days and nights in the gay Pleasure City

$198⁵⁰

LONDON - PARIS - BRUSSELS—More than a day in each city

$194⁰⁰

LONDON - PARIS—Two days in each great European center

$203⁰⁰

BERLIN—Four joyous nights and days in the gay capital.

ENCHANTING DAYS in aristocratic London... gay Paris... picturesque Brussels... magnificent Berlin.

THRILLING DAYS in the spacious third class of the transatlantic champions with every modern comfort. Care-free hours of dancing, music, Munich evenings, sports and relaxation in the refreshment of sea air. Assurance of comfort and beauty in the social rooms, stately dining hall, bright decks, immaculate cabins.

Other longer tours to all Europe at lower and higher prices by Lloyd express and cabin liners and in all classes. Write for Booklets.

North German Lloyd
57 Broadway, New York

OFFICES AND AGENTS EVERYWHERE

... WE ASK EVERY NATION READER TO DO SOMETHING—NOW.... We join with Prof. John Dewey in saying: "It would be a calamity to intelligent, untrammelled thought and speech everywhere... all sincere friends of sound adult education MUST JOIN IN KEEPING THE RAND SCHOOL'S DOORS OPEN."

Norman Thomas
Oswald Garrison Villard
John Haynes Holmes
Morris Hillquit
Chas. A. Beard
Henrik Van Loon
Upton Sinclair
Wm. P. Montague
Elizabeth Gilman
Paul H. Douglas
Clarence Senior
Jerome Davis
Gilbert Seldes
Heywood Broun
Fiorella La Guardia
Wm. H. Kilpatrick
Helen Keller
Broadus Mitchell
Stuart Chase
Margaret I. Lamont
Elmer Rice
Fanny Hurst
Michael Strange

To "Those Who Care"

AFTER 27 years of complete devotion to labor and academic freedom, the Rand School of Social Science faces extinction unless we raise $17,000 immediately. Never before have we cried "Wolf"—The first enterprise of its kind in workers and adult education, and storm center of many struggles for academic freedom, the Rand School has an enrollment of 1,200 students, the intellectual and spiritual vanguard of tomorrow's labor movement. No narrow dogmatism has limited the scope of the curriculum, the selection of the lecturers, or nature of the student body. We ask your help—much or little—BUT SOMETHING; so that this great light be not extinguished.

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, N. Y. C. FOR THE RAND SCHOOL

I am "one who cares."—Herewith find $_____ as my donation to save The People's House and Rand School, and to keep the light burning!

Name _____ City _____

Address _____

Finance

Wall Street Faces the New Securities Act

WALL STREET is writhing in the shackles of the new Securities Act. Coming, ironically enough, in the midst of the greatest stock-market boom since the halcyon days of 1929, the new regulatory legislation has stayed the itching hand of Wall Street just as it was reaching out for the untold profits promised by the public's renewed appetite for stock gambling. The Securities Act was written primarily to protect purchasers of new issues. But the clause which for the time being at least is playing most havoc with Wall Street's traditional practices is contained in the second paragraph of section 12, which extends potential civil liability to the sellers of all securities, whether new or old, with the exception of government, State, municipal, and bank issues. Under these provisions anyone selling a security in interstate commerce by means of a prospectus or oral communication is civilly liable for recovery of the purchase price if his prospectus or oral communication "includes an untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements, in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading (the purchaser not knowing of such untruth or omission)," unless the seller shall "sustain the burden of proof that he did not know, and in the exercise of reasonable care could not have known, of such untruth or omission."

This paragraph not only strikes right at the heart of the routine Wall Street procedure of hustling customers into stocks on a customers' man's snap judgment, but also is embarrassing to the hoary Wall Street game of stock tipping, so convenient for successful pool operations. By affording buyers the chance of an effective come-back, the paragraph threatens to take much of the tang out of the familiar procedure whereby a brokerage house acquires a position in a stock through pool operations or otherwise, and then unloads its holdings on its customers at higher prices. One of the salient characteristics of a tip is its incompleteness; if a full exposition is required, the buying attraction of most tips quickly vanishes.

Finding, to its annoyance and fear, that much of the responsibility which it has always foisted on buyers has now been placed on its own unwilling shoulders, Wall Street has been displaying all the symptoms of an uneasy and panicky conscience. With some houses this has taken the form virtually of a blanket ban on giving any buying recommendations to customers. With practically all it has led to an entirely new hesitation in advising clients on how to clean up the market. In an amusing application of the new spirit of let the seller beware, some salesmen have been cautioned to restrict their recommendations to customers of known "ethical" character, ethical in this sense signifying those buyers who are not likely to turn on the sellers if their commitment proves sour!

In characteristic fashion many brokers moan that these provisions of the Securities Act will actually work a hardship on investors by depriving them of the expert advice of their brokers before purchasing securities. While, to be sure, the outside public notoriously lacks selective wisdom and the most elementary understanding of the actual values of the stocks it buys, the evidence of recent years indicates that customers are, broadly speaking, no better off when they follow the frequently uninformed, or if informed not disinterested, advice of the brokers. Indeed, the true source of this complaint is that a rigorous application of these provisions would require advice to be truly expert and disinterested. Wall Street has always shrunk from assuming responsibility in its dealings with the public, although the "better" houses managed to surround themselves with a professional aura. When the brokers happen to have the right inside dope—which is seldom—they do not want to share it with the outsiders, at least not until they have cleaned up on their own account.

However, it is still too early for a final rejoicing that the Wall Street racket has been tamed. Once the initial hysteria has passed, it is inevitable that loopholes will be found in the application of the law. What Wall Street is clamoring for is official interpretation of the act and the issuance of regulations by the Federal Trade Commission defining the more general language of the bill and thus simplifying the search for the way out. Much hope is pinned on the looseness of the phraseology in the final version of the bill, which was formulated after Wall Street interests had made urgent—and successful—protests against the original wording of this clause.

Brokers have not been the only ones to feel the effects of the act. Some gentlemen of the Fourth Estate will be severely cramped in their efforts to build up an estate of their own. Henceforth it will be unlawful for the newspaper boys to indulge in the old lucrative game of writing favorable pieces on individual stocks in exchange for stock options, calls, extra pocket money, and other favors from market operators. Fiorello La Guardia exposed some of these practices during the Congressional stock-market investigation last year. The clause of the bill which dries up this source of easy money is contained in section 17, which makes it unlawful for any newspaper or financial service to circulate an article or notice which "though not purporting to offer a security for sale, describes such security for a consideration received or to be received, directly or indirectly from an issuer, underwriter, or dealer, without fully disclosing the receipt, whether past or prospective, of such consideration and the amount thereof." In view of these provisions even the sedate Wall Street Journal is requiring its reporters to sign affidavits that their articles are not paid for by interested outsiders. Still, "consideration" may prove an elastic word.

The effect of the main portions of the bill—those governing new securities—has been relatively small up to the present, since Wall Street has been predominately concerned with the wild rush of the public to gamble in already issued securities. But when and if new capital issues again become feasible, cries of anguish will resound from the Street. Already dire prophecies are uttered that the responsibility of directors established in the bill will cause a dearth of reputable advisers for business, and that the new liabilities of underwriters will prevent the raising of needed capital. But if the bill abolishes unneeded directors who seek only inside information, and keeps some of the phony security offerings of the past decade off the market, legitimate business can struggle along.

PETER HELMOOP NOYES

Contributors to This Issue

AMOS PINCHOT is a New York lawyer and publicist.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

O. W. HOLDEN is a former social worker who is now studying music in Vienna.

JOHN ROTHSCHILD is a confirmed explorer of out-of-the-way Europe. As director of the Open Road he established the pioneer service for travel in the Soviet Union.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL is the author of "A World Passed By: Scenes and Memories of Jewish Civilization in Europe and North Africa."

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is a New York journalist.

E. M. BENSON is a free-lance writer.

Books and Films

Mr. Keynes's Way Out

The Means to Prosperity. By John Maynard Keynes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. 30 cents.

THIS pamphlet has been selling on the newsstands now for several weeks, but the remarkable reputation enjoyed by its author, the great importance at the present moment of the questions it raises, and the possibility that either the plan it suggests or a very similar plan will be proposed to the World Economic Conference before that sad meeting adjourns, still make it worth examining at some length.

Mr. Keynes has just emerged in the pages of the latest Yale Review as a frank nationalist and isolationist, and his new nationalism is evident enough in the present pamphlet. The man who wrote in 1925, "I believe in free trade because, in the long run and in general, it is the only policy which is technically sound and intellectually tight," now writes:

Currency depreciation and tariffs were weapons which Great Britain had in hand until recently as a means of self-protection. A moment came when we were compelled to use them, and they have served us well.

And again:

For the conference to occupy itself with pious resolutions concerning the abatement of tariffs, quotas, and exchange restrictions will be a waste of time. In so far as these things are not the expression of deliberate national or imperial policies, they have been adopted reluctantly as a means of self-protection, and are symptoms, not causes, of the tension on the foreign exchanges.

The belief that tariffs are not causes of the tension on the foreign exchanges, but mere symptoms of it, is too astonishing for comment. It would be interesting to learn, moreover, what the evidence is for Mr. Keynes's belief that Great Britain's tariff has served that country well. There has been so far nothing to show but a steadily shrinking foreign trade on both sides of the balance.

Mr. Keynes believes that the only way out is through an extensive program of public works conducted within each country and financed by loans. It is highly desirable, he thinks, that this program should be undertaken simultaneously by the various nations. Partly to make such a simultaneous program possible, and apparently partly because he thinks the device will raise prices directly, he suggests the international issuance of what he calls gold notes, with a quota permitted to each country in proportion, say, to the gold held by that country at the end of 1928.

Now whatever may be said about the merits of a program of government expenditure (and a great deal may be said for it as a supplementary measure, to "start the ball rolling"), it can hardly be argued that it deals directly with the causes of the existing depression. The crisis has been attributed in recent years to more causes than it is possible to list, but so far I have not seen anyone contend that it was the result of a sudden shrinkage from previous governmental expenditures. One can argue, of course, that the crisis came because expenditure stopped somewhere, and that we need governmental expenditure as a substitute for this. But even in so far as this argument is valid, there are still two important questions to be asked about the proposed program: (1) What would be the probable net effect of a given volume of expenditure on employment, business activity, and general "purchasing power"; and (2) on what particular things should the government spend its money?

To both of these questions Mr. Keynes's answers are unsatisfactory. He begins with the usual contention that government expenditure will give employment not only to the men directly engaged in the project on which the money is spent, but to those who work on the raw materials and on their transportation; and he goes on to argue that the increased income to the direct and indirect contractors, and the employment given to the direct and indirect workers, will lead to additional expenditures by these on still other goods, which will in turn provide employment and income leading to the purchase of still other goods, and so on, ad infinitum. If this argument were taken seriously and without qualification, it would mean that a fresh one million dollars, spent privately or publicly, would multiply itself indefinitely and, given time, restore the world. Mr. Keynes is too sophisticated to take the argument without qualification; but the qualifications he makes are the wrong ones. He invents various "leakages":

At each stage ■ certain proportion of the increased income is not passed on in increased employment. Some part will be saved by the recipient; some part raises prices and so diminishes consumption elsewhere, except in so far as producers spend their increased profits; some part will be spent on imports; some part is merely ■ substitution for expenditure previously made out of the dole or private charity or personal savings; and some part may reach the Exchequer without relieving the taxpayer to an equal extent.

And Mr. Keynes concludes that because of these "leakages" the amount of new purchasing power brought into being will be only twice the original amount of the new government expenditures.

But if we scrutinize these alleged leaks more closely, the existence of most of them becomes very doubtful. The part that is "saved" by the recipient is not lost to employment unless it is actually hoarded. If the recipient invests it in stocks or bonds, or places it in a savings bank which thereupon buys bonds with the proceeds, or banks it in a commercial bank which uses it for short-term loans or short-term government paper, he is presumably giving as much employment—though generally for the making of capital rather than of consumption goods—as if he had "spent" the money. Even if he buys old and not new bonds, he at least places purchasing power in the hands of the previous holder of the old bonds. Higher prices, again, of course mean higher profits, and there is no "leak" here either unless the producers actually hoard. As for the money that is spent on imports, it creates a credit which enables the selling countries to buy goods in return. Indeed, this is ultimately the only way in which those countries can make use of such ■ credit. It is true that the selling country might leave its credit as a loan or as the repayment of a debt previously owed; but this would be done only in so far as there was an excess of imports over exports.

The real reason why an increase of expenditure does not multiply itself indefinitely is of quite a different kind. We have to consider not merely the probable immediate effect of such expenditure upon incomes considered in monetary terms, but the actual degree of economic interdependence. In a society that was completely interdependent economically, any gain or loss of income at any one point would multiply itself indefinitely. Let us assume, for illustration, an economy made up of 100 completely interdependent industries, and let us say that for some reason the purchasing power of 25 per cent of these industries is destroyed. Immediately the remaining 75 industries, by losing one-fourth of their market, will have only three-fourths of their former purchasing power. But this means that any given industry will suffer not only the loss of one-fourth of its customers, but that its remaining customers will have only three-fourths of their previous purchasing power.

Therefore its sales will be reduced to 75 per cent of 75 per cent, or 56 per cent. But as this will happen to each of the 75 remaining industries, this means that the sales of each will be reduced to 56 per cent of 75 per cent, or to 42 per cent, of their previous volume. And this process would continue indefinitely, approaching zero as a limit. Suppose, however, on the other hand, that we assume an economy made up of thousands of self-contained farms. If one-fourth of them were to disappear, it would not affect the economic welfare of the others at all, except in so far as they chose to provide for the ruined farmers. It is because we live under an economy largely but not entirely interdependent, and not because of "leaks" in purchasing power, that economic disaster or good fortune in one quarter spreads its effects widely but not indefinitely.

Finally, we have to remember that governmental spending, even when the funds are raised through the sale of government bonds, means a net addition to purchasing power only to the extent that the funds raised were funds previously hoarded, or to the extent that purchasers of the bonds borrow against them and create bank credit against them. With so many uncertain factors, we cannot say how much additional purchasing power a given volume of government spending will actually create. There is certainly no real warrant for assuming, as Mr. Keynes does, that it will create twice as much purchasing power as the amount originally spent.

When it comes to the particular purposes for which the government should spend its money, Mr. Keynes's contribution is equally unsatisfactory. He indicates at one point that he would spend in Great Britain £100,000,000 for housing; and in so far as these funds were spent on low-cost housing and on slum clearance, they would be more than well spent, for they would be endowing the lowest-income groups. But he also indicates that he would spend, for example, £7,000,000 on the new Cunarder. For this I can see no justification whatever. It would simply add to the oversupply of passenger liners; it would tend to force ocean passenger rates lower; and to that extent the completion of the liner would mean, in effect, the use of public funds to subsidize the wealthy traveler. But proposals of this sort always emerge when the mere act of spending is regarded as more important than the object upon which funds are spent. If the advocates of government spending for its own sake were logical, they would deplore the efforts toward reduction of armament expenditures as a direct blow to revival. Mere consistency, however, is certainly not allowed to stand in the way of our own Administration's "recovery" program. We are capable of fervent pleas for the international reduction of the crushing economic burden of war expenditures at the same time that we begin to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on new battleships because this will "make employment."

In so far as Mr. Keynes's scheme differs from preceding proposals, its main feature is the international issue of $5,000,000,000 in "gold notes." These notes would be obtainable by the participating countries against an equal face value of the gold bonds of their governments, up to a maximum quota for each country; and the quota would be fixed, say, in proportion to the gold held in reserve by each country at the end of 1928. Now it should be immediately obvious that each country already has the power to issue "gold notes" of this sort to any volume it wishes. All that Mr. Keynes's proposal would add would be the legal provision that in each participating country the gold notes of any other participating government "would be acceptable as the equivalent of gold, except that they should not enter into the active circulation but would be held only by treasuries, central banks, or in the reserves against domestic note issues."

What Mr. Keynes proposes, in brief, is that an enormous fiction be created, that we all conspire to believe that the gold supply of the world has been doubled; that an economic miracle of transubstantiation be performed through the blessing of the World Economic Conference, so that pieces of paper be called and thought of as actual gold. Mr. Keynes might reply that this is already what we do in issuing ordinary national currencies, like Federal Reserve notes. But aside from the fact that such notes, ordinarily, are ultimately backed to more than their full value by goods in process, and that they are maintained on a parity with gold, not by any arbitrary fiction, but by free convertibility into gold, and that this parity disappears as soon as the free convertibility ceases, no one has yet suggested the issuance of Federal Reserve notes to act as a reserve against the issuance of other Federal Reserve notes!

A gold reserve against currency issues is either necessary or it is not. If it is necessary it has to be real. If it is not necessary there is no point in creating a fraudulent one. Mr. Keynes does not suggest that each of the participating nations be made jointly and severally responsible for the total issue of the gold notes; he indicates, rather, that each country will be responsible merely for its own allotment. But this means that there would be no real international issue at all, but merely a set of simultaneous national issues. All that would be necessary would be for solvent countries to accept the obligations of bankrupt countries at face value: for example, though Bolivian and Chilean bonds are selling at 12 cents on the dollar, we should agree to accept their so-called "gold notes" at 100 cents on the dollar.

The failure of such a scheme is inevitable; but fortunately the scheme is wholly unnecessary. All that Mr. Keynes hopes to achieve through it could be achieved through a simultaneous devaluation of all national currencies in terms of gold. Mr. Keynes remarks, indeed, that such a step would offer "some advantages," but believes that it "has the great defect that it would only strengthen the position of those countries which already hold large reserves of gold and are, therefore, relatively strong." But it is obvious that such a move would not necessarily improve the relative position of any country. The world's maldistribution of gold, in any case, is not to be cured directly, but indirectly. In being so concerned with this maldistribution, Mr. Keynes is guilty of the very vice he finds so "dear to the heart of conferences,"—the vice, in short, of "deploping symptoms, whilst leaving the disease untouched."

HENRY HAZLITT

Lone Poet of the Loire

André Spire and His Poetry. By Stanley Burnshaw. With a Preface by Alfred Kreymborg. Philadelphia: The Centaur Press. $3.

ANDRE SPIRE is a lonely figure—a rare thing in France, where poets run in packs, and perhaps rarer in America, where all manner of men, like bacons and coffees, are dished up beneath the label of a standard brand. Mr. Burnshaw tries his best to meet the American taste for advertised products by comparing Spire, from mood to mood, with De Vigny, Whitman, Alfred Kreymborg, Harriet Monroe, Marianne Moore, T. S. Eliot, Elinor Wylie, MacKnight Black, E. E. Cummings, et al. The lone poet by the Loire is almost lost in the crowd. Luckily, Mr. Burnshaw knows the sham of labels, and knowing Spire as few men do, he gives behind the critic's conventional patter a shrewd and true portrait of a poet who will be remembered when the schools and their stencils have long gone to their textbook tombs.

Spire's first volume of poems, a slender one, did not appear until he was thirty-four. In this bit of chronology lies, perhaps, the essence of the man. He grew to be a poet in his maturity, and he remains, above all, a poet for mature minds.

Like Bach—another label!—he may be lyric and passionate at will, but always with the severe and ripe restraint of a master. For all his melody and his sensitivity to the slightest tremor of emotion and touch of the senses, he cannot surrender the prerogative of maturity, which is to think like an unafraid, grown-up man. His music, however spontaneous and personal, rises from serene philosophic springs, fed on the old traditions of French skepticism and humanism and blended with an older Hebraic stream once known as the waters of Siloah. Not, heaven forbid, that he is an “intellectual”—he is too human and, I should say, too honest to be a Paul Valéry. Rather he is a poet (and now you may know whether you wish to read him or not) who loves all good things—justice, freedom, the workers, clouds, and the beauty of science and women—but is fooled by none of them.

Mr. Burnshaw's translations are preceded by a lengthy biography which, in the person of Spire, tours the last thirty years of French literary and intellectual history; and they are followed by a valuable essay on the structure and mechanics of French verse as illustrated by the startling discoveries of the Abbé Rousselot and his school of phoneticians—a mine of information for English readers. The translations themselves, as sensitive as any faithful rendering can be, sample the vintages of many years; and it is characteristic that, a true Meistersinger, Spire in his sixties can still sing a schönes Lied. His vineyard, like so many others along the Loire, yields better for age.

Oh wind, you who have so often caressed my face,
What will you carry from me, this blue-gray evening?
And toward what other brow
My sorrows or my dreams?

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

Marxism in France

The Beginnings of Marxian Socialism in France. By Samuel Bernstein. New York: Elliot Publishing Company. $2.

IT is a pompous university tradition, especially preposterous in the social sciences, that all doctors' dissertations are “original contributions” to human learning. That is, we are asked to believe that every February and June, or even oftener, a flock of creative savants are duly certified to enrich the world with their scholarship. Such affidavits are “granted” not merely in our half-dozen great universities but in about two score of glorified high schools. And there are probably more “doctors” produced in teachers' colleges, “graduate” schools of business and “social service,” departments of “sociology,” and other such pseudo-academic rackets than in the authentic social-science faculties of history, government, and economics.

The truth is, of course, that originality in scholarship is even rarer than in the arts. For in addition to an opposite endowment it requires a vast formal training. After all, doctoral dissertations, even when submitted to legitimate and competent faculties, are produced by comparatively immature men and women, mostly in their mid-twenties. Youth has many gifts but creative scholarship is not usually among them. To be sure, Paul Brissenden's “I. W. W.” and Abram L. Harris's “Black Worker,” both doctoral theses at Columbia, were studies of unusual breadth and penetration. But such rare exceptions only tend to stress the fact that in the appreciation of social phenomena mastery is not precocious. It is not the gathering of facts, or even their intelligent correlation, which matters. What matters is that glorified shrewdness, which is wisdom, in their evaluation which comes only from an intimate familiarity with the ways and tricks and class relations of social history. The average doctor's dissertation is but the final written test of an advanced student. As in other such examinations, say

5 per cent of such theses are good or better. Another 10 per cent are fair enough. And the rest are the sort of mental trash which explains why the rank and file of our Ph. Deocracy are such a sorry intellectual peasantry.

These considerations force themselves relevantly on the reviewer of Mr. Bernstein's thesis on “The Beginnings of Marxian Socialism in France.” The reviewer is invited, both by the history department of Columbia University and by the author, to treat this slight and dull performance as a significant contribution to social history and doctrine. It is nothing of the sort. It is neither original nor mature. The jacket and the author to the contrary, the field under research has been examined microscopically many times. The heavy apparatus of research brings forth comically a few trite and false conclusions. And the whole study is strained by an obligatory search for originality, which twists minor errors into crucial blunders.

Mr. Bernstein begins his study with the remark that “the story of the beginnings of modern socialism in France has been a neglected field. Nothing has been written in English on the subject, and in French it has been treated very briefly.” One wonders just where the author gets this notion, especially in view of the disproportionately stout bibliography he appends to his slender volume. To be sure, with the poor exception of Gide and Rist, there are no textbooks in the history of mainly French revolutionary theory. But there is an immense literature on French revolutionary political and social doctrine in the form of pamphlets, monographs, books, and especially in the vast journalistic output which characterizes all revolutionary controversy, which influenced profoundly Marx himself in his theory of revolutionary politics. The only way the author could delude himself that he was doing virgin research was by artificially delimiting “Marxism” to its most orthodox variety in the Kautskian sense, which in France played a rather minor role. It is this artificial limitation which, indeed, constitutes Mr. Bernstein's whole thesis. Yet modern socialism is a living doctrine, created by many factions and clarified by innumerable theoretical struggles. Like all great social movements, Marxism grew on its own inner oppositions, which gave it its propelling force. French syndicalism, which the author blandly neglects, is an excellent example of Marxism undergoing cultural changes under the stress of a national psychology, as was amply proved by Lewis Lorwin's treatise on the subject nineteen years ago.

To bolster up his theory that there could be no Marxian forces at work before the rise of orthodox Marxism, Mr. Bernstein has to believe that the Commune was not a proletarian rebellion at all because it was anterior to the influence of conscious orthodox Marxism in France. Into the making of the Commune, he rightly observes, went three streams of thought. They were eighteenth-century rationalism, the arrested Babouvist tendencies in the French Revolution, and the beginnings of modern socialism. Therefore, he argues, the Commune was not really a working-class uprising, and he rather dismisses Marx's justly famous pamphlet on “The Civil War in France,” in which Marx treats both the Commune and its suppression by the white terror of Thiers as an authentic class war. What else in the world was it?

All through the little book Mr. Bernstein maintains that what is not strictly orthodox Marxism, which like all orthodoxies is far too controversial for definition, is not socialism, and thus manages to confine the rise of Marxism in France to the earlier political activities of Guesde and his disciples. By such methods one can easily prove that the British Labor Party has no Socialist connotations because of its revolutionary failure. But if we mean by Marxism the growing consciousness of labor, no matter how confused or agonized, in terms of non-utopian socialism, then Marxism played an enormous role in the whole of social life in France. Even the treachery of its Socialist ministers is part of it.

In 1931 there appeared an exhaustive study on "The Labor Movement in Post-War France" by David J. Saposs. It is admittedly the standard work in any language on contemporary French socialism, syndicalism, communism, trade unionism, and the cooperative movement. Subtract the Marxian influence from it all and Mr. Saposs would have had nothing to write about. I know of no better answer to Mr. Bernstein's thesis.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Modern Music

Modern Composers. By Guido Pannain. Translated by Michael R. Bonavia. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.
Music of Our Day. Essentials and Prophecies. By Lazare Saminsky. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.

IT is difficult to see just who is likely to benefit from the publication of these two books. Those who know nothing of modern music will not find an intelligible initiation into it in either of them. And those to whom modern music is not unfamiliar will find hardly anything of importance to add to their knowledge or understanding.

The general discussion of the subject's background and artistic position with which Pannain begins each of his sketches of twelve composers—Stravinsky, Strauss, de Falla, Hindemith, Kodaly, Schönberg, Szymanowski, Ravel, Vaughan Williams, Busoni, Bloch, and Honegger—is often keen and suggestive, though rather too impressionistic to be very useful. But his critical remarks are seldom original or informing, even when they are intelligible. And the methods of discussion themselves are often useless. There is passing reference to numerous works in a way that contributes nothing at all to one's understanding of the composer. What does one learn about Szymanowski when one reads of his Studies for Pianoforte (Op. 33) that "the eighth is grave and pathetic. The ninth is like the leaping of elves; the tenth, a tremendous hurricane. The eleventh is similar to the eighth"? The occasional musical examples are often rather misleading than otherwise: "Romantic melody in Schönberg's hands becomes utterly false, as this example clearly shows." "This example," which follows, consists of nine measures of a single melodic line torn from its context and accompaniment. Clearly these nine measures can show nothing of the sort; I could take nine measures out of the Ninth Symphony or "Tristan and Isolde" that would be almost as meaningless. A chapter on American music, doubtless added for the translation, is negligible.

Saminsky's "Music of Our Day" is a greater hodge-podge of greater knowledge. If the subject matter were better organized, the erudition more purposefully and less ostentatiously displayed, the flashes of insight and critical brilliance followed up with more solid matter, its pretentious style would be less annoying. "History is bookkeeping of week days"—similar Cabellisms strut through the pages of a wandering, whimsical discussion.

Both books are incomplete and inaccurate. Pannain omits works as important as Hindemith's "Marienleben," Szymanowski's "Stabat Mater," Stravinsky's "Serenade" from his listings, and his biographical material leaves Bloch at the Cleveland Institute, from which he has been gone nearly ten years. The smaller inaccuracies of Saminsky are doubly irritating on account of his fancy style: on page 229 he refers to the "banal Oriental scale, Frigian with the augmented third"; on page 232 it is the "popular Oriental scale (Phrygian with the major third)." "Debyssian," "Lehryahre," "Fife Orchestra Pieces," "Heinrich Shütz"—sloppy editing of this sort would be less annoying in a less ornate text.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Arnold Bennett's Journal Ends

The Journal of Arnold Bennett, 1921-1928. The Viking Press. $3. (Also available in one volume instead of three, of which this is the third, at $5.)

ARNOLD BENNETT lived sixty-four years. He wrote dozens of novels and plays, literally thousands of articles for magazines and newspapers; his aim, in fact, which he faithfully achieved year after year, was to do a stint of 1,000 words a day. He dined out often and entertained many visitors in his own house; he went to plays, heard music, played the piano, danced a great deal in his last years, enjoyed the society of a number of women and a large number of men, most of them well-known literary men. In the course of thirty-odd years of furious activity, mainly literary and journalistic, he wrote two novels which can be placed with the small group of English novels of the first rank. If this seems like a great deal of writing for the production of two great novels only, let us not complain too bitterly. "Clayhanger" and "The Old Wives' Tale" remain. They were drawn from the inner hatreds that Arnold Bennett's childhood engendered: hatred of poverty, mainly, as exemplified in the life of the five pottery towns. All his life Arnold Bennett tried to escape from his childhood. He escaped by writing the five-towns novels; he escaped by knowing the best, that is, the richest or most illustrious, people, by making money, by owning a yacht, by living in luxurious hotels. Into his journal, the record of his daily life for thirty-two years, he poured all these attempts to escape. He showed himself as a complete man, with all the talents, vices, shortcomings, and spurts of generosity that he, Arnold Bennett, that unique human being, had. His journal is indispensable for anyone who aspires to write novels; it is indispensable for anyone who likes to see a character full-drawn, whether in truth or fiction. That he often showed himself trivial, boorish, grasping, makes the character study only the more interesting; for he showed himself also to have at least one large, persistent, unquenchable virtue, namely, devotion to his calling. And these volumes of his journal place him among the great diarists of any time.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Mr. Fry on French Art

Characteristics of French Art. By Roger Fry. Coward-McCann. $3.75.

TO say something original about a subject on which countless volumes have been written is no easy task. And yet Roger Fry, with his characteristic talent for seeing below the surface of things, has succeeded in making a profound and, since he also has a flair for expressing himself vividly, a delightful book of his observations. His style is simple and terse—a refreshing holiday from the discursive jabber of the average art critic—and his thought is never garbled or obscure. At times, it is true, his critical vocabulary, by virtue of the service it performs, is technical; but only reasonably so. There is no cause for any reader with even a rudimentary knowledge of the material under discussion to find this a stumbling-block.

In general plan—but in no other way—this book closely resembles Clive Bell's recent book on the same subject. Roger Fry seeks to determine what are the qualities most characteristic of the French genius, to trace their origin, and to show the numerous contradictory forms they have assumed from the early thirteenth century until the death of Cézanne at the beginning of the present century. It is obviously impossible to treat seven centuries of French art exhaustively in a little under 45,000 words, and Mr. Fry does not attempt it. But all things considered, the gain in precision and brevity more than offsets whatever abbreviations or omissions were necessary.

In his opening chapter Mr. Fry defines, as we suggested, the dualistic nature of the French genius. He finds that "the French are on the one hand singularly aware of life, and on the other capable of a great detachment from it, an intense love of the free exercise of the mind." Nor is he foolhardy enough to make a law of a generalization. He is fully aware, for example, that while the painter Chardin gave plastic interpretations to the middle-class world in which he lived, Poussin, who was the "slave of rhetorical conventions," could only see the world through the veil of classical antiquity. He also takes cognizance of the fact that Géricault and Delacroix exemplify "neither the alert consciousness of actual life nor the passion for ordered construction." "If one had to choose one artist as the typical representative of the French genius, I for one should choose Degas."

He makes this statement with his eyes open to Degas's shortcomings. "He lacked," Roger Fry argues, "the special sensuality of the painter. He was not in love with the material quality of objects but only with an almost intellectual abstract of them." Unerringly Mr. Fry strikes at the core of whatever happens at the moment to be in the focus of his vision. I could cite many examples, but two will suffice: "Ingres's supreme gift is his astonishing feeling for contour"; his weakness, "his incapacity to apprehend more than a single volume at a time." Another instance of Mr. Fry's perspicacity is to be found in his analysis of Delacroix: "What is original with Delacroix is the idea of a knot of agitated forms surrounded by space." However, "he never seems to perform the miracle of the real colorist who creates a chord which means more than the sum of all its elements."

It would be indeed unfortunate if, for any reason, this book failed to receive the reception it deserves. Mr. Fry, as I have tried to indicate, has a comprehensive understanding of his subject and writes with a fine, analytical clarity. His text is generously illustrated.

E. M. BENSON

Shorter Notices

Julia Newberry's Diary. With an Introduction by Margaret Ayer Barnes and Janet Ayer Fairbank. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

The journal of a young Chicago girl from her sixteenth to her eighteenth year, that is, from 1869 to 1871. Julia went to Europe, which she disliked, came back to Chicago, which she loved, met on her travels many interesting and famous persons, and in her diary was perfectly frank in her comments about their appearance and character. She reveals herself as a sort of Daisy Ashford grown up; a very astute Daisy Ashford, with an astonishingly adult taste in literature. A traveler in Europe, she was by no means unaware of the stirring events which in 1870 were rocking portions of that continent; the Chicago fire was to her a desperate personal loss instead of a moment in history. Her journal is a refreshing and amusing mixture, therefore, of the enthusiasms of sixteen with the experiences ordinarily more common to an older mind. Accepting it as it is offered, as the authentic diary of a sixteen-year-old girl written sixty years ago, one can only wish that Julia had lived to write more.

World Panorama: 1918-1933. By George Seldes. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

This work is certainly not history, though it is packed with history. Nor can it properly be called journalism, for it has not the straightaway, well-balanced interpretative style of the good journalist. Perhaps it would be best to call it machine-gun journalism. It is made up mostly of news-flashes. Facts gleaned from the headlines are shot at the reader in breathless, relentless fashion. For example: "The year 1932 goes down in history as the worst since 1893, according to United States Census Bureau. The villages Monte San Giacomo and Sassano refuse to pay taxes; Mussolini sends fascist militia to collect. Stalin orders soldiers to force kulaki to pay grain tax. American customs suppress soviet posters addressed to Thomas Lamont by son Corliss Lamont, who went Communist." And so it blazes away, covering, as it seems, all the recorded facts of human activity from the end of the World War to the departure of the United States from the gold standard. Yet the work has about it a certain unity and purpose, though this unity and purpose do no more than sum up the political, economic, social, and spiritual confusion of the last fourteen years. Despite his rattling style Mr. Seldes rarely becomes boring; and despite his speed, for he is covering the whole world and must move rapidly, Mr. Seldes still has time to drop a cynical remark now and then which has the effect of clearing the atmosphere and revealing much of the sham of the age in which we are living.

Selected Poems of George Edward Woodberry. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $2.50.

Selected Letters of George Edward Woodberry. Edited by Walter De La Mare. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $3.50.

As a critic George Edward Woodberry, within the limits of his academicism, was intelligent and perspicacious, if not very original. As a poet he showed even greater academicism, and though at times—as in The Sicilian—he is salty and pointed, he wrote generally in the deep shadow of traditional and reflected emotions. It is the fate of many teachers to be greater in their personalities than in their talents and intellects, and no written achievement quite does credit to their influence. Woodberry was preeminent among such men. If his niche in American literature is narrow and if it is doubtful that his reprinted poems "will win favor with a new generation of readers," he occupied a broad place in the hearts of those who knew and were taught by him. Few teachers have had such continued, sincere, and gracious tokens of gratitude as the Woodberry Society and, during the war, the Woodberry Ambulance. His letters show him to have been a brave man and an almost saintly one. The new America frightened and bullied him, and very early the letters take on an elegiac strain. To meet the stress of a new world he had only the weapons of courtesy, courage, friendship, and the emotional attitudes of a past time. These could not save him from frustration of a kind but they invested his defeat with dignity.

The Gloomy Egoist: Moods and Themes of Melancholy from Gray to Keats. By Eleanor M. Sickels. Columbia University Press. $4.75.

The themes of death, ruin, and mutability have always been prevalent in English literature; Anglo-Saxon is at its best when it uses them, and the poetry of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is saturated with them. The chief purpose of Miss Sickels's thorough and scholarly book is to show the connection between this convention of melancholy "sensitivity" and the Weltschmerz of the romantic poets. From a purely literary point of view—by the adduction of influences and the comparison of literary "properties" such as graves, ruins, owls, and so forth—she establishes the connection admirably. But she does not attempt to answer the wider question of why the melancholy of the nineteenth century had relevance and reality enough to make great poetry, while its earlier counterpart was, with a few notable exceptions, productive only of dullness.

WHEN YOU GROPE FOR A WORD USE

Roget's International THESAURUS

"Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

Now $3 Copy

from CROWELL'S

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

FILMS

FILMS

COMMENCING FRIDAY, JUNE 30—FOR ONE WEEK
American Premier of Soviet's GREAT MASTERPIECE

"TWENTY-SIX COMMISSARS"

"Class history on parade, I am proud of it. Ranks with our great films."—PUDOVKIN.

"A Beethoven Symphony."—DOVZHENKO. (English Titles.)

ACME THEATRE 14th ST. and UNION SQ.

Midnight Show Every Sunday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

BIOGRAPHY. Avon Theater. An intelligent and sinewy comedy about what happens when a cultivated woman of the world tries to choose between a pompous opportunist and an unmanageable idealist. (Last week ends July 1st.)

BOTH YOUR HOUSES. Guild Theater. With the help of the Theater Guild's excellent production, Maxwell Anderson provides a hilarious evening. (Last week ends July 1st.)

ONE SUNDAY AFTERNOON. 48th Street Theater. Unpretentious comedy about a small town dentist. A surprise hit.

A REMINDER

Our readers are looking for

SUMMER HOMES, VACATION HOTELS AND CAMPS
SUMMER PLACES FOR CHILDREN AND OTHER SORTS OF ACCOMMODATIONS FOR THE SUMMER

If you have any to rent, or sell, tell them about it in the advertising columns of THE NATION.

Rates: 1/2-inch (30 words) minimum $3.08

Additional lines of 6 words, each .62

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York City

Due to the Holiday next week, classified ads must be in our hands Friday, June 30 for the issue appearing July 6 (dated July 12)

Films

The Bogy of Hollywood

REPORTING on Edward G. Robinson's "Little Giant" a few weeks ago, this column pointed out, with mild alarm, that this most recent and probably last of the gangster films reflected a barbarism of moral and social values more complete than that of any other picture viewed this season. Particular references were made to a scene of brutal physical torture and to a use of underworld vocabulary so uninhibited that it was hard to believe the picture had been passed by any board of censors. In the meantime there has come from the presses a book about the Hollywood movie so devastating in its arrangement of facts and statistics, so challenging in its final conclusions, that very little more need be said on the subject for some time. "Our Movie-Made Children"* is actually a kind of popular summary by Henry James Forman of the results of the four-year survey carried out by the Motion Picture Research Council, working under the Payne fund, for the purpose of determining the effects of movie attendance on children and young people. The group of scientists, psychologists, sociologists, and educators specially selected for the task have recorded their findings in twelve separate reports, not all of which have yet appeared, and what Mr. Forman has done is to give us the substance of these reports in a more convenient and possibly more correlated form. His book is plainly intended for parents, teachers, and others interested in the young; its pages are too full of statistics to be found very entertaining by the casual reader; and to some readers its conclusions will seem so obvious as to be in little need of the elaborate support which is built up for them. The importance of the book, as a matter of fact, lies not so much in the novelty of its materials as in the thoroughly scientific manner in which they are arranged and presented. For the first time it establishes a groundwork of factual reference for the often uninformed diatribes of ministers, educators, and others who have railed against Hollywood standards since the beginning. It sets up a formidable picket fence of statistics which Hollywood must cut through if it is to hold its own with a large section of the movie-going public. According to Variety, which is itself a register of popular response, certain producers are already talking of organizing a staff of equally well-trained experts to refute some of the facts in the Payne investigation.

After offering the moderate estimate that there are 77,000,000 people in the United States who attend the movies at least once a week, and that of these at least 28,000,000 are under twenty-one years of age, Mr. Forman endeavors to sum up for us the different effects of this attendance as measured by the various Payne investigators. By means of the hypnograph, for example, one of the chief physical effects was determined, namely, an increased restlessness in sleep of about 26 per cent over normal for boys and of about 14 per cent for girls. Emotional effects were measured largely by means of the psycho-galvanometer, which showed that in the case of ordinary danger pictures the intensity of emotional reaction of adolescents is twice as great as that of adults, and that of younger children three times that of adults. Pulse and heart beat were found to increase at times to double the normal rate. For the most interesting portions of their research, those concerned with social and ethical effects, the investigators were of course lacking in such convenient instruments of measurement and were forced to rely on questionnaires, autobiographical accounts, and testimonials. Inmates of prisons, reform schools, and homes for delinquent girls were among those called upon to give evidence against the movies.

* The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

as a school for crime and delinquency. Several young criminals admitted to having learned their techniques from the screen; as many as thirty-one such techniques were listed by one of the members of the committee. Similarly, many of the girl inmates in institutions for sex delinquents attributed their downfall to the alluring version of luxury and vice presented on the screen. Perhaps the climax of Mr. Forman's analysis of the strong "imitative appeal" of the movies is reached when he cites the example of "Little Caesar," a picture whose influence is held responsible for no less than two murders involving young admirers of Edward G. Robinson's scowling little gang leader.

In general, the elements in that situation are set down in this book with considerable care, fairness, and restraint. Except in one or two instances there is no effort to substitute a priori conclusions for an adequate presentation of facts. The only striking instance of the sort is the treatment of the question whether the "moral endings" of certain crime pictures do not serve to cancel out some of their incidental effects and in some cases act as a deterrent to imitation. It does seem probable that for the average spectator over nine years old the horrible fates meted out to the chief characters in films like "Public Enemy" and "Little Caesar" should do much to reduce whatever attractiveness they may possess. In approaching this question, however, the Payne investigators chose to address themselves to the inmates of penal institutions, to a class which was already habituated to crime and so little likely to make a normal moral response. It should also be remarked that Mr. Forman attacks the movies for using themes and subjects which have been used by literature and drama from time immemorial. The disgusting "trinity of love, sex, and crime," to which Mr. Forman refers as if it were some invention by Cecil B. De Mille or Adolf Zukor, has actually provided the subject matter of serious drama from Aeschylus to Eugene O'Neill. In his implied attitude toward these themes, as well as in his expressed taste in movie productions ("Ben Hur" and "The Covered Wagon" are among his chief favorites), Mr. Forman reveals the chief weakness not only of his own position but of the whole type of mentality that engages in such concentrated assaults on different forms of contemporary expression. It is the sort of weakness that comes out naively in Mr. Forman's remark, following a discussion of sixteen- and seventeen-year-old girl delinquents: "That they were possessed of a propensity to sexual experience is entirely likely." It is the sort of weakness that leads Mr. Forman to believe that the purpose of the films should be "to build up rather than break down the principles of conduct which have made the American nation." In other words, Mr. Forman is for preserving our innocence by an ostrich-like policy of burying our heads beneath the wreckage of the twentieth-century world.

The real answer to the problem so elaborately outlined in this work is that there can be no salvation for the movies or for the children who go to them until the civilization which produces both decides to do something about itself. Love, sex, and crime are treated as they are in the current Hollywood films because, whatever else we may think of them, those films reflect the main interests and tendencies of contemporary American life. And if they are treated so often with vulgarity, stupidity, and a complete absence of all traditional values, the fault is not so much with Hollywood as with the world which Hollywood mirrors on its silver screen. If that world is not a fit spectacle for a child to contemplate, it is no more fit for an adult, and nothing in it will be improved by pretending that it is otherwise. "Our Movie-Made Children" is chiefly interesting and valuable as another case-report, by a group of specialists, of a malady that is so profound and complex that no single remedy can be prescribed.

WILLIAM TROY

OPEN SHELF

Henry George Books
Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men.—sent free.
None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
16 Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

CURIOUS BOOKS
Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed Unexpurgated Items Exotically Illustrated Limited Editions
THE FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. N, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York

LANGUAGES

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Ave. HARlem 7-8446.

SUMMER BOARD WANTED

GENTLEMAN of spirit, literary, American-Jewish, wishes to be paying guest of congenial persons with summer place on lake, convenient to New York. Box 194, c/o The Nation.

POSITION WANTED

COLLEGE graduate, accurate knowledge French, bookkeeping, stenography; literary; wishes position author, publisher, translator. Will travel. Box 195, c/o The Nation.

FOR SUMMER

FOR RENT

GREENWOOD LAKE, Gross Farm, 11 rooms, all improvements, private swimming pool, lake privilege, fishing, tennis. Very moderate rental. Tel. Greenwood 81.

BUNGALOW, Watchung Mts., 45 minutes from New York. Three bedrooms, sleeping porch, large living room, fireplace, all conveniences. Tennis, handball, swimming pool. $225 to Nov. 15. P. O. Box 155, Plainfield, or phone SLocum 6-8200, Superintendent.

SUBLET APARTMENTS

231 EAST 48th ST. Cool, attractively furnished seven room apartment overlooking Turtle Bay Gardens. Three master bedrooms, piano, books. Electric refrigeration. Low rental for Summer. Tel. daytime COrtlandt 7-3330.

UNTIL Sept.; young woman share furnished modern two room apartment; separate entrances, complete privacy; radio, piano; kitchen: $30 monthly. 136 W. 4th St., near Washington Square; GRamercy 7-8659, mornings before 9, or apply Superintendent.

APT.—ROOM—AT SHORE

MANHATTAN BEACH. Beautiful gardens, private tennis, garage, bathing, share 4-room house or sublet room. Box 193, c/o The Nation.

SHARE APARTMENT

YOUNG MAN share beautifully furnished 3 room apartment, 197th St. corner Grand Concourse. Phone Sunday between 9 A.M. and 1 P.M. RAYmond 9-6271. $17.00 monthly. Rare opportunity. References.

PERSONAL

GENTLEMAN, cultured Radio singer, seeks accompanist: mutual practice (Jewish). Musical congenial companion. Box 192, c/o The Nation.

RESORTS

SPEND your vacations and weekends at the seashore. Good bracing walks, or complete rest. Very comfortable accommodations and the very best food tastefully prepared. Exceptionally low rates. Reibers Cottage, Belle Harbor, L. I. Bell Harbor 5-0089.

OWNER (Gentile) of luxurious private estate on beautiful lake in Adirondacks, accommodating restricted number of guests. Superior cuisine. Water sports, boating. Golf and saddle horses nearby. Low rates. Box 122, Blue Mountain Lake, Hamilton Co., N. Y.

NEW CIVILIZATION VEGETARIAN CAMP

On Beautiful Mt. Olive, Flanders, N. J. Only 42 miles from city. Rates, $14 per week. Semi-nudist. A place to spend a natural, peaceful, health-building vacation. Write to Dr. Walter Siegmeister, Mt. Olive, Flanders, N. J. Ask for free sample copy of "The Dawn," periodical on Scientific Nutrition.

CAMP DAVIS, Budd Lake, N. J. Ideal for nature lovers; vegetarian; enjoy outdoor and water sports; sleeping in tents. SPECIAL 4th of July weekend, 4 days, $8. $2.50 per day. Make reservations now. Tel. Wisconsin 7-5860 or LOnacre 5-8071. $15 per week. Special rates for the season.

FOR persons afflicted with GOOD TASTE and SMALL MEANS—beautiful modern country home offers hospitality that is different. Food with that continental flavor. Per day $4. Week $25. THE OLD ORCHARD, West Lane Road, Ridgefield Conn. Phone: 827.

THE BIRCHES, Warrensburg, N. Y. Three minutes to Echo Lake and Indian Head Camp. Home cooking and fresh vegetables. $14 per week, two in room. Mrs. Ed. Noble.

CHILDREN—SUMMER

MEADOWBROOK CAMP, unharrassed summer for 12 children, 4 to 10. Comfortable house. Brook Farm. Barns. Art equipment. $75 monthly. June 1—Sept. 15. Also parttime. V. Hochman, Teacher (Bureau of Educational Experiments). Address Flatbrookville, N. J.

RESORTS

RESORTS

RESORTS

Come to COIPAKIE "THE ISLAND PARADISE"

CRARYVILLE, N. Y.

FORE!
FOR JULY 4

Four glorious days and five hilarious nights of stirring sport and splendid entertainment.

PRIZE TOURNAMENTS
CARNIVAL : CONCERT
COMEDY : REVUE

Our own sporty 18 hole GOLF COURSE on premises.

Join the July 4th Special

REDUCED R. R. FARE Booklet and Road Map on Request

N. Y. Office: 116 Nassau St.
BEekman 3-9620

3 hours from Grand Central

COOK'S FALLS LODGE

COOK'S FALLS, N. Y.

invites you to participate in the Grand Opening of its SWIMMING POOL

July 4th weekend, as low as $12.50 for 4 days, including Banquet. All sports.
Reduced railroad fare $5.50 round trip.

Stop at the Best Spend the Least

Special Rates for June

R. R. Roscoe, N. Y. Tel. Roscoe 2 F13

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y.

Phone: ■■■

Formerly a millionaire's estate. 150 acres, most beautifully landscaped. Private lake. All sport facilities on premises; saddle horses and nearby golf. Many attractions. 1½ hours Erie R. R. or Route 17.

OPEN ALL YEAR

THE GROUP

Has transferred its social activities for the summer to . . .

TIMBERLAND

For Information and Booklet

In The Adirondacks

Address: Timberland, 33 West 42 St., N. Y. C.
Telephone: PENnsylvania 6-7663

THE HOMESTEAD

Community Church Summer Colony

A beautiful rustic retreat, combining relaxation in the country with a forum for serious consideration of social problems.

WEEK-END CONFERENCES AND LECTURES
ACCREDITED ART COURSES
EXCELLENT TENNIS, HANDBALL, SWIMMING
Operated on "guest co-operation" plan on non-profit rates: $3-$3.50 day; $15-$17.50 week. Reservations. Write—Homestead, Crafts, N. Y.; phone Mahopac 2257.

AVON-BY-THE-SEA, N. J. 2nd house from Beach. Jewish American table. American plan. Modern conveniences. Reasonable rates. Rubin's, 25 Woodland Ave. Tel. Asbury Park 9110.

The indescribable splendour of an Adirondack vacation at a most modern and complete adult camp. Featuring Group Theatre. Golf.

REDUCED RATES
Special July 4th Week-end Excursion
BOOKLET ON REQUEST
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
11 W. 42 ST., N. Y. CH. 4-1345

GREEN MANSIONS

WARRENSBURG N.Y.

SCAROON MANOR

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

Hotel Comforts. Complete Social Staff
COUNTRY CLUB INFORMALITY
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
NINE CLAY TENNIS COURTS
FOUR HANDBALL COURTS

ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y. JOS. FRIEBER

ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

Charming

UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

UNCAS LODGE

IN THE BEAUTIFUL CONNECTICUT HILLS

A real farm with all modern camp activities

Lowest rates were quoted

Make reservations now for our

SPECIAL 4th OF JULY WEEK-END

full days $12.00

Write ■ Uncasville, Conn., or

Phone Pres. 3-9824

Send for Booklet

BROOKWOOD LABOR COLLEGE

(Katonah, N. Y.)

■ open to summer guests. An interesting place to spend your vacation, within commuting distance of New York City. Tennis, swimming, hiking, unique labor library, good food. Rates $14.50 to $18.50 weekly; special season and week-end rates. Stimulating series of summer conferences. Write for folder.

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn. On Lake Housatonic. 70 miles from New York. Beautiful surroundings. Tennis, boating, bathing, fishing. Excellent meals. July 4th weekend rate $3.50 per day. Derby 231-2. R. R. Sta. Derby.

Walden

formerly SCOPUS
The GLORIOUS VACATIONLAND

LAST CALL

for the Walden Camp Cruise! Boat sails 6 P.M. June 30th; 4 days at camp, and fare and outside stateroom included. Phone now!

ALL-EXPENSES 4 DAYS 25

For Glorious July Vacations

Come to Walden, the Adult Camp of Distinction, on beautiful Trou Lake. Every sport and social activity, unexcelled cuisine. Rates exceptionally low. For illustrated booklet, address:

CAMP WALDEN

P. O. LAKE GEORGE, NEW YORK

New York City Office:

11 WEST 42nd ST. Penn 6-8565

A Modern Camp
for Adults

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group

JULY RATE $27.50

Superior Cuisine
Golf

Booklet on Request

33 W. 42nd St.
Penn. 6-7663

Round Trip Fare $7.85
In De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren Co.

MOON HILL

■ Schroon Lake, The Adirondacks

Attractive June ■■■. New low ■■■ for July and August. Now booking.
Write for booklet.

Dietary laws strictly observed

SARAH SOLOMON, Pottersville, N. Y.
N. Y. Office: 11 W. 42d St. PENN 6-1720

Quiet, charming vacation place for limited number of grown ups with artistic and literary interests. Modest rates. Ask for circular.

CAMP ARTEMIS
BREWSTER NEW YORK

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HIL-BERT HOUSE

Lake Mahopac New York
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 95

COLONY HOUSE, Mohegan Colony, Peekskill, N. Y. On Bronx River Parkway. Excellent food, spacious grounds, lake sports, commuting distance. Rates $16 per week, $3 day. Also accommodations for families and weekenders. Tel. Peekskill 2733. Colony Bus at station.

TOPSTONE FARM

For a delightful vacation or week-end in the hills, restful, secluded, in charming woodland country now at special rates. Saddle-horses on the place, instruction. R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 648.

FOUNDED 1865

No. 3549

internal price level, the leading currencies would incidentally, and permanently, be stabilized in terms of one another. The world's producers and merchants could then make plans with genuine confidence.

THE PRESIDENT desires to go beyond this and to fix a price level that shall be stable for at least a generation. This is an admirable aim, but any realistic mind must recognize that the difficulties in the way are enormous. The nearest to a serious proposal along this line has been "the compensated dollar" of Professor Irving Fisher or some modification of it. Most economists are agreed, however, that if such a plan were adopted by any country acting alone it would raise far more serious difficulties than it would solve. If it were adopted internationally it would have a much better chance; but its success would depend upon a spirit of continuous international cooperation that the world has not remotely approached. It must, therefore, remain for the present in the realm of academic discussion. The need of the moment is the return to a new fixed gold level for the dollar, not more than 25 or 30 per cent below the old gold parity, with corresponding devaluation in other currencies. If Mr. Roosevelt wishes to see whether some plan cannot be devised to keep the new price level fixed, let him appoint some monetary expert of the caliber of E. W. Kemmerer or O. M. W. Sprague to serve as the American representative on an international commission containing similar experts from other countries, and give this commission at least a year to bring in its findings. But by not the wildest stretch of the imagination can a workable plan of this radical nature be brought forth in the next few months from a conference in which the American representatives are men of the type of ex-Governor Cox and Senator Pittman, who know as little about currency as they do about the tensor calculus or the quantum theory.

ERNEST GRUENING
HENRY HAZLITT

FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL
MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S pronouncement to the World Economic Conference was described in the first dispatches as a "bombshell," and it certainly bore a similarity to one in that his statement seemed to fly off in every direction and that it may be found actually to have blown up the conference. Wholly apart from its content, its summary and scolding tone was extremely unfortunate; such a tone can only provoke foreign resentment. In content the statement was muddled and confusing. Mr. Roosevelt is right in holding that a temporary stabilization of a paper dollar in terms of a paper pound or even of the franc is not an objective worth attaining. He is right again in not wishing to return to the old gold parity for the dollar. But he is dangerously wrong in clinging to a policy of drift and uncertainty, in leaving the dollar, in effect, to the mercies of foreign-exchange speculators, in failing to fix a definite percentage of devaluation, or to announce a definite date—even if it is a year or more from now—when gold convertibility at the new level will be resumed. The latter policy would not tie the dollar to any other currency, but to gold; yet if the British and other nations were encouraged to follow a similar policy, adopting whatever new gold value they deemed necessary for their own

THE MUDDLE-HEADEDNESS of official Washington's economy program, which we commented on in our last issue, becomes more evident as the government continues to cut off employees and send them forth to the bread lines in order that the various departments may be conducted on the reduced scale of expenditures decreed for the new fiscal year. This taking money out of one pocket to put in another—this discharge of old employees in organized, useful services in order to "relieve unemployment" by creating new work of uncertain worth—is at once one of the most ridiculous and shameful aspects of the Roosevelt program. Unlike commercial business, the federal government does not have to conduct its work on a profit-and-loss basis. It has ample power to raise money either by loans or by new taxation, and it should do both in order to maintain to the full all of its useful work. Relief of unemployment is more important than a balanced budget. Of course there are some services, like that devoted to prohibition enforcement, where changing conditions call for reduced personnel, but as we suggested last week, all workers thus eliminated should be transferred to some of the new unemployment-relief organizations before Postmaster General Farley is allowed to pack them with party henchmen. In many ways the Washington unemployment program appears to be a large-scale attack upon the civil service in order to create an army of exempt jobs for Democratic heelers. The country ought to demand of Mr. Roosevelt that not a single federal employee be discharged for "economy."

IN ADDITION TO THE INDECENCY of turning existing government employees out into the street while setting up feed troughs for Pap Dispenser Farley's "deserving Democrats," the new situation is playing beautifully into the hands of the militarists. The War Department has been callous enough about discharging certain workers, but it is putting up a pathetic plea to the Public Works Administration to give it $53,000,000 for the purchase of munitions in order that 5,000 technicians in various arsenals may not have to be dropped. We are all for retaining the technicians, but we can conceive of a number of contributions they might make to the welfare of this country which we should put ahead of fabricating new weapons of war. Meanwhile Secretary of the Navy Swanson, not satisfied with an allowance of $238,000,000 for new war vessels, is out with a jingoistic statement calling for development all along the line. Wholly at variance with what the United States professes to be trying to accomplish in the way of peace and international accord at Geneva and London, Mr. Swanson calls for a navy "second to none," and—in spite of the enmity and commercial loss which such a policy has brought us in Latin America—repeats the old big-stick swagger about a fleet to "protect American lives and property." Mr. Swanson's program might be compatible with the ambitions of Hitlerism, but it has no place in the policy of any enlightened modern state.

THAT THE ADMINISTRATION, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is lending $4,000,000 to Soviet Russia for the purchase of American cotton is doubly heartening news. For economically it points to the resumption of trade with Russia on a large scale, and politically it points to long-overdue recognition. Logically, of course, such recognition should have preceded the loan; for the United States government is now in the rather absurd position of lending money to a foreign government that it still refuses to recognize. This, perhaps, will make no great practical difference if the recognition is soon forthcoming. The new loan to Russia, however, does raise again certain primary questions about our foreign economic policy. At the World Economic Conference we have been talking nationalism and isolation, yet here we make a new bid for foreign trade. The nationalists, whose strong point is certainly not consistency, will doubtless argue that this is purely export trade and not import trade. But that raises the question of our whole tariff and loan policy. We are lending $4,000,000 to Russia now to buy our cotton. How is Russia going to repay this $4,000,000? There is only one way: through selling $4,000,000 worth of goods. Are we, then, going to try to keep these goods out? Are we going to maintain prohibitive tariffs or embargoes on "convict goods" in the fear that the products of cheap Russian labor will throw American labor out of work? Are we, in short, going to refuse to accept payment of our loan in the only form in which it can be paid, on the ground that such payment will ruin us? Or will we be at last prepared to recognize that all foreign trade must be two-sided?

IT IS NO LONGER NEWS that multi-millionaires like Otto H. Kahn paid no federal income taxes in 1930, 1931, and 1932—when they were proclaiming that "sharing doesn't hurt." More interesting were Mr. Kahn's testimony before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee that the investment banker has a professional relation to his client like that of a physician to his patient, and his view that "Dr. Kuhn, Loeb and Company is a pretty good doctor to go to." Readers of Max Lowenthal's recent volume, "The Investor Pays," which deals authoritatively with the wrecking of the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railroad, may conclude that Kuhn, Loeb's services in that case more closely resembled those of the mortician. And with perhaps unintentional pertinence Mr. Pecora began the investigation with questions concerning the $90,000,000 of Chilean bonds floated between 1925 and 1929 chiefly by that banking house and the Guaranty Company. The bonds are now in default and have shrunk about 90 per cent in value. Mr. Pecora produced a memorandum from Kuhn, Loeb's files showing that ten months before the first flotation in June, 1925, a coup d'état had overthrown the constitutional government of Chile and that a group of military and naval officers had seized control. This clique had in turn been ousted in January, 1925, and been replaced by another group of military. "Did you make any examination into the political situation there?" asked Mr. Pecora, indicating his belief that a country in revolution was scarcely a good risk. "How can anyone make a study of the political situation of another country?" was the reply of Benjamin J. Bittenwieser of Kuhn, Loeb and Company.

CHARGES of a most sensational nature have been placed before Judge Harry B. Keidan of Detroit, who is inquiring into the causes of the Detroit bank panic of last February. This panic and the Michigan bank holiday, it will be remembered, set off the financial panic that swept the country in the first week of March. Herbert R. Wilkin, vice-president of one of the closed banks, testified that the First National and Guardian National were forced to close, in his opinion, as the result of "a Wall Street plot to get Henry Ford." He also charged that checks totaling $4,000,000 were cleared through these banks after the Governor had proclaimed a State-wide holiday. William F. Connolly, receiver for the Detroit Bankers Company, a holding concern, told Judge Keidan he believed the Detroit panic was precipitated by New York bankers in order to "narrow down and control in a few banks the bank credit of the whole nation." He said that the First National could reopen "tomorrow" and "pay its depositors 100 per cent." Another witness declared that the Guardian National could pay 83 per cent if it were to reopen immediately. To date the banks have paid out about 40 per cent. Several other charges of like nature have been put before Judge Keidan. The investigation has raised any number of questions. If the banks are really as liquid as Connolly and others have declared, why are they not reopened? And why is a State judge instead of the federal Department of Justice undertaking this inquiry? The principal banks involved are national associations; the receivers for these houses, who have refused to testify on the ground that Judge Keidan has no jurisdiction, are in effect federal officials. About three months ago a Department of Justice representative was assigned to investigate the Detroit situation. What has become of him? Has he ever filed a report? If so, what has been done with the report? Attorney General Cummings and the Treasury Department can answer these questions. They should do so frankly and at once. To remain silent in the face of these sensational disclosures is to undermine public confidence in the banks.

NO MORE PERTINENT challenge to the Roosevelt Administration has been made than that in the pithy retort of Nugent Dodds, Assistant Attorney General under Mr. Hoover, to the caustic question of Senator Neely, Democrat, on the opening day of the Harriman Bank hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Senator from West Virginia had asked why the previous Administration had covered up the defalcations and had stayed the prosecution of Joseph W. Harriman for nine months after false entries had been found on the bank's books. Mr. Dodds replied: "If you think that there is any virtue in either political party so far as national banks are concerned, you have a lot to learn."

ONE OF THE TRAGEDIES of an industrial disintegration such as that which the United States has been experiencing is that even if recovery comes, some of the losses will have to be carried on the national ledger for years to come. Curtailments in education, especially, will affect the long future more than the immediate present. So we urge our readers, when obliged to cut contributions to various causes, to keep up to the last their support of progressive labor education as the most important element of hope for the future, whether the country is destined to sink further into industrial coma or to evolve into "controlled capitalism." We wish success to the effort to raise a fund to save the People's House of New York City—the home of the Rand School and other Socialist activities—and we bespeak support for Brookwood Labor College at Katonah, New York, in its reorganization for continued usefulness. Tucker P. Smith, the new director, is not involved in any factional disputes within the ranks of labor, and is working on a plan to increase the extension activities of the school so as to "bring workers' education to those who cannot come to Brookwood." Nor would we neglect to say a word for Commonwealth College at Mena, Arkansas, which has just completed its tenth year as a work-study school where students get board and tuition for $40 a quarter.

BY A MAJORITY VOTE the Board of Education of New York City has dismissed two teachers of excellent character and good teaching records, Isidore Begun and Mrs. Williana Burroughs. Both of these teachers were present at the open hearing of the Board of Education on May 24. They were charged with having taken part in the demonstration precipitated on that occasion by the board's refusal to grant an open hearing of the charges against Isidore Blumberg, dismissed probationary teacher, and by the presence of numerous policemen and plain-clothes men. It is difficult not to see this action of the board as one more step in its campaign to suppress free speech and intelligent civic spirit among teachers. Mr. Begun has been an active member of the Teachers' Union, a moving spirit in the Unemployed Teachers' Association, and a courageous and outspoken critic of some of the board's policies. The brutal decision depriving him and Mrs. Burroughs—mother of a family of young children—of their livelihood was reached under a procedure in which the law committee of the offended board was plaintiff, jury, and judge. We hope that this decision will be appealed and that teachers' organizations will make united and effective protest against it. All teachers are menaced if any teacher can be ousted in this high-handed and ruthless fashion for exercising his rights as a citizen.

The Public's Uphill Fight

EVERY State has become a battle ground for lower gas and electric rates, with the long-suffering public engaged in an uphill fight against the utilities, which in addition to their vast financial resources are generally buttressed by the public authorities—executive, legislative, and judicial. The State public-utilities commission is, at the very best, a feeble neutral. More often it weights the scales in favor of the power companies. The skirmishing on the Sioux City sector, described elsewhere in this issue, is typical of the obstructions which the people have to overcome.

In New York State, hearings before the Public Service Commission during the past few weeks have brought out the time-worn story of excessive profits, padded rate bases, swollen salaries for executives, bookkeeping legerdemain. In the New York area the gas and electric monopoly during the depression year 1932 averaged a return of 8.3 per cent on "net worth." This is a venerable joker. "Net worth" was defined as "capital stock plus surplus." This percentage, per se excessive, becomes infinitely more so when one looks beneath the surface at the "write-ups," the modern equivalent of stock watering, and other forms of inflation upon which this percentage was calculated.

As for salaries in the Consolidated Gas-Edison group, we find F. W. Smith drawing three totaling $75,000, as president of the New York Edison, president of the United Electric Light and Power, and chairman of the board of the New York and Queens Electric Light and Power Company. Ellis L. Phillips is likewise triple-plated against depression, with $70,000 annually derived from the presidency of the Long Island Lighting Company and the chairmanships of the boards of the Queensboro Gas and Electric Company and the Kings County Lighting Company. And there is William A. Prendergast, formerly chairman of the New York Public Service Commission, like so many "sound" utility commissioners rewarded by promotion from his public job to three simultaneous executive vice-presidencies paying $50,000 annually. We find E. H. Rosenquest receiving three presidential emoluments, from the Westchester Lighting Company, the Yonkers Electric Light and Power Company, and the Bronx Gas and Electric, totaling $35,000. In addition to these high-salaried presidents there are various well-paid chairmen of boards—Floyd L. Carlisle, who gets $25,000 from the New York Edison; F. A. Stratton, with $30,000 from the Westchester Lighting Company—and numerous vice-presidents who likewise receive triple and double pay ranging from $25,000 to $40,000 annually. On top of all this came the interesting revelation that H. Edmund Mac-hold, former Republican State chairman, under whose party whip the legislature has invariably sunk remedial utility legislation without trace, is on the pay roll of the New York Edison as "assistant to the chairman of the board" at $15,000.

These utility heads' salaries were increased in 1932, when the cost of living was dropping rapidly, when wages everywhere were being ruthlessly slashed, and when the very companies paying them were reducing wages for the lesser fry. Brooklyn Edison executives' salaries rose from $157,000 in 1931 to $196,500 in 1932. New York Edison's principal officers' salaries soared from $149,700 in 1931 to $230,300 in 1932.

On June 15 Russell F. Van Doorn, vice-president of the Long Island Lighting Company, testified that the company had paid $100,000 in premiums on the life-insurance policies of its president, E. L. Phillips, as well as fire-insurance premiums on the Phillips mansion at Plandome, Long Island, and taxes thereon of $10,000 and $11,800, respectively, in 1928 and 1929. The next day Mr. Phillips testified that this was an error—these items, he said, had not been charged to the company. The public should be interested in finding out which statement was correct, and why such flat contradictions appear in the testimony of these two high-priced executives of the same company, one of whom appears convicted at least of ignorance concerning the affairs of his company. It was likewise brought out that a portion of a dock which had disappeared was included in the valuation for fixing rates; that a brick yard which cost the company $65,000 in 1924 had been valued at $250,000. These are typical examples of utility legerdemain.

In New Jersey a protest movement against electric rates is gathering momentum. That it has the active support of the Downtown Merchants' Association of Newark, the New Jersey Hotel Men's Association, and similar business groups, is significant. The Newark Star-Eagle, which is conducting an able editorial campaign, has pointed out that the Public Service Gas and Electric Company's dividends on its common stock were 12.5 per cent in 1928, 14 per cent in 1929, 22.5 per cent in 1930, and 16 per cent in 1931. The common stock is owned by the Public Service Corporation, a holding company which controls the light and power supply in 221 municipalities. This corporation in 1929 had a 40 per cent ratio of net profits to gross sales. In 1932 this had risen to 43 per cent. These profits are in turn passed on to the United Corporation, the great Morgan utility superholding company.

New Jersey is handicapped by the usual type of public-utilities commission, which has remained supine in the face of these unconscionable profits, and now, confronted with an aroused public opinion, offers as the only solution a valuation investigation for which the public is expected to raise $100,000. The public is always the victim of these Fabian tactics. The usual procedure in such cases is for the inquiry to drag out for years stubbornly contested at every point by the utilities and further obstructed by the courts, with the prospect that at the end of that period the companies will seek to maintain that the lapse of time since the survey was undertaken has so altered conditions that its findings are no longer valid.

Throughout the country, State public-utilities commissions did not hesitate during the rising prices of the World War, arbitrarily and without investigation, to grant "emergency" rate increases on request of the companies. No valid excuse exists for not applying the same procedure now in behalf of the consumer. But at this point the courts may be expected to succor the utilities by declaring such procedure "confiscatory" and without "due process of law." Counsel for the power companies in New York are jubilant over the recent stay granted by the Court of Appeals at Albany against an order of the Public Service Commission directing the Rockland Power and Light Company to file a temporary schedule of reduced rates. Almost the best that the public can hope for out of the stacked deck with which it is compelled to play is a slight "voluntary" reduction by the companies which will not materially diminish the prevailing rate extortion. A 50 per cent diminution in domestic rates would approximate the "fair and equitable" return which the statutes provide.

It is becoming an old story. How old may be deduced from a passage in Brand Whitlock's "Forty Years of It," written twenty years ago—and as pertinent today as when written. Reviewing his public service, including his four terms as mayor of Toledo, Mr. Whitlock formulated "three generalizations." The first was that "whatever the mere form of local government, our cities were directly ruled by those small coteries we had come to call political machines; the second, that these machines ruled the cities for the benefit of public-utility corporations; and the third, that the legal power through which this was accomplished was derived from legislatures controlled by the same persons in the same interests." His conclusion is likewise valid—with the added validity of the cumulative experience of intervening years—public ownership.

Flight from the City

WORD comes from Detroit that Henry Ford, precursor in and initiator of several great trends of the century, is moving toward the decentralization of his industry. Like other manufacturers, he has found that in hard times it is cheaper to have many small plants some of which can be shut entirely than to operate a large factory on part time or with a skeleton force. But well before industrial depression laid its blight upon us, fear had been expressed in the realm of big business that centralization might have gone too far, or at least too fast.

The past three or four years have seen an interruption of the long-continuing movement from country to city and striking progress in the reverse direction. Farm population in the United States, which decreased from 31,614,000 in 1920 to 30,445,000 in 1930, is estimated to amount now to 32,000,000, the largest in our history. Most of those newly repatriated on the land are persons without employment, seeking relief from city expenses and perhaps a living from the soil. To some extent this is a tragedy, for, as Secretary Wallace says, many men without experience or money are trying to make a living where trained agriculturists with capital have failed. Though the movement from the city to the farm can hardly be permanent, there is an exodus of city workers to country districts for the purpose of carrying

The Bedside Manner

Otto H. Kahn testifying: "It has long been our policy . . . to establish a reputation which would make clients feel that if they have a problem of a financial nature Kuhn, Loeb and Company is a pretty good doctor to go to."

Walter Lippmann

II. "The New Tammany"

By AMOS PINCHOT

IN 1927, when Alfred E. Smith loomed as a candidate for the Democratic nomination, Walter Lippmann had charge of the editorial page of the New York World, the principal Democratic newspaper in the East. Three barriers, each seemingly more fatal to his chances than the other, stood between Mr. Smith and the Presidency—his Catholicism, his opposition to prohibition, and the fact that he had for many years been an integral part of the Tammany organization.

Now, since Mr. Smith and Tammany were as inseparable in the public mind as Siamese twins, it became evident that the only way to remove the Tammany curse from the Governor was to transform the Wigwam into something which, politically speaking, would pass for an asset instead of a liability. This thaumaturgical feat Mr. Lippmann undertook to perform in a series of editorials in which he traced Tammany's history from the days of its admittedly questionable past down to 1927, when, according to Mr. Lippmann, it underwent a miraculous change under the leadership of such men as John R. Voorhis, George W. Olvany, and James J. Walker.

After touching frankly on the era when Tammany "won and deserved a bad reputation," first with Tweed and then with Croker in the saddle, Mr. Lippmann writes in his editorial of December 11, 1927:

The Tammany Society, John R. Voorhis, Grand Sachem, and the Tammany Hall, George W. Olvany, leader, which have just parted with their common home on Fourteenth Street and are about to move uptown, belong to the third period of the organization. Following Croker, after a brief triumvirate, Charles F. Murphy was at first as hard-boiled a politician as Tammany leaders had been wont to be, but toward the end of his long rule he accepted and cooperated with the New Tammany which was growing up under such leaders as Governor Smith, Senator Wagner, Mayor Walker, and the present legislative leaders of the party. It is a Tammany suited to the more general spread of popular education, a thing unknown in 1789 and mainly confined to the rudiments of the three R's in 1871, when New York had no public high school. It is a Tammany beginning to be more highly regarded in the country at large. Its move uptown after sixty years in Fourteenth Street may be taken as appropriate to its altered viewpoint, as representing a great national party in our greatest city, and to the altered bearing of the country toward its own activities. Tammany moves not only uptown but up.

Thus, while our Merlin of Journalism beams from his magic casement in the Pulitzer Building, intoning editorial incantations, the World readers see the grisly tiger shed its stripes and become the faithful St. Bernard dog of the Sunday-school books—little keg and all. They watch the old Tammany become "the New Tammany." And even Charlie Murphy stands in awe, while, consonant with the spirit of education, the Tammany braves move their Wigwam three blocks uptown.

On what evidence Mr. Lippmann bases this transformation, I do not know. I should like very much to ask him. I should like to have him tell, even if in a general way, what facts he had in mind when he drew this comforting picture, at the very moment when, quite as plunderous as in the days of Tweed and Croker, Tammany was wrecking the city's finances in fresh bursts of graft and extravagance. Tammany has moved up, announces Mr. Lippmann. What does he mean by that? For the record shows that if Tammany moved at all, it was certainly not upward. With Olvany presiding at the Wigwam, with Curry's man Walker in the City Hall, with Smith quiescent and seemingly out of tune with the organization, and with Wagner, never a real part of it, away in Washington, Mr. Lippmann's enlightened Tammany was making what will long stand as a record for sheer administrative obscenity.

But what bliss, what resounding laughter in the Wigwam, which for all its uptown quarters still stank with its old downtown smell! The liberal editor of the New York World licking the tiger's sores and giving him a clean bill of health, while the braves applaud in the background!

By 1927 Mr. Lippmann should have been a competent newspaperman. He had worked with Steffens in his investigation of city corruption. He had been secretary to a radical mayor in Schenectady. He had been on the staff of Everybody's Magazine in the muckraking days. He had served on the New York World for six years, under a truly great editor, the late Frank Cobb, and had been in charge of the editorial page for four. It was strange that he should not know the truth about Tammany. For it was known to every seasoned newspaperman in town.

Nevertheless, whatever Tammany may or may not be, Mr. Lippmann's candidate for the Presidency is Mr. Smith. Consequently, Mr. Lippmann continues his lustful and purifying rites, to the end that the somewhat unsavory albatross that dangled from the Governor's neck might be changed by his enchantments into a living bird of paradise. So on goes "the New Tammany" saga, which reaches its height about a month before the Presidential election in 1928. On September 10 of that year Mr. Lippmann editorially brands as "demagogic, grossly unjust, and demonstrably untrue" a statement by the federal Assistant Attorney General that Tammany is "an organization that for underworld connections and political efficiency is matched no place else in America." He contends that Mayor Walker has an "indisputable right to resent" such a statement. He praises the city government as "in effect commission government." In the vein of a booster lauding his home town at a chamber-of-commerce luncheon, he insists that under Tammany "New York is a good city to visit and a good city to live in."

On September 24, 1928, he continues his celebration of the Wigwam's rebirth, and charges with hypocrisy all partisan persons who use the word Tammany as an epithet:

The epithet "Tammany" in this campaign is employed by two sorts of people. By those who do not know the facts of Governor Smith's career and by those who do know them.

Those who do not know the facts are also of two sorts. These are the persons who honestly believe that Tammany today is the Tammany of Tweed and Croker. They believe it lives chiefly by collecting graft from prostitution. They are exactly as well informed as the backwoods Republicans who still believe that the Democracy is the party of Jefferson Davis and that the Republicans are the party of General Sherman and the carpet-baggers. . . . Much more important are the deliberate falsifiers. We mean those New York Republicans who know the facts [about Tammany] and continue to misrepresent them.

Except in Mr. Lippmann's imagination, Tammany had not changed in the slightest degree; it never does change. In 1928 just as in Tweed's and Croker's times, Tammany operated, as it does now, on a simple principle, from which it never deviates by a hair's breadth. It performs services, at a price, for the needy rich—who require favors, privileges, and immunities which neither the law nor public decency allows and who therefore tolerate Tammany. And with a part, a very small part, of the proceeds of such transactions, and of the profits from its own peculiar grafts, it buys the political allegiance of the needy poor. In a sense, it functions as a business rather than a political institution, since its political activities are incidental to its larger purpose of raking in cash for itself and its friends. That is Tammany; that always will be Tammany, unless some profound upheaval tears it up by the roots, which are large graft and relatively small charity. And yet Mr. Lippmann, apparently with conviction, and certainly with a solemnity almost Johnsonian, informs his devoted readers that only the ignorant are unaware of its reformation.

At this point let me make it clear that I do not charge that in writing this drivel—for despite its air of authority and sweet reasonableness, it is nothing but drivel—Mr. Lippmann is trying to deceive his readers. That is not the point. The point is that when he writes he is not looking at the facts, but at what he believes to be the requirements of his thesis. And so it is that, when he deals with Tammany, or big business, or the banks, or the trusts, or the foreign-debt question, he is never an objective writer. He is, on the contrary, an exceedingly prejudiced writer, whose special pleading is hidden under an illusion of objectivity conveyed by a leisurely and persuasive manner. Without doubt he writes clearly, or at least gives the impression of clarity. But does he think clearly? When a writer dodges or incontinently flees from such facts as might wreck his theories, there is involved, I imagine, an intellectual disturbance that is far from conducive to clear thought.

For the political purposes of the Smith campaign Mr. Lippmann requires a regenerate Tammany. There being no such thing, he proceeds to create one out of the ribs of Murphy, Walker, and Olvany. This, fortunately, is no new task for Mr. Lippmann. For, as we have seen, he has already performed a similar one in "Drift and Mastery," and again in "A Preface to Morals," when, in order to prove his thesis of a regenerate big business, he peopled his Wall Street Eden with disinterested bankers and trust magnates who spurn the profit motive.

Whatever may have been the political influence of the New Tammany editorials, they seem to have had no disillusioning effect on Mr. Lippmann's readers. To the congregation of aspiring philistines for whom Mr. Lippmann was fast becoming the Fortieth Article of the faith, thinking for one's self is, at best, a dubious pastime. So they swallowed the New Tammany with its repentant sinners just as they had swallowed the new Wall Street with its disinterested saints.

Let us turn the clock forward to October, 1931. A local campaign is progressing in New York City, and a national Presidential convention is nine months distant. Tammany's so often probed sores are being reopened by Mr. Seabury, and are showing precisely the same state of putrefaction which each previous inquiry has revealed. Mr. Lippmann, the New York World having become extinct, is now the columnist of the Herald Tribune, in which capacity he is virtuously denouncing Franklin D. Roosevelt, who has succeeded Mr. Smith both as Governor and as leading candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination. But what is the reproach that Mr. Lippmann hurls against the Governor? Why, in Mr. Lippmann's eyes, is Franklin Roosevelt so tragically unfitted for the Presidency? Incredible as it may seem, it is that he is temporizing with Tammany, instead of defying and breaking with it. And now we find that Tammany is no longer the New Tammany which Mr. Lippmann constructed for the purpose of the Smith campaign. It is the old, sordid, wicked Tammany, with which honest men can have no truck at all. So that this sad lament is wrung from the breast of the columnist:

The political campaign now being conducted in New York is proceeding in an atmosphere of listless degradation. . . . Governor Roosevelt pursues his carefully calculated course of doing just precisely as much as he has to, and not one bit more than he has to, toward facilitating the exposure of corruption in New York. . . . In the last ten years there has been generally in the United States a remarkable indifference to the maintenance of public standards, a dying down of the old popular fervor in attacking corruption.

Mr. Lippmann's own popular fervor, however, rises nobly to the occasion. And he accuses the Governor of almost every political iniquity. He is "carrying water on both shoulders." He is placating warring elements in the Democratic Party by "two-faced platitudes" and "private assurances." He has "lost his moral freedom. He is so heavily mortgaged to Tammany that he must prove his independence of it. . . . The trouble with Franklin D. Roosevelt is that his mind is not very clear, his purposes are not simple, and his methods are not direct."

And as Roosevelt forges ahead in the race, his alleged connection with Tammany becomes more scandalous in the sight of Walter Lippmann, and the city government, "discredited from the top down," increasingly disreputable. What has become of the New Tammany, the "moved-up" Tammany of yesteryear? Alas, it is no more. And an "ignorant and predatory political machine" which is guilty of "a brazen exploitation of the gullibility of the people" has taken its place.

However, let us not judge Mr. Lippmann unkindly. Let us concede that these moral morsels come straight from the bottom of his heart, and that, ordinarily a mild man, he has turned Savonarola only in the high cause of stopping Roosevelt. But let us not concede too fast. For another transformation is taking place. And on October 7 he announces with quiet dignity: "I shall vote cheerfully for Governor Roosevelt."

So whatever we may or may not have in Mr. Lippmann, we must at least admit that he is one of the most entertaining men of his time.

[The third article in Mr. Pinchot's series on Walter Lippmann will appear in next week's issue.]

The Recovery Machine Starts

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, June 27

IT has now been almost a fortnight since the National Recovery Administration formally opened for business. This newest branch of the government, with General Hugh S. Johnson at its head, is to exercise in the name of the President the vast power over industry and labor conferred upon him in the National Industrial Recovery Act. Everything seems in readiness for the titanic task of putting business back on an even keel—to use a phrase much in vogue in the early days of the crisis. The recovery administration has taken over a section of the mammoth Department of Commerce building. A publicity division has been organized, one of the largest of its kind in the government service. General Johnson and his corps of personal assistants are at work. Experts of all sorts, college professors, business executives, labor economists, union officials, and others have been brought together to help in the task. Advisory boards representing—by Presidential decree—the workers, the consumers, and industry itself have been named and have taken their proper places in the organization. Yet the machine has been woefully slow in getting started.

When President Roosevelt signed the recovery bill on June 16, he said it was his hope "that the ten major industries which control the bulk of industrial employment can submit their simple basic codes at once and that the country can look forward to the month of July as the beginning of our great national movement back to work." Until now only one group, the cotton-textile industry, has submitted its code, or set of rules by which it hopes to govern itself and thus achieve stability, and ■■ was to have been expected, this first code was not in acceptable form. It is now being subjected to public hearings. Afterwards it will go to the experts and perhaps back to the cotton-textile industry itself for revision. And then it must go to the White House for the President's approval. A long and tedious process.

But if Mr. Roosevelt's hope that the larger industries would take speedy action has not been realized, the publicity given the recovery bill and the glowing statements attending its passage have had other and more positive results. An army of financiers, big-business executives, small manufacturers, retail merchants, lawyers, publicity agents, and others have descended upon Washington. Du Pont, American Telephone and Telegraph, the Union Pacific Railroad, the Endicott-Johnson Corporation, the Bankers Trust Company of New York, International Harvester, Lambert Pharmacal, Remington Rand, Missouri Pacific, General Motors, Kennecott Copper, General Electric, United States Steel, Standard Oil of New Jersey, California Fruit Growers, the First National Bank of Chicago, Goldman Sachs, the Weyerhäuser lumber interests, Reynolds Tobacco, and Sears, Roebuck, among many others, have sent their chairmen or presidents to this city. Others have high-priced corporation lawyers representing them. Lesser interests have hired Washington attorneys to advise them how to proceed.

Any number of lawyers here are openly soliciting such business. At the same time several "information agencies" have been organized by persons anxious to profit financially from the confusion attending the preliminary administration of the recovery law. Most of these agencies are fly-by-night affairs that no one need take seriously. In quite another category is the National Industrial Advisory Corporation, formed by the notorious Sherman Corporation. It calls itself "a private corporation organized to assist in promoting the principles of the National Industrial Recovery Act." New trade associations hastily organized under such auspices will bear close watching, as at least a few of General Johnson's assistants realize. More important is the labor angle. The recovery law has as one of its avowed purposes the protection of the workers against the sharp practices of unscrupulous employers. It is worth recalling that the Sherman Corporation has in the past directed its energies primarily toward breaking up unions and hiring out strike-breakers and labor spies. It has specialized in setting up welfare associations, "employee-representation" plans, and other devices to prevent workers in many industries from establishing and maintaining their own organizations.

While many industries and trades have been discussing the code problem among themselves, they have had no clear-cut principles or policies by which they might guide themselves. Every "code of fair competition" must be approved by the President before it can be put into effect, but neither from the White House nor from the National Recovery Administration has come any statement exactly defining what will and what will not be acceptable. This was probably inevitable, for the Roosevelt experiment is being undertaken in an uncharted field; but it has nevertheless put ■ brake on the recovery machine's operations. The economists and other experts called in to help with the experiment have had to devote most of their time to receiving endless delegations of small manufacturers, retailers, and spokesmen for the "weaker" industries, and to answering thousands of queries from business men that come in by mail and telegraph. But the business men have not been interested so much in knowing what the law says as they have been in trying to determine what the President will consider a "fair code of competition." They have been invariably told, after being advised as to the limitations of the law, to submit their own ideas on this point and to leave it to the experts, the several advisory boards, and the President to say whether or not their suggested codes are acceptable.

There are other reasons why a strong and aggressive policy has not yet been adopted. For one thing, General

Johnson has been at pains to give no offense to business. He believes, he has said, that cooperation should be obtained without coercion and that the initiative should come from within industry itself. Industry, however, has been hesitant about taking the initiative; it has been reluctant to commit itself to a definite series of codes which will have the force of law once they are approved. It is not that industry as a whole is unfavorably disposed toward the recovery act, for of that there is no evidence; but the larger and stronger industries are proceeding cautiously lest they bind themselves to a greater extent than is absolutely necessary. Again, there has been in progress behind the scenes a terrific struggle for control of the recovery machinery. Secretary of Commerce Roper and one or two other members of the Cabinet Advisory Board have been maneuvering to place that body in a position where it might exercise final authority. In this contest big business has openly supported Roper. For the moment a truce of a dubious sort has been arranged, the Cabinet board having acknowledged Johnson's authority. But the real significance of the truce will not be known until one of the monopoly industries—steel or electrical equipment, for example—brings in its code. Then we shall witness a test of strength that will decide once and for all whether monopoly capitalism or the interest of the small manufacturer and shopkeeper is to dictate administration policies.

There is hardly any doubt that the little business men and the weaker trades and industries will be compelled to knuckle down. They have no great financial power, no banking support to compare with that which United States Steel or General Electric enjoy; and they are either not organized at all or very loosely organized. These smaller industries may, however, prove troublesome. The other day, for example, a delegation from one of them sought to convince recovery-administration officials that the wage system in their industry was so complicated that it was hopeless to attempt to fix a minimum wage. A few questions revealed that they were hoping to obtain government sanction for the pauper wages they were paying.

The tightly organized monopoly industries will present an entirely different problem. In aluminum, steel, electrical equipment, telephones, and several other industries competition is already strictly regulated by the one or two giant corporations at the top and by the Morgans, Mellons, and other powerful banking houses that control them. The few small independent companies remaining in these fields have long since learned to play the game. It is hardly likely that they will complain, though given a chance to do so at public hearings. Thus the many glaring abuses existing in these industries will probably not be brought out. To do that would require the recovery administration to take a positive and courageous attitude, but there is no indication that it means to do so. A few officials connected with the administration, particularly Secretaries Ickes and Perkins and some of the labor advisers, are looking forward eagerly to the battle with the monopoly industries, but even they are none too hopeful of the eventual outcome. If General Johnson continues to insist that industry be allowed as much leeway as practicable, it will simply mean that the monopoly industries, which are strongly organized, will continue to regulate themselves as they have done in the past, while the weaker industries must by virtue of their weakness submit to government regulation.

On the other hand, it appears that labor will be left alone to work out its own problems. The recovery act says that the workers "shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection." President Roosevelt has called this a "new charter of rights long sought and hitherto denied." Technically this description may be accurate, but in practice it may turn out quite otherwise. The law does not presume to tell an industry or corporation that it must deal with this or that particular union. Indeed, employers are not in any sense compelled to deal directly with the workers. The recovery act simply says that if no mutual agreement as to wages and hours can be reached in a given industry, the President may then "prescribe a limited code of fair competition fixing such maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other conditions of employment . . . as he finds to be necessary."

Big business, at least at the moment, is not averse to letting the President or the recovery administration exercise this power. Except for a few marginal producers and sweat-shop operators, almost everyone seems to be agreed that purchasing power must be increased and that this can best be done by a more equitable division of the available jobs through the establishment of maximum working hours and minimum wage rates within individual industries. Some representatives of big business who are here now frankly admit that unless the total purchasing power of the nation is soon increased—they speak in terms of weeks rather than years or even months—the whole economic structure will be endangered. With them, therefore, the basic issue is not whether wages shall be stabilized and hours of labor curtailed, but whether this can be done without yielding any real power to the workers. In brief, what big business fears most is that the recovery machinery may be used to help build a strong and independent labor movement.

But on this point the monopolists and bankers need have no fear. The recovery administration does not intend to go into the business of organizing unions or of promoting unionization. Nor is it going out of its way to encourage collective bargaining, though a few of the labor advisers may do so upon their own responsibility. The American Federation of Labor has taken advantage of the law to drum up trade for itself. It is reported, for example, that the United Mine Workers of America, headed by John L. Lewis, who has so often in the past sold out to the coal operators, have added at least 100,000 new members in the last several weeks. The Detroit Federation of Labor, headed by Frank X. Martel, whose record is certainly no better than that of Lewis, is said to be active in organizing the automobile workers. In other directions as well the Federation of Labor has been extending itself. Yet it can hardly be held that a labor movement dominated by Matthew Woll, Mike Flynn, John Lewis, and their kind is ever likely to furnish effective protection for labor. Looking farther afield, we find a complete lack of aggressive, competent, and honest working-class leadership, and without such leadership the worker can scarcely hope to benefit by President Roosevelt's "new charter of rights." Instead we find leaders like Tom McMahon, president of the United Textile Workers of America, an A. F. of L. union, who took part in the preparation of the cotton-textile code and offered no protest when the mill owners wrote a $10-a-week minimum wage into that code.

Even the A. F. of L. is neither wanted nor trusted in some industries. Steel is an outstanding example. The moment the recovery act was signed, many steel companies hurriedly set up "joint committees" and other disguised forms of company unions. This they obviously did to head off A. F. of L. and other union organizers. The labor experts connected with the recovery administration are divided on the question of whether wage agreements with these unions can lawfully be recognized. One of the experts frankly declared that if the "joint committees" are approved by the workers, and there is no protest, and no charges of coercion are brought against the companies, "the administration will not be disposed to interfere."

Thus far, in any event, the recovery administration, as distinguished from the various advisory boards working with it, has allowed its judgment to be influenced by the point of view of the business community. There is evidence, indeed, that the reactionary labor crowd and a few industrialists and bankers have actually dominated the administration up to now. The first public-relations counsel appointed by the administration was John J. Leary, Jr., former labor reporter for the New York World. Leary has in the past worked hand-in-glove with the Woll-Flynn faction, conspiring with them at A. F. of L. conventions to suppress liberal and more trustworthy labor factions. In connection with an article of his which appeared in a recent magazine, Leary proudly advertised himself as a protege of Gerard Swope, president of General Electric, one of the monopolistic giants of the country. Leary was finally removed after Laurence Todd, correspondent of the Federated Press, had revealed his record. Gerard Swope himself has been very much in evidence. During the public hearings on the cotton-textile code he had several confidential and intimate conversations with General Johnson. He has also been named permanent chairman of the executive committee of big business men appointed by Secretary Roper to aid him in his own recovery campaign. Finally, we do not yet know what will be the result of the struggle between big business and Roper on the one hand and the Ickes-Perkins-Richberg-Wolman faction on the other to gain control of the recovery machinery. A labor movement may develop in consequence of the recovery administration's activities, but it is certain that it will be safely capitalistic.

It Pays to Fight for Lower Rates

By O. S. DEAN

FOR a number of years no towns in the United States having a population of from 50,000 to 100,000, with the exception of three or four resort towns like Miami, Florida, and Little Rock, Arkansas, had higher electric rates than Sioux City, Iowa. Up to August, 1931, the rate per kilowatt hour for domestic use was 9 cents for the first 100 kilowatt hours. Under the Iowa law it is the duty of the City Council in each community to fix public-utility rates; the Sioux City Council had fixed 9 cents per kilowatt hour as a maximum, and the Sioux City Gas and Electric Company imposed that rate on domestic users, charging commercial users almost any rate less than that figure that the business would bear.

After a good deal of agitation for reduction in rates, the utility company, in July, 1931, announced with great display of virtue a reduction to 8½ cents for the first 12 kilowatt hours, with a $1 minimum, 8 cents for the next 48 kilowatt hours, and 7 cents for the next 140. This was not at all satisfactory, and in 1932 several candidates ran for places on the City Council in the March biennial elections on platforms pledging themselves to support ordinances fixing lower gas and electric rates. During the campaign one of these candidates circulated a petition to the council asking that it reduce these rates "to a fair and reasonable basis, commensurate with the cost of production," and pledged himself to present this petition whether he was elected or not. Naturally, heavy utility support was thrown to the old city councilmen, all of whom were candidates for reelection. Extensive advertising was placed by the utility companies in the local papers. The old council was reelected.

The petition for lower rates, which had been signed by many hundreds of voters, was presented, as promised, to the reelected council at its first meeting after reorganization in April, 1932. However, the letter transmitting the petition was not read, and the petition was simply "received and filed," that is, completely ignored. This action aroused public opinion, and shortly afterward a Citizens' Protective Committee was formed for the purpose of securing rate-reduction by concerted action.

At first the plan was to initiate a rate ordinance as provided for by Iowa law, but it soon became apparent that such a move would only invite prolonged litigation. It was seen that every step would be bitterly contested in the courts on one technicality or another, and that there would be no prospect of a final decision for years. After several weeks' study the committee decided that the only method by which it might achieve results within a reasonable time was to go to the public with a proposal for a municipal electric plant. It decided further that while gas rates were as excessive as electric rates, certain legal aspects of the situation made it unwise to tackle the gas question. It therefore confined its efforts to striving for an electric plant.

During the summer of 1932 a petition for a municipal plant was circulated through the city. Meanwhile, in an attempt to head off the movement, the utility company announced another reduction in electric rates: the domestic base rate of 12 kilowatt hours for $1 was retained, but the second bracket was changed to 188 kilowatt hours at 7 cents. This rate went into effect in July, 1932.

On August 19, 1932, the Citizens' Protective Committee filed with the City Council a petition for a special election to vote on issuing bonds not to exceed $2,500,000 to defray the cost of building a municipal electric light and power plant and distributing system for Sioux City. More than 8,600 names were subscribed to this petition. Of these, 6,844—a number considerably larger than necessary—were announced by the city clerk to be the names of qualified electors, but before he had issued his certificate to that effect an injunction suit was brought against the City Council to prevent the calling of the election.

This suit was brought on August 26, 1932, in the name of one J. J. Piuser, who swore that he was a taxpayer, both real and personal; that there was a conspiracy in circulating the petition for the special election; that those circulating the petition had been paid five cents a name for obtaining signatures; that there were thousands of forgeries; and that the plaintiff would be irreparably damaged by the calling of this special election through the great increase in his taxes caused by the expense of conducting it. There being no other method of obtaining relief from this tremendous injustice, he prayed the court to grant an injunction. Without any other evidence or hearing and on this showing alone the judge granted a temporary injunction, and the question of making it permanent came up for hearing in the September term of the District Court. After the city clerk and members of the council had been put on the stand to testify concerning the presentation of the petition, the attorney for the plaintiff moved that the case be sent to a referee for determination of the facts in connection with the petition. This was vigorously objected to by attorneys for the Citizens' Protective Committee because it would cause unnecessary delay, but they were overruled by the court, and the court reporter was appointed referee to take evidence. The plaintiff, on being required to put up a bond for $5,000 for costs, promptly complied, although not long before, in divorce proceedings brought by his wife, he had sworn that he had nothing with which to pay alimony.

Hearings before the referee were started within a short time. Instead of first putting his client on the stand to qualify as a taxpayer, the plaintiff's attorney put on a handwriting expert and kept him there for more than eight months, that is, until May, 1933. The actual hearings were held only at intervals since the referee was busy much of the time with his duties as court reporter. During these hearings, which consumed ten weeks of actual time, the referee, the plaintiff's attorney, his witness, one of the city attorneys, one or more representatives of the Citizens' Protective Committee, and, most of the time, an attorney representing the committee were in attendance. Of these, the referee, the witness, and the city attorney drew their regular fees and salary. It is assumed that the plaintiff's attorney was paid by the only party that could possibly benefit by the proceedings, the utility company, for, as stated above, the plaintiff had shown in court not long before that he had no means of paying alimony to his wife. The representatives of the Citizens' Protective Committee and the attorneys who appeared for them served without compensation during all those weeks. It is significant that at the time of the service of the notices of injunction on the city officials, the City Council would not authorize the city attorneys to defend the case until the Citizens' Protective Committee had appointed counsel to represent it and work with the three city attorneys. At the same time the council made it perfectly clear that the city would not pay anything for this service.

The eight months of hearings were consumed by the attorney for the plaintiff in every possible form of attack on the signatures to the petition. Instead of the "thousands of forgeries" claimed when the suit was filed, the handwriting expert found between 300 and 400 names which he maintained were written by others than those who had signed the permanent registration cards filed in the city clerk's office, with which the names were compared to determine the signers' qualifications as electors. Every variation from the exact form in which the signatures appeared on the cards—for example, a change from initials to full first name or vice versa—was attacked, although the law does not require that any particular form of signature shall be used. Signers must be qualified electors and that is all. Nearly five thousand pages of testimony were taken during the eight months. In the intervals between sessions the handwriting expert was engaged in searching the records for more testimony, so that he was employed practically continuously. At the end of his period of service, the City Council discovered that another clerk for the Municipal Court was needed, a new office was created, and this witness, who had been on the stand for eight months in a suit against the city and against the people of Sioux City, was appointed to fill that office.

After the plaintiff's attorney had finished with this witness, he took the stand himself to establish his client's qualification as a taxpayer. For this purpose he presented a contract for a deed to a piece of property, but it was shown that no payments except the first had been made, and no taxes paid. As a matter of fact, it later developed that this contract had been canceled. The plaintiff had a tax receipt for personal taxes for 1929 and 1930—$2 or $3 each—and a poll-tax receipt for 1931—50 cents plus 3 cents interest and 3 cents penalty. He had no receipt for realty taxes and no personal tax receipt for 1931 or 1932. These items were paid in September, 1932, a month after the suit was filed. The attorney also presented an assessment roll dated January, 1933, showing personal property listed at $60, on one-fourth of which, or $15, taxes would be paid, but no real property.

In the original petition for injunction the plaintiff had claimed that the cost of holding the special election would be $8,000. (The last school election actually cost very close to $600.) It was his share of this $8,000, levied on him in the form of taxes, that was to cause him such irreparable damage. The truth of the matter was that if this election should cost $8,000, his share, under his 1933 assessment, would have been less than one half of one cent. This was the entire consideration and the only ground for the court's granting the injunction. The costs have already amounted to thousands of dollars, and the public will pay every cent in its gas and electric bills—charged to operating expense. This takes no account of the loss to the people of Sioux City through the delay in the construction of the plant.

The plaintiff's attorney rested his case on May 27, 1933. When the referee has finished writing up his notes, after returning from his summer vacation, it will be the turn of attorneys for the city and the committee to present their side of the case. Then the court will make its decision and later the case may be appealed to the Supreme Court.

In December, 1932, while these hearings were in progress, the City Council announced, apparently to curry favor with the public, that it would further reduce rates for electricity, and published a schedule similar to that used by the municipal plant at Lincoln, Nebraska, which was much lower than the current Sioux City schedule. This was immediately met by a temporary injunction, issued by the Federal Court in January, 1933, based on the claim that the rate was confiscatory. However, before the date set for the hearing, the council and the utility company came to a "compromise agreement," and the council passed a new ordinance fixing rates considerably higher than the Lincoln rates—5.5 cents per kilowatt hour for the first 100 kilowatt hours for domestic users. This was a decided reduction from the rate of 9 cents per kilowatt hour in force up to eighteen months before, but it was only obtained by the persistent attacks of the committee which conducted the fight. There was also some cut in commercial rates, but it was not so great as the domestic rate reduction. There is, however, no weakening in the spirit of the public opposition, and the fight will be continued until a municipal plant is obtained and Sioux City can enrol its name on the list of tax-free cities.

In the meantime, until the municipal plant is in operation, the thousands of dollars paid every day for electricity and gas in Sioux City will go to pay interest on $9,531,300 of bonds and $4,838,700 of 7 per cent preferred stock of the Sioux City Gas and Electric Company, besides $2,900,000 of common stock, a great deal of which is admitted to be "water." Until the relief of municipal ownership is obtained, the public will continue to pay and pay and pay.

[This is the seventh of a series of articles on electric power and the consumer. The eighth will appear in an early issue.]

If the London Conference Fails

By MAXWELL S. STEWART

DEVELOPMENTS at the London Economic Conference have effectively dramatized the fundamental inconsistency between the program of international cooperation sponsored by Secretary Hull and the Administration's plan for domestic recovery. There can be no question that the American delegates are faced with an inescapable dilemma. On the one hand, the United States, as the chief creditor, has a greater stake in the conference's success than any other nation. As compared with Europe our losses from the depression have been relatively heavy. Our exports have declined by three-quarters, and our imports by more than 70 per cent. Even after making allowances for the slight business revival of recent weeks, the number of our unemployed exceeds the combined totals of the five largest European countries. The shrinkage in the market value of our foreign investments is estimated to be at least eight billion dollars. It seems indisputable to the internationalist, therefore, that the gains to this country to be obtained from the resumption of world trade would be sufficient to justify any immediate sacrifice of national policy.

Many of these same facts, on the other hand, may be taken as arguments for concentrating on a national recovery program. The widespread unemployment and distress in the United States made it seem imperative for the Administration to rush through emergency measures based on domestic inflation, without waiting to tackle the more complex problems involved in international action. The abandonment of the gold standard and the subsequent grant of inflationary powers to the President provided a needed stimulus to internal prices, but greatly intensified the chaos in the international sphere. Countries remaining on the gold standard insisted, with ample justification, that there must be at least some promise of currency stabilization before it would be possible to consider a reduction of tariffs and a removal of trade barriers. But a stabilized dollar was the last thing that Washington wanted at the moment. The sharp reaction on Wall Street to rumors that the dollar had been pegged was sufficient to convince the most obtuse that such an agreement could not be reconciled with a domestic price-raising program.

Nor can the American attitude on stabilization be viewed as merely an unfortunate contradiction in a policy which is otherwise committed to a revival of the world's markets. An honest appraisal of the American policy at London forces one to admit that it has been dedicated from the beginning by nationalistic considerations. Before the conference opened, it was evident that President Roosevelt's inability to secure authority from Congress to adjust tariff rates or to negotiate a settlement of the war debts would make it difficult for the American delegates to discuss concrete measures of economic disarmament. Although the President's acceptance of "token" payments on the June 15 instalment of the war debts temporarily removed the tension which had arisen over the debt issue, the conference suffered a fresh setback when Senator Pittman repudiated the American experts' proposal for a 10 per cent reduction in world tariffs. On none of the three principal issues before the world—war debts, tariffs, monetary stability—has there been any adequate recognition in Washington of the concessions which this country, as a creditor, must make in order to lay a sound basis for the restoration of international economic activity.

That the United States is motivated by nationalist considerations is, of course, strongly denied in official circles. Assistant Secretary Moley has described the American policy as one of "economic intranationalism," a compromise between the internationalism of Secretary Hull and extreme economic nationalism. This distinction, however, is unconvincing. While there is no question that the Administration would cheerfully enter into any international accord which would not be inconsistent with its domestic program, the scope of such agreements is pitifully limited. Piecemeal measures will be of little avail as long as the basic weapons of economic nationalism are unaffected. Failure to reach effective agreements on such questions as monetary stability and trade barriers must inevitably lead to the division of the world into a number of more or less self-sufficient national or imperial units, each firmly ensconced behind impregnable tariff walls.

The very real possibility of such a development in the event the conference fails does not seriously disturb either our nationalists or our "intranationalists." It is claimed that since the United States possesses within its own borders an ample supply, with a few exceptions, of all the principal raw materials, it would be in a particularly favored position to build up a national economy which would be free from foreign influences. As painted by some of its leading advocates, national self-government, or autarchy, can appear very alluring: as the nation would no longer be at the mercy of disturbances beyond its boundaries, it could guarantee high prices to its farmers, high wages to its workers, and a job to everyone. The specter of the competition of cheap "coolie" labor in foreign countries would be forever laid. Wars would be unlikely to develop, because, with the cessation of foreign investments and of the struggle for markets, the basic causes of international friction would have been removed. Moreover, the theoretical case for a self-sufficient national economy is stronger than is generally realized. There may be a certain amount of truth, for instance, in the contention that the task of organizing the world on a basis of constantly increasing interdependence is at present beyond human intelligence. Differences in the standards of living in various parts of the world are probably too great to permit the attainment of economic stability through dependence on the interplay of the world market. It logically would follow, therefore, that a balance of economic forces could only be achieved by insulating each country as far as possible from external influences and turning the nation's efforts primarily to the development of the home market.

The fallacies in the isolationist position lie in certain practical considerations which are largely glossed over by convinced nationalists. In the first place, the United States is by no means as well equipped with essential raw materials as it is frequently represented to be. All the rubber, silk, tea, coffee, and cocoa used in this country must be imported from abroad, together with approximately half the sugar, three-fourths of the fur and skins, and more than half of the newsprint. In addition, there are nearly a score of essential commodities—such as nickel, tin, iodine, radium, and manganese—which are either not produced here at all or are produced in quantities insufficient for domestic consumption. While many of these products might be replaced by substitutes, this process would never be fully satisfactory and in some cases it would be extremely costly.

Similarly, although less than 10 per cent of the total production of the United States is normally sold abroad, many important economic groups within the country are largely dependent upon foreign markets. This is particularly true of the farmers of the South and West. And although the proportion of manufactured goods sold overseas is somewhat less than that of agricultural products and raw materials, certain industries have grown up which are largely dependent upon foreign trade. The importance of these exports in terms of jobs may be seen from the fact that even in 1932, when American foreign trade had fallen to scarcely one-third of its normal value, there were still some 2,000,000 workers directly engaged in producing goods for overseas markets, while 1,250,000 additional persons were engaged in supplying the needs of those so employed. If foreign trade should be further curtailed, it might be possible in the course of time to effect an economic readjustment which would enable many of these workers to be assimilated into industries producing for the home market, but a heavy price would have to be paid during the transition period. It would mean, for example, that many individuals, including those who had given the best portions of their lives to mastering a trade, would find it impossible to fit themselves for new tasks. No economic dislocation of such dimensions could take place without serious repercussions on the national economy, involving at least a temporary lowering of living standards.

The crucial issue, however, relates to the possibility of achieving greater economic stability within a self-contained state than in an international system. Here the isolationist is on weak ground. Most economists would assert that if we discard the self-regulating mechanism of the world market, it is highly questionable whether national stability could be attained. Even if foreign trade were reduced to a barter basis, it would be impossible to insulate the domestic market against variations in supply and demand in foreign countries, except through a rigid foreign-trade monopoly. It should be clearly recognized, moreover, that such a step, together with the rigid supervision over domestic economy which would be necessary to eliminate internal fluctuations, would entail a far more effective dictatorship even than the Italian.

These sacrifices might be justified, however, if, as the isolationists argue, economic nationalism would eliminate the major causes of international strife and thus make for peace. Unfortunately, the evidence points strongly in the opposite direction. The argument rests upon the assumption that all countries would cheerfully surrender all financial claims now outstanding against foreign countries. If the United States government and the individual Americans who are creditors of the outside world to the extent of nearly twenty-five billions of dollars would voluntarily renounce all of their claims, the cause of peace would indeed be measurably advanced. But in practice, paradoxical though it seems, dyed-in-the-wool isolationists are always among the principal opponents to cancelation of the war debts, and frequently are among the most outspoken in favor of maintaining a large army and navy for the purpose of protecting American property rights abroad. It is no accident that one of the largest items in the domestic recovery program is an appropriation of over $200,000,000 for naval construction, or that the government has recently made large purchases of munitions and other war supplies. The fundamental spirit behind economic nationalism is a war psychosis, bent on the defense of what are deemed to be national interests.

No one could reasonably maintain, for instance, that during the last few years, when economic nationalism has had an almost unchallenged sway in every country, the threat of war has been substantially reduced. Instead of diminishing the points of friction, the development of a series of self-contained states would greatly intensify the competition for essential raw materials, as well as increase the struggle for the rapidly disappearing markets as an outlet for inevitable surpluses. Under such conditions, imperialism would be likely to assume its cruder form of open territorial acquisition, and the danger of conflict between imperial groups would be greatly magnified.

Meanwhile the basic issues before the London conference lie even deeper than the conflict between nationalism and internationalism. Control versus freedom is as significant an issue in the international sphere as in the realm of domestic legislation. Indecision and attempts to compromise between irreconcilable programs must inevitably lead to serious maladjustments if not to complete disaster.

Murder for the Job

By HILTON BUTLER

FRANK KINCAID, Negro fireman on the Mississippi division of the Illinois Central Railroad, climbed into the cab of "The Creole" as crews were being changed late one night in Canton, twenty-five miles north of Jackson, the capital of Mississippi. Against the lighted window he made a perfect target for a gunman in the darkness outside. A shotgun belched a load of buckshot into the Negro's head and he fell back into the coal tender to die. A white man took his place, and "The Creole" pulled out for New Orleans.

To Mississippi newspapers and the correspondents of such outside journals as the Memphis Commercial-Appeal and the Birmingham Age-Herald, it was just another Negro murder, barely worth a paragraph. A week later, however, they had a strangely similar paragraph to print:

Ed Cole, a Negro fireman on the same division, stepped at night from his cab to throw a switch at Water Valley junction. From behind the curtains of an unlighted automobile that drew up beside the track a shotgun roared, and Ed fell over the switch to die. A white man took his place in the cab.

Mississippi, in its own primitive way, had begun to deal with the unemployment problem. Dust had been blown from the shotgun, the whip, and the noose, and Ku Klux practices were being resumed in the certainty that dead men not only tell no tales but create vacancies. And since it was necessary that the vacancies should go to white men, other events followed in rapid succession after the first two assassinations:

Gus Emera, Negro fireman at Durant, saw a closed car rush toward him as he stepped from an engine to a side-track. He jumped back in time to miss the second shotgun load, but the first was sufficient to send him to the railroad hospital with serious wounds.

Cleve Sims, Negro fireman also stationed at Durant, walked into the yards at night to go to work. From behind a water tank a shotgun blazed, and Cleve fell badly wounded.

Jack Taylor and Fred Harmon, Durant Negro firemen, fearful now of going to or from work alone, left the yards together at night. Shotguns were fired at them and both fell with dangerous wounds.

One hundred miles south of Durant is an overhead bridge. As an Illinois Central train passed under, a gunman stationed there poured a shotgun charge into Peter Lewis, Negro fireman. The aim was too hasty. Lewis recovered.

Flogging was used next. Ernest Boilan, Negro fireman of McComb, was taken at night into the woods of Pike County and whipped into unconsciousness. There were other floggings—but the Boilan story was the only one that reached the public. His neck had also felt the noose.

Sam Barnes and Turner Sims, Negro firemen of McComb, were leaving the yards together. Shotgun charges tore into their flesh, but with bad aim. Both recovered.

After that the users of shotguns took better aim. Aaron Williams of Vicksburg, oldest Negro fireman on the Mississippi division, was exercising his seniority rights to hold his job, despite the warnings which had reached him that to do so meant death. As his freight locomotive halted in the Vicksburg yards, Williams made a perfect target in the cab window. The shotgun roared and Williams fell dead. A white man, of course, took his place.

A lighted flare lured Wilburn Anderson, Vicksburg Negro fireman, to his death. His engineer stopped the train in the southern yards of Vicksburg to investigate the warning signal. Wilburn climbed down, and as he did so the flare went out. A shotgun was fired at close range and the Negro dropped dead, his head blasted almost entirely from his body.

Inside the city limits of Vicksburg an Illinois Central locomotive proceeded slowly across a busy intersection. An automobile came close, and a shotgun belched a charge of buckshot into the Negro fireman, James Weddington. He fell back into the coal tender, but survived his wounds.

The gunmen awaited their next victim on the Mississippi-Louisiana line. Frank Johnson, fifty-five-year-old Negro fireman with long seniority rights, died from gunshot wounds.

Sunday morning at Natchez. Will Harvey, Negro fireman, left the yards to walk home. Three men stepped from a car with drawn curtains. When it sped away, Harvey was dead on the Natchez sidewalk, the charge of three shotgun shells in his body.

"All I know is that he was a man in a light overcoat. He had turned the collar up. I couldn't see his face." Thus testified the engineer of the locomotive from which Wilburn Anderson had climbed down in the Vicksburg yards to investigate the burning flare. And that was the only description of the murderer that the Warren County grand jury, in special session, obtained. It failed to aid the railroad and police detectives. Nor did it stop the killings.

"I pledge the whole power of State and county officers for the enforcement of the law and the protection of working Mississippians!" proclaimed Governor M. Sennet Conner. "We will aid!" said officers of the Mississippi-Tennessee Police Association, which happened to be in convention in Vicksburg at the time of the Anderson murder. "Come before the grand jury and tell what you know," pleaded Judge E. M. White of Warren County to Negro railroad workmen. None came.

The report of the grand jury was typical of each and every report which is brought in when a white man has murdered a Negro. It ran: "We, your grand jurors . . . have been wholly unable to find the murderer or murderers of ——. Having performed our duty, we now respectfully request to be discharged."

"This reign of terror will have no effect whatever on our policy of giving Negroes their employment rights," said G. E. Patterson, vice-president of the Illinois Central, but there were few Negro firemen left to employ, and even fewer willing to take the job over a white Mississippian. The ghost of the Ku Klux Klan had waved a bloody hand to Jim Crow on the railroad. The toll to date is: murdered—7; wounded—7; flogged—1.

In a Nazi Court of Justice

By R. S. WHEELER

Brunswick, Germany, June 13

THE first cases in the new special courts (Sondergerichte) which have been established to hasten the punishment of persons guilty of acts against the new regime were heard on April 8. In Brunswick the first culprit was the twenty-year-old laborer Gerhard Junke, who was accused of appearing on the street on March 19 wearing a pin which indicated that he belonged to a Young Communists' organization. The accused said that he did not know that the wearing of any button or pin indicating membership in a Communist organization was forbidden. His attorney claimed that since his client had worn the button on the 19th, and the law had gone into effect on the 31st, the boy should be freed or let off with a small fine. However, Junke was sentenced to six months in jail on the ground that the wearing of such pins was forbidden also by the emergency decree of February 28. The prosecutor, Oberstaatsanwalt Battmer, added that the court could soon make itself unnecessary by handing down such stiff sentences that everyone could see what the National Awakening really meant. Severe sentences were not meted out for pleasure, but in the belief that the harshest measures are, in the end, the most humane. The purpose of severe penalties was to prove to even the most reckless of those who object to the new regime that all opposition is futile, and that it is better to swim with the current than to try to battle against it. Let all persons be warned what to expect if they are foolish enough to continue the hopeless struggle against the Hitler Government.

The next prisoner was Hans Steffen, twenty-one years old, a laborer out of work, accused of wearing a swastika without being a party member. He claimed that he had found the button, and wore it because he thought he had a better chance of receiving alms if he indicated that he was a Nazi. His attorney asked that the accused be freed because the emblem in question was not a regular party-membership button but a simple swastika, and because he had worn it not for political reasons but because of his destitution. Nevertheless, Steffen received a six months' sentence, for otherwise, the court declared, "every Communist would be encouraged to wear a Nazi button."

A twenty-year-old locksmith, Hans Meyer, was accused of distributing Socialist leaflets in Greene on March 4, the day before election. Meyer claimed that he had received the leaflets from the Volksfreund on February 27, and had thrown them in the street to get rid of them. He was sentenced to six months in jail.

Fritz Drescher, a mechanic, twenty-nine years old, and Herrmann Koch, a laborer, thirty years old, next appeared, accused of distributing in Schlewec cards on which was printed, "Vote for Social Democrats, Ticket No. 2." Both admitted they had done this, but claimed they had no idea that it was forbidden. In fact, Koch had especially asked Drescher, who headed the Socialist local, if it was allowed, and Drescher had assured him that it was perfectly legal. Each of the accused received a sentence of two months, this mildness being due to the fact that Social Democrats had not been forbidden to vote.

The last man to come before the court on this day was Karl Habermann, twenty-four years old. He was accused of wearing a Communist button in a restaurant on the evening of March 25. Habermann claimed that the emblem was under his lapel out of sight, and that he had forgotten that it was still attached to the coat. He alleged further that he had got into a conversation with a young man who claimed that six months previously he had been an officer in the German Communist Party, whereupon Habermann had felt the button and had showed it to the stranger, who thereupon produced the identification card of an assistant policeman and arrested him.

This Nazi, called as a witness, swore that the accused, during a talk on political topics, had claimed that he would always remain what he had been, and had showed his anti-fascist button. The witness had then considered it his duty to turn Habermann over to the regular police. The attorney for the defense requested that his client be let off with a fine, since it was not claimed that the button had been worn openly. The court sentenced the accused to nine months in jail, because he had openly acknowledged that he still belonged to an organization that was working for violent revolution.

At the fourth meeting of the court on May 20 the following cases were tried. The first was that of Otto Bothe, a twenty-nine-year-old laborer of Goslar, who was accused of wearing the emblem of the "Naturfreunde," an organization of friends of the great outdoor world, said to have Marxist affiliations. Bothe claimed he did not know that the wearing of the button had been forbidden. The prosecuting attorney recommended the comparatively mild sentence of one month, which was agreed to by the judge.

Paula Müller of Wolfenbüttel had committed a somewhat similar crime by wearing the emblem of the "Iron Front" (Socialist) on March 8. She received a sentence of equal length.

Wilhelm Marquardt, a laborer twenty-four years old, was accused of selling in Bad Harzburg on March 3 Socialist leaflets which contained severe attacks on the National Socialist Party. There being no evidence to confute the accused's claim that he did not know he was acting unlawfully, he was sentenced to only two months in jail, instead of the six months requested by the prosecutor.

The last case was that of Richard Evers, a teamster, his wife, and Else Koch, a farm worker. On April 18 Frau Evers had repeated to the Koch girl tales of the frightful deeds of the storm divisions; she had alleged that in Vienenburg several persons had faced a firing squad, and that in Brunswick a number of individuals had been treated most cruelly. Herr Evers had also spread these stories—"Ein Fall des übelsten Klatsches" (a case of the worst kind of gossip) the Allgemeiner Anzeiger headlined it. The court granted the request of the prosecutor and sentenced each of the three to eighteen months' imprisonment.

In the Driftway

IN the past Americans, generally, have been indifferent to titles in their occupations. It is an outgrowth, no doubt, of the early American dream of equality and a land in which "one man is as good as another." In our industry often a man simply is in charge of certain work, and the higher he gets the more frequently it may be that his job has no official title. Inside the plant he is known as "the boss," while outside he is possibly alluded to as "the works." Even in government service America has no titles to compare in pomp and imagery with those abroad—say, Chancellor of the Exchequer or First Lord of the Admiralty. But some of us are learning that there is something in titles—that they pay in prestige and thus eventually in terms of that more important consideration, money. There is no doubt, for instance, that the modern "publicity director" or "public-relations counsel," has a better standing and income than the old-time "press agent." And Americans abroad have often found their lack of titles a handicap. One resourceful man, finding himself generally snubbed in Europe, had some cards engraved describing himself as "John Smith, Elector of the Sovereign State of New Jersey." After that he received more attention.

• • • • •

IN connection with the tendency to give more consideration to titles in America, the Drifter points to a recent arrival which he believes is not surpassed by even the most gorgeous appellations abroad. If the reader will consult the Manhattan Telephone Directory, he will find therein the following entry: "Emil Lederer, Sole Arbiter." What, the Drifter asks, could be grander or more awe-inspiring than that? What more inclusive and authoritative? What more final and convincing? The job of Sole Arbiter, as may be guessed, is a new one. The holder of it sits high up in the Maritime Building in downtown New York in the offices of the Transatlantic Passenger Steamship Conference. Fittingly, the offices overlook the unparalleled panorama of the world's most majestic harbor. The conference is an organization designed to arrange uniform rates and practices among transatlantic steamship lines, in other words, to eliminate the "advantages of free competition," still publicly extolled but no longer privately practiced (where it can be helped) in world industry. The conference found that it could make rules but that it needed somebody to enforce them. So a year ago it took Mr. Lederer away from the Hamburg-American Line and made him what some other industries have less happily called a "czar." That word meant something once, but in this day it is only a pitiful reminder of crumpled might. The steamship companies' Sole Arbiter, as may be imagined, is an unpretentious man who does not give interviews or talk about his work. He doesn't have to, for what he says goes. He has iron-gray hair and on his upper lip a closely cropped toothbrush. His eyes are his characteristic feature—black, a little hard, and a little tired except when he smiles through them. His manner is brusque, business-like, but not unfriendly. Whether he chose his title for himself or it was the thought of another, the Drifter does not know. The Drifter does know that it was a flash of genius.

SOLE ARBITER, the Drifter thinks, would be a matchless title either for this world or the next. The Drifter doesn't worry much about his own appellation in this world, but it has sometimes occurred to him that it will be no great asset when he reaches the Pearly Gates. He has a picture of a stern angel with a check-list in one hand and a sword in the other. He feels himself slumping and tongue-tied under the stern angel's gaze as the latter scans his check-list and says in a voice cold as from the tomb of the Pharaohs: "So you're the Drifter. There's no ticket for you in the box office. Drift along to the Other Place." On the other hand, how different it might be with a more impressive title. Imagine, for instance, striding up securely confident of one's standing, and without waiting for the stern angel to consult his records, pushing past with chin thrust out and a patronizing remark out of the corner of one's mouth: "I'm the Sole Arbiter. Stand aside, you, while I crash the gate."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Tax-free Cities, Another View

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The thesis so well set forth by Louis Bartlett in his article Tax-free Cities is unsound, it seems to me, and will hamper the future growth of municipal ownership. A municipal utility's first function is to supply satisfactory service to the public at the lowest possible cost. The citizens are consumers as well as owners. As owners they are entitled to a fair return on their investment. As consumers they are entitled to good service at low rates. The interest of an individual citizen as an owner and as a consumer are seldom the same.

In this connection it is noteworthy that the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin in very recent letters to municipal utilities has taken the stand that municipal utilities may transfer to the city general fund annually an amount not exceeding 6 per cent of the city's equity in the utility. If the utility is in good financial condition, an amount in excess of this 6 per cent may be transferred, but any additional payment must be considered as a return of principal originally advanced by the city, and will be applied to reduce the city's equity.

Permitting even municipal-owned utilities to make profits large enough to reduce or eliminate taxes is, as Mr. Bartlett admits, using the utility as a tax-collecting device. In other words, we have a high sales tax on electricity instead of on gasoline or bread. But a man's utility bill has no definite relationship to his ability to pay, to his material worth, to the benefits he may derive from government, or to his tax bill. Utility rate structures will need to be entirely remodeled if they are to serve the dual purpose of collecting for electricity and for general civic expenses.

To keep the records clear, I might add that I am an advocate of municipal ownership. In this small city of 4,200, the municipal utility has transferred $106,000 to the city general fund in the last six years. This has been done with a domestic rate of 9 cents for the first 15 kilowatt hours, 6 cents for the next 15 kilowatt hours, and all over 30 kilowatt hours at 2 cents; the utility pays taxes and has an adequate depreciation reserve. And the joke of all this is that the municipal utility buys the power in bulk from an Insull transmission line. My annual tax and utility bills are about equal—but in fairness the utility bill should be lower and the tax bill higher.

Perhaps the worst feature of using utility profits to pay city expenses is that this keeps the rates of municipal utilities higher than they otherwise would be. It tends to close the spread between private and municipal utility rates. There is no good reason why customers of a private utility should pay Rotary dues for company officers; neither is there any good reason why customers of a municipal utility cooking with electricity should pay more, through their electric bills, for maintaining a fire department than their neighbors who use a dangerous, old gasoline range.

Waupun, Wis., June 20

GEORGE W. GREENE

To Save the Rand School

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Rand School of Social Science is in the midst of a campaign to raise $17,000 in order to continue its work after twenty-seven years of existence. It would be a calamity if the Rand School were compelled to close its doors. It would be a calamity for the thousand and more students, men and women, old and young, who, laboring through the day, depend on the services of the school for enlightenment and refreshment. It would be a calamity to the civic life of the community, since the headquarters of the school also house a large number of offices of organized labor and other agencies whose activities reach out into the life of the city, and even, by means of correspondence courses and extension work and summer camps, into the life of State and nation.

It would be a calamity to intelligent, untrammelled thought and speech everywhere. The Rand School has been one of the foremost agencies in the country for the promotion of economic literacy and political understanding. The joy that reactionary forces would take in its closing is a measure of its usefulness and its standing. Its friends and the friends of enlightenment and sound adult education must see to it that its great work is not brought to a close for lack of funds.

The $17,000 required to save the Rand School and the People's House, if raised, will save the Rand Bookstore, the Rand School Press, the Labor Research Department, the Debs Auditorium, the Workers' Theater, the Meyer London Memorial Library, the Rand School extension and correspondence courses, and the home of the Workmen's Circle Children's School, the New Leader, the New York Socialist Party, and a host of trade-union organizations.

Readers of The Nation are urged to send their contributions to Mrs. Bertha H. Mailly, Chairman, Special Committee, 7 East Fifteenth Street, New York City.

New York, June 21

JOHN DEWEY

Manhattan Moment

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

This report, lacking any social or economic significance, merely gives a glimpse of the East River shipping which interested the writer.

Seen from the twenty-first floor of an apartment tower near the river's Manhattan shore, a tug was puffing northward with a barge in tow loaded with huge sharp fragments of granite, probably blasted from the excavation for a skyscraper and now destined for Hart's Island up-river, where ground is being filled in for new buildings of the city's public institutions. Just as this slow-voyaging and clumsy craft passed the lookout window, an outboard speedboat came frolicking by it, down-river, with its zip-tilted form flinging up delicately arched little geysers of spray from either flank, to flash in the sunlight. The contrast was impressive, as between a stolidly swimming thornback skate and a slender flying fish just cleaving the surface for an adventurous soar. Picturesque symbols of caution and audacity.

Roselle, N. Y., May 30

ELIOT WHITE

Medical Note

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Even the vulgarity of a pun can sometimes phrase pertinent criticism. One of my favorite Nation writers, Paul Y. Anderson, dissents from this, dissents from that, dissents from almost anything at all. Can it be a form of dysentery? That, one knows, weakens both body and spirit.

Saint Peter, Minn., June 15

LOUIS TOWLEY

Palestine's Isolated Prosperity

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The economic depression is not world wide. Palestine enjoys complete immunity from any form of the slump. The cause is not far to seek. Jews from all over the world, an appreciable percentage with capital, are flocking here for various reasons; some because of the local lucrative field for business ventures, others because of business stagnation elsewhere, political oppression, or Zionist propaganda. This immigration means a tremendous influx of capital to be invested. The working class comes chiefly from the Slav countries.

You have the cause, now for the effect. Instead of unemployment, there is a labor shortage. The country is devoted chiefly to citriculture, and therefore most of the labor is agricultural. I have seen the students of a local high school called upon to help with the spring planting. The budget, instead of showing the usual deficit, is balanced and has a surplus. There is a real-estate and building boom in progress which smacks of America in 1927 and 1928. Having arrived from the United States and Canada a few months ago, and visited several European countries en route, I am prepared to state that to my knowledge these conditions of economic welfare are unique.

The cost of living is exceedingly low. A luxurious suite can be had for a maximum of $35 a month, providing you are quick. By this I mean that homes and apartments are rented before construction is completed. First-class food can be procured for fifty cents a day.

True, Palestine is insignificant even beside the minor nations, let alone the Powers, but to the Jews and Arabs it is of vital importance. The Jew looks upon it as a potential homeland and the Arabs regard it as one of their pieces of property.

Most of these facts were illuminating and revealing to me. I write this in the thought that I may have been as well informed on these subjects as the average American.

Kfar Saba, Palestine, May 29

SAMUEL ZUKERMAN

Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am engaged upon a biography of Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby (David Ross Locke, 1833-88). If any of your readers knew him or heard him on the platform, will they please communicate with me.

Webster Groves, Mo., June 14

CYRIL CLEMENS

The "Best People" and the "Mob"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Democracy, according to the president of Colgate University, "is based on mob psychology which is destructive, unmoral, and would drop thousands of years from civilization." It is not surprising to find an American college president lining up with the executives of big business against the ideal of democracy; college presidents themselves are the most autocratic and irresponsible functionaries we have ever had in the United States. Naturally they would like to have the state governed politically on the same fascist lines that they have followed so successfully in their own institutions. As one who for more than thirty years has been a university teacher I should like to point out that while the rule of these institutional autocrats has resulted in an enormous material aggrandizement of plant and endowment, it has notoriously failed to make of the American university a potent social influence. The mediocrity of our college faculties is too well known to require specification; instead of creating social leaders they have turned out, especially during the late jazz era, largely bond salesmen, publicity experts, and radio announcers. College faculties as a rule have less social initiative and liberalism than the student bodies whose sporadic efforts to think for themselves on social and political matters they try, indirectly, to squelch.

The reason that many of us prefer the risks of "mob psychology" and the political method of "counting noses"—as one bitter critic of democracy, who prided himself on being the first to apply the ingeniously vicious system of "voting trustees," once called it—is quite simple. Our so-called "best people," those whose social and educational advantages are superior to the herd, so often guess wrong on vital human questions, especially where their own interests are involved! Without tediously reciting the many instances of this truth in our own history from the Revolution to the Civil War, instances in which the verdict of time has proved the "mob" to have been right against the judgments of timid Tories and selfish industrialists and rugged individualists, it is sufficient to mention the great war and the fantastic peace. This most lamentable of all human mistakes was neither designed, initiated, nor engineered by the common people of any nation, although all known devices of manipulating "mob psychology" were used by the governing classes to flog their peoples into the slaughter. Here in America it was the house of Morgan, aided by our socially best people, which first ardently espoused the cause of the Allies and ultimately worked the country into the war—which many of them now ruefully regret. It was these influences, not the "mob," that committed the stupendous stupidities at Versailles. It was one of the partners of the great house of Morgan who had so little economic or financial foresight as to gloat (and admit it afterwards in his "What Really Happened in Paris"!) when Wilson impatiently decided to break the pledged word of the armistice agreement and admit pensions and reparation allowances as items of the enormous indemnity to be exacted from the foe—which has plagued the world ever since. Mr. Dulles has related how the three first demands made upon Germany by the victorious political and military leaders—coal, ships, and replacement of destroyed factories—were all repudiated within three short years by the Allies themselves. It was not the "mob" that made the Treaty of Versailles, the Dawes subterfuge, and the Young compromise, but the foremost statesmen and financiers of the world.

To come nearer home, it has not been "mob psychology" that has wrecked ten thousand of our banks in a few years but gross incompetency and dishonesty among our leading and most trusted citizens. It has not been the pressure of the "mob" that has compelled the Congress to confess moral and intellectual impotency and hand over its powers to the Executive in the hope that somehow he may get us out of the mess. So today, as it has ever been in an obscure world, it is safer to trust the collective judgment and instinct of humanity than the wisdom of the few, however able and well equipped they may appear to be. The mass of mankind can be easily confused, as our sly masters of finance and big business know only too well, since they hire the experts to befog the issues. But when the choice involves the simple moralities of existence, as most political and social choices ultimately must, one can trust the reactions of common men rather than the prejudices of the privileged few.

Indeed, it is one of the darker mysteries of human existence that education and cultural advantages do not necessarily endow the individual with either character or wisdom. For the human animal rarely rises above class and cultural influences. I had rather take my chances with the psychology of the mob than with that of Messrs. Herbert Hoover, Lawrence Lowell, Winston Churchill, et al! Democracy will withstand all the nibblings of our cultured fascists because ultimate power lies with the masses and they know that they cannot trust either the good will or the good sense of their intellectual superiors. They have been too often betrayed.

Autocracy, feudalism, capitalism, each has crumbled in its day, not because as a social system it was inherently unworkable, but because its special beneficiaries lacked the intelligence and the character to make it workable.

York Village, Me., May 29

ROBERT HERRICK

Volunteer Research

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Some of your readers may be interested to learn that there is in New York City a group of graduate and undergraduate students at present engaged in sustained independent research on problems of economic reorganization and particularly in an investigation of the perishable food industries and the preparation of outlines of socialization for these industries. The group can use the volunteer assistance of men and women who are interested in and familiar with the technical and economic aspects of the dairy-products, fruit-and-vegetable, and meat-products industries.

Each individual develops a special phase of the industry in which he is interested. This development consists of outlining a brief history, completing a bibliography, and indicating the most important problems needing further research. Individuals with a moderate amount of time this summer to devote to such a project are invited to communicate with me at 412 Schermerhorn Annex, Columbia University.

New York, June 8

LUCY KRAMER, Secretary,
Industrial Research Group

Would Form Nation Club

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Readers of The Nation are all deeply interested in the subjects taken up in it and should band themselves together in each locality in some form of discussion club in order that they may intelligently digest what they read. I should be glad if Lincoln, Nebraska, readers would take such a step, and I wish I might hear from some of them at 2101 South Thirty-fifth Street.

Lincoln, Neb., June 6

WILBER E. SANFORD

Books and Films

Elegiac

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

"This delicate flesh, this flower without fruit—"
So shall the elegy begin, and so
Its music find you not irresolute,
Moving to measures postulant and slow.
O lyric wreath twined while the breast is warm
And the lids hardly shut upon the eyes!
Lean to those lips and, lest they speak, inform Sorrow with texts none other shall revise.

Discharge to this anonymous dust your debt—
It will not answer or confound your word,
Happier in oblivion to forget
The resurrection which has been conferred;
Nor dim the light that aftertime may shed
More on the valiant living than the dead.

Prophets of Doom

THREE booklets have just been issued by a new publishing house calling itself Arrow Editions. One of them is a handsomely bound and handsomely printed pamphlet which begins as follows:

A specter is haunting Europe—the specter of communism. All the Powers of old Europe have entered into a holy alliance to exorcise this specter. . . . Where is the party in opposition that has not been decried as communistic by its opponents in power? Where the opposition that has not hurled back the branding reproach of communism against the more advanced opposition parties? . . . Communism is already acknowledged by all European Powers to be itself a power.

The format of the little volume suggests one of the more indecorous classics periodically republished "for book lovers." This opening paragraph suggests, on the other hand, the essay which one may find in any issue of any "left" magazine, or even, these days, of any "popular" magazine as well. Actually, however, it is neither, but rather, as the cultured will recognize from this beginning, a little work published in 1848 and called "The Communist Manifesto."

To one who, like myself, has never read this essay before, the most striking thing about it all is the complete familiarity of everything that is said. One has not only heard elsewhere advanced all the theories propounded, but one seems to have heard them in precisely the same words.

In these crises there breaks out an epidemic that, in earlier epochs, would have seemed an absurdity—the epidemic of overproduction. . . . And how does the bourgeoisie get over these crises? On the one hand, by the enforced destruction of a mass of productive forces; on the other, by the conquest of new markets, and by the more thorough exploitation of the old ones. That is to say, by paving the way for more and more destructive crises, and by diminishing the means whereby crises are prevented.

Surely these sentences, chosen at random from fifty equally striking ones, have been sold in very slightly modified form to a dozen current magazines during the last few years. So, of course, has the one about how modern industrial methods have produced internationalism, and the other even mustier one which points out how these same industrial methods have reduced the handicrafts man to the position of a mere cog in the machine. One begins to suspect that editors have been steadily paying good money for matter in the public domain, and to wonder if several might not have saved their publications from bankruptcy if they had been willing to compose their own rehashes of the "Communist Manifesto." I am told that Lenin made very important contributions to the technique of revolution. I suspect, on the other hand, that no one has added anything important to its theory since the "Manifesto" was published.

Now it is generally admitted that the events of the last few years have made certain the imminent doom of society. It is something of a shock to learn that the revolution was, for exactly the same reasons, equally inevitable eighty-five years ago. But the shock is succeeded by a thought mildly comforting to one who, doubtless for entirely unworthy motives, is not anxious to be present when the doom falls—namely, the thought that, if the revolution was inevitable eighty-five years ago, it may be just barely possible that it will still be only "inevitable" eighty-five years hence. Marx and Engels are so convincing that they undermine the conviction carried by their contemporary followers, who cannot demonstrate the fact that society must fall any more convincingly than Marx and Engels demonstrated that it could not possibly last until now. I shall not, in my ignorance, attempt to find the flaw in their argument, but it may be somehow connected with their insistence that the worker would inevitably get less and less as he produced more and more. Doubtless he did not, in the years that followed the enunciation of this "law," get his fair share; but he did, in absolute terms, get more, and it is just possible that he will be given still more tomorrow. If he is, then the just society will not arrive, but the bourgeoisie may, to the rage of the revolutionist, be clever enough to do again exactly what it did in the nineteenth century—yield just enough to keep this defective old society a going concern. The fact that men have always been inclined to do exactly that when faced with the "intolerable" abuses discovered from time to time in their economic and other institutions is one of the reasons why the world has remained what Schopenhauer called "at once the best and the worst of all possible worlds"—the best because no one knows how he can improve it, and the worst because if it were any less good than it is, it would not be allowed to exist at all.

In the introduction to another edition of the "Manifesto," published by the League of Industrial Democracy, Harold Laski confesses that Marx, the great apostle of united action, "had never learned the art of collegueship." "With Marx, to enter a movement was to dominate it. 'Hatred,' wrote Mazzini of him, 'outweighs love in his heart.'" "He was," adds Professor Laski, "often wrong, he was rarely generous, he was always bitter." He does not, however, add that this tendency of those who love humanity so much to hate most of the individual specimens with which they come in contact is one of the reasons why certain skeptics distrust such idealists and prefer the famous remark of Dean Swift: "I hate humanity, but I love Tom, Dick, and Harry." In any event, however, there is one thing more to be said in favor of the "Manifesto." It is easy to read. If that were equally true of the magnum opus of the Master there would be no point in a fable which I shall now adapt to my purpose. It appears that Karl Marx was acting Vergil to Lenin's Dante on a tour through hell. They were followed at a short distance by a crowd neither very large nor very small. "What company is that?" asked Lenin. His guide seemed puzzled. "I cannot tell," he replied. "The company is too large to be composed of my readers, but it is too small to be that of my commentators."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Wanting Is—What?

Letters of Robert Browning. Collected by Thomas J. Wise. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by Thurman L. Hood. Yale University Press. $5.

IT is an obvious enough generalization that some collections of letters are intrinsically interesting—interesting at least almost wholly "for their own sake"—and others interesting only on some special grounds, biographical or the like. Of the two types these letters of Browning's belong, with extremely few exceptions, to the latter. No doubt to Browning devotees—who still exist—and in some sense to scholars, every scrap of the poet's correspondence has a certain importance; and to the generally literate person perhaps three or four dozen of these present letters will be of interest on the ground that Browning himself is something like a great poet. But that is as much as can be said. Browning was as far as Tennyson from being a "letter-writer," and the bulk of the letters in this book have singularly little value, even—one feels at first—on secondary and biographical grounds. There is a great deal here by way of family news, expressions of thanks for one kindness or another, plans for vacations, and similar commonplaces—commonplaces not unjustly represented by such sentences as these: "I sent a bill, for Pen, from the Paris frame-maker, and a letter for Fannie. I dined with the Schlesingers two days ago. . . . The Douglas Murrays were there—he desired me to tell you that the best of his pups is 'laid down' for you. . . . Our weather is fairly good—mild enough, and reasonably free from fog just now." The best typography in New Haven can hardly make literature out of this.

More of it than most readers of this review will believe is in a comparable vein. But of course the volume cannot be disposed of merely in these terms. Indeed, a second thought might well be that it was astute editing on Dean Hood's part to include everything, even the notes of acceptance and the postcardesque correspondence from summer resorts. Only thus, perhaps, can a full impression of the man Browning be successfully rendered. This, doubtless, is the reverse of the medal of which the obverse appears in the ardent letters of his early maturity to Elizabeth Barrett. For Browning was a complicated human being in whose breast dwelt at least two souls—the soul of a late romantic poet and the soul of a suburban bank clerk, the latter of which was sublimated, as his life went on, into the soul of a highly presentable clubman. In a sense, this is familiar enough, and Henry James made it the point of his story, "The Private Life"; but I doubt whether it has ever been so fully demonstrated as in this volume, and I wonder whether, even now, all its bearings have been sufficiently indicated. Has it ever been put in crudely simple terms that Robert Browning, beautifully endowed as he was, was the poet of insular Nonconformism, the Sophocles of nineteenth-century Whiggery, the reconciler—for the benefit of linen-draperies and M. P.'s—of Shelley and T. B. Macaulay, the mouthpiece of British pragmatic liberalism on its more idealistic, perhaps more pretentious, side; that, at the same time that he was a man of genius, he shared, both as a person and as a writer, the moral and intellectual limitations of his class and his contemporaries?

At any rate, the shopkeeper and the clubman are far more visible in these letters than the man of genius. "With all his audacities," said Edward Dowden, Browning "was preeminently prudent." In short, he was an English dissenter, intellectually cautious, socially conventional, insensitive to the darker realities of his age, cheerfully indiscriminating; and it is the English dissenter who mainly emerges here. Here is the Browning who hobnobs with evangelical preachers; who defers to Lord Leighton and Alma-Tadema; whose liking for Italy was confessedly "always a selfish one"; who can speak like any Calvinist of "the copperhead of human nature" (apropos of the Franco-Prussian War); who is "dead against" Gladstone and his Home Rule stand, but delighted at Joseph Chamberlain's success; who dines out, "with two exceptions," "for the last sixteen days"; who proposes to Lady Ashburton with an eye, apparently, to making his son the heir to her enormous fortune; and who, save for some allusions to his English fellow-authors, never mentions a contemporary thinker of any real distinction. This is to put all the emphasis, with a kind of cynicism, on one side; and it should be said that there are occasional glimpses here of the man who drank some drops out of Shelley's cup, who wrote the great soliloquies and monologues, and who befriended Landor and Margaret Fuller. But the prose heavily outweighs the poetry, and the volume can hardly be recommended to romantic spirits. To the historically minded, who are willing to focus even a considerable poet in his whole temporal and local scene, it can be recommended heartily as a document.

NEWTON ARVIN

A Recent Eden

Land of the Spotted Eagle. By Chief Standing Bear. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THE perfect life which this book describes was lived no more than sixty years ago, in a paradise whose area is familiar to us under the names North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Wyoming. Yet it was a life to which ours bears no relation whatsoever, and even the territory no longer exists. The land is there, with the same sky over it and the same sun rising and setting; but the Black Hills have been stripped of their forests and ripped open for their gold, and neither the sun nor the sky is observed, acknowledged, or saluted by Lakotas who suppose that their world will hold together easily forever.

It did not hold together at all, as everybody knows. Chief Standing Bear, born in a Plains tipi and brought up by his parents as every Lakota boy had been brought up during innumerable centuries, lived to see the white man exterminate his people's buffalo, lived to watch warriors returning in defeat from the Indian wars, lived to go East for an "education" at Carlisle, lived (as half of his young friends did not) to come home to a reservation, lived to behold his people humiliated and slandered by the race which had conquered them—and lived to write two books in defense of his departed culture.

Chief Standing Bear's previous book, "My People the Sioux," was an autobiography, and as such possessed the unique advantage of having a vast stretch of human history to deal with—from the Stone Age until now. The present volume is almost entirely concerned with the general aspects of this great theme. It is personal only when Standing Bear resorts to his own experience, or to that of his family, to illustrate a point. His subject is the Lakota way of life, and his moral is that the Lakota way was unspeakably superior to our own. His effect is to fill any generous white reader with belief.

"Very early in life," says Standing Bear, "the child began to realize that wisdom was all about and everywhere and that there were many things to know. There was no such thing as emptiness in the world. Even in the sky there were no vacant places. Everywhere there was life, visible and invisible, and every object possessed something that would be good for us to have also—even to the very stones. This gave a great interest to life. Even without human companionship one was never alone." Such is his beginning. Then he goes on to show how it was that an Indian boy became acquainted with this world—not his world only, but his father's, his mother's, his people's world also, and every living creature's. It was a valuable world because so many beings shared it; it was a precious world, not to be walked in carelessly, and never to be looked on with contempt. All life, including human life, was valuable to an Indian, with the result that he managed his days with temperance, brought up his children neither with effort nor with neglect, killed animals reverently and delicately for their flesh or fur, kept the peace whenever possible, and frequently held communication with those spirits who for him represented the sentient, controlling Whole. He was always busy, never bored, and if Standing Bear is right in what he remembers, almost invariably happy.

It is obvious that a hundred and twenty million people could never live so wisely. But that would be no answer for Standing Bear. Nor for the Great Spirit, who may be smiling at us now.

MARK VAN DOREN

For Social Insurance

Insecurity: A Challenge to America. By Abraham Epstein. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $4.

THE author of this book has, during the last decade, been one of the most useful citizens in the country. He began his work for old-age pensions just as the post-war reaction was sweeping over the nation and putting a quietus upon virtually all social legislation. With inadequate resources and at a great personal sacrifice, he has kept steadily on, working for a self-respecting system of pensions to protect old age, and it is due more to him than to any other man that there are today no fewer than twenty-five States with old-age pension laws, and that the movement is on the high road to universal adoption. Through his devotion and energy he has built up the American Association for Old Age Security from scratch to a militant membership of 6,000 members. Just as this association, with its original battle nearly won, is now moving out into the broader struggle for other forms of social insurance, so Mr. Epstein in this timely volume considers the general problem of insecurity in modern life and the ways in which it may be lessened by social action. More than any other book of which I know, this book does for the present generation what those by Rubinow and Seager did for that which preceded it, by bringing together between two covers not merely an analysis of the various and great risks which modern workers face but also the best methods for meeting them.

Mr. Epstein points out that the transition of America from a nation of self-employed farmers, craftsmen, and merchants to one composed primarily of employees has meant that the mass of the people are dependent upon wages and salaries, and that their incomes are subject to severe interruptions through accidents, illness, unemployment, industrial old age, and the death of the wage-earner. In a well-documented fashion, Mr. Epstein goes on to show how the wages, the savings, and the property of the working classes are in general insufficient to provide them, upon an individual basis, with adequate protection against these catastrophes. Then in a sharp but substantially accurate manner he debunks the various industrial panaceas, such as the spread of insurance, employee stock ownership, welfare plans, and the stabilization programs of specific concerns, by which the individualistic capitalism of the twenties both asserted and believed that it was solving the industrial problem and bringing plenty and security for all.

With the way thus cleared, the author shows how the pooling of a relatively minor proportion of the national income might give to the minority who suffer from these severe interruptions of working-class income a self-respecting minimum of protection, and how this would lift a heavy load of anxiety from the minds of all. He reviews foreign experience with unemployment insurance and very properly points out that the Ohio plan for a State-wide pool gives greater protection and more uniform treatment to the unemployed than the Wisconsin plan of separate and mutually exclusive reserves for each plant. The author then demonstrates that the high cost of medical care and the loss of earnings are a crushing burden upon those who suffer from more or less severe ailments, and that insurance will so distribute these expenses over a wider group as to make them collectively and individually bearable. The case for old-age pensions is next presented, accompanied by a detailed program for action, and the defects in our present system of workmen's compensation are analyzed and made clear. The book closes with a description of the systems of mothers' aid in this and other countries, a discussion of the family-allowance system, and a spirited appeal for action in the field of social insurance by our State and national governments.

Excellent as Mr. Epstein's work is, it is naturally not without certain minor defects. The economic reasoning is at times somewhat superficial, and the tone sometimes unduly cocksure. This is evidenced when the author advocates the British system of flat-rate contributions and payments, which have nothing to recommend them except slight administrative advantages, and when he waves aside any economic analysis showing the ultimate tendency of even capitalistic society to reabsorb workers temporarily displaced because of technological and managerial improvements. But these occasional blemishes do not seriously impair the solid values of Mr. Epstein's work. He has given us a good book which well deserves wide circulation and study.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

Apostolic Blows and Knox

Broadcast Minds. By Ronald Knox. New York: Sheed and Ward. $2.50.

FATHER RONALD KNOX'S is not a name with which to conjure in this country, but in England he occupies the rather self-conscious position of a member of a well-known Protestant family who has been converted to Catholicism. He is also, like his brother, E. V. Knox, and like G. K. Chesterton, a popular writer of light essays and a bit of a humorist. When he adventures into the banal business of combating "atheism," "agnosticism," and "free thought," he becomes, like his brother in the faith, Mr. Chesterton, a trifle naive, not to say disingenuous. To quote the first Samuel Butler, "He proves his doctrines orthodox with apostolic blows and knocks," save that the times have changed, and the method of attack is less physical than was once the practice of the church which he left and the church which he joined. This volume, as its imprint would suggest, is an excursion into Catholic orthodoxy as the measure of contemporary thought. "Broadcast Minds" is a term of abuse applied by Father Knox to writers who sway public opinion without first consulting Saint Thomas Aquinas. Whether they actually broadcast or not is immaterial, apparently—his chief objects of attack are H. G. Wells, H. L. Mencken, Julian Huxley, Bertrand Russell, H. Langdon-Davies, and Gerald Heard.

Strange as it may seem, these eminent literati suffer from one common defect against which Father Knox's libertarian, enlightened, emancipated Catholic mind revolts: they are dogmatic; they lay down the law; they impose upon the unthinking masses of men; they are particularly positive about matters in which they are not experts; they often make mistakes. It is true, they do not persecute, torture, and kill those with whom they do not agree, and then declare them saints. They do not condemn a woman to a series of Caesarian sections because, as celibates, they are authorities on such matters as sexual love and gynecology. Their utterances, however rash, lack something of that not-too-wistful medievalism which distinguishes a papal encyclical from an editorial in the Morning Post or the Express. When is a dogma not a dogma? When it is supported by the authority of the Church of Rome. These intellectuals are unbearably dogmatic; they give no free play to human inquiry. Everything that is as plain as a pikestaff to an Irish or Sicilian peasant is completely beyond the comprehension of their narrow minds.

Father Knox repeats the old, old story that there is no conflict between religion and science. Archaeology, anthropology, biology, physics, and astronomy are all mentioned, in a grand finale, as proving this thesis. The Catholic church has never been a stronghold of obscurantism; knowledge has not been won in the face of clerical opposition; the holy priests have always been the torch-bearers of light and learning (not being an Irishman, Father Knox spares us all reference to the Island of Saints and Scholars). He admits, however, that we village atheists have one trump card: Galileo. In this case, it appears, there was a regrettable but isolated conflict between knowledge and ignorance. Since then only one solitary scientific event can be described as having caused the faintest rift between orthodox Christianity and science, and that was the publication of "The Origin of Species." This, however, was a mere trifle, vastly exaggerated by Professor Huxley's grandfather and the latter's colleagues, who failed lamentably to see the joke. Our modern "broadcast minds" somehow have failed to stress the vast rejoicing, the enthusiastic encouragement and understanding, with which the clergy received all efforts to elucidate the story of man's genesis.

However, let it not be thought that Father Knox is not a good clerical mixer, a man of the world, if not a muscular Christian. He is willing to rub shoulders with the commonest of men, if not with common sense. Although not, as he confesses, an admirer of the B. B. C., with its horrible pronunciation and anti-religious bias, he did listen to a broadcast made by the Supreme Pontiff. His Holiness, needless to say, was not a broadcast mind. He was entirely lacking in dogmatism. "It is difficult to imagine any occasion more impressive, I will not say to any Catholic, but to any mind which has a proper perspective of history. The Voice which spoke was one never before heard on the shores of England." Having heard this Voice (why the capital?) myself, I can vouch for the fact that Achille Ratti spoke very much like any Italian priest. His French was very dubious in spots, his German much less influenced by Italian idioms, his Latin as it should be. As a bid for world trade I thought it rather inconsiderate to omit English and Polish, the languages of a number of devoted clients, not to mention Spanish, never so useful as in these days of recalcitrancy in Spain and Mexico.

The Pope did not have the assistance of interpreters; otherwise what Father Knox calls the Voice might have been heard also for the first time in New York. Evidently, relying only on plenary inspiration, the Supreme Pontiff had not seriously considered the radio as a possible stimulus to the faithful in Ireland, Poland, the United States, and—Oxford. But when all broadcast minds are directed from Vatican City, Father Knox can then write another book pleading for ungrammatical, un-B. B. C. French, English, Spanish, and Polish, divinely inspired and free from philological dogmatism. By that time, however, someone not privileged to be an Italian may fulfil the inscrutable will of God by being awarded the papal tiara. Then, indeed, we shall have surcease from the inquisitorial intolerance, the medieval ignorance, of Messrs. Wells, Huxley, Mencken, and Russell. But, owing to the "Index Expurgatorius," we shall never be able to discover that it was Voltaire, not Napoleon (as Father Knox supposes) who said that if God did not exist, we should have to invent him.

ERNEST BOYD

Pathos Is Not Enough

Pity Is Not Enough. By Josephine Herbst. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

IN her first novel Miss Herbst wrote about very ordinary people living somewhat less than ordinary lives, and by making them seem important by virtue of their very ordinariness gave us a picture of American life more real and profound than such pictures usually turn out to be. For the principal defect of our fiction in the last five or ten years has been a belated application of the American spirit of pioneering and exploitation to the subject matter of the novel, an emphasis on various elements of strangeness, wildness, or mere picturesqueness in our national past which more often than not replaces an intensive enough preoccupation with character or theme. Because of the current widespread interest in the American past, the American novelist of the moment is more fortunate than his European fellow-worker, who suffers from the prevalent debility of themes without having the same lush variety of concrete settings to offer as a possible substitute. The result has been that our fiction recently has been characterized by a kind of richness—a richness, it is true, not more than skin deep—which has led too many people to believe that it is also very important. Much of it has resembled a colored lantern-slide naturalism more than anything else, and many of its writers recall to mind Rebecca West's remark about Zola, that while he did not believe that Rome was built in a day he seemed to believe that it could be described in less.

The change in Miss Herbst's choice of material since "Nothing Is Sacred" illustrates all this as well as anything in some time. Actually her first book possessed solid qualities of style and characterization than many more pretentious and successful novels published during the same season. But her characters, placed in a contemporary and painfully humdrum setting, revealed themselves to be so empty of mind and soul as to be wholly lacking in any kind of significance, moral or otherwise; and the futile automatism of their actions probably depressed their creator, as they certainly did the reader, with a pretty acute feeling of spiritual nausea. At the end Miss Herbst was able to discover no meaning in the lives of these people for whom nothing is sacred; and to Miss Herbst's credit it must be said that she seems to be aware of the necessity of discovering some meaning in the lives of the people whom she creates in her fiction. The only question is whether she has followed just the right course in this new and much more ambitious novel. Here we have scale as we did not have it in her earlier book.

"Pity Is Not Enough" is the record of an American family from the Civil War to the present. It traces its hero, Joe Trexler, through carpet-bagging days in the South, through gold-prospecting and other adventures in the West, to his ultimate insanity and death. A great deal of ground is covered, in the most literal sense, and a great many details of our national history are worked into the fabric. Miss Herbst knows her materials and knows them well enough not to impose them too obviously on our attention. But what is lost in all this tenderly careful reconstruction of the post-Civil War era is exactly "poor Joe" Trexler himself, the hero, who has hardly more function than to serve as a center for the documentation and the often very beautiful nostalgic prose. Because we are never made to believe in him as a man, as distinguished from a kind of historical symbol, neither he nor the period that he represents ever becomes quite alive with meaning. The mood of pathos, somewhat reminiscent of Glenway Wescott, with which Miss Herbst suffuses her pages is not enough to give meaning even to a single life. Characterization might be enough—if a few of our novelists would only decide to concentrate on it again.

WILLIAM TROY

A Contemporary Classicist

The Poems of T. Sturge Moore. Collected Edition. Volumes I, II, and III. The Macmillan Company. $5 each.

POETRY is denied popularity for various reasons, few of them constant from decade to decade but all of them readily comprehensible to students of taste and public temperament. It is harder to understand the recurrent obscurity or vogue of certain writers within the field of critical appreciation itself. We have explained to our own satisfaction and flattery the reclaiming of Donne, Emily Dickinson, and Gerard Hopkins to honor in the twentieth century. The homage rendered these masters has perhaps allowed too little attention to several poets of similar integrity and isolated distinction whose careers are too recent to admit of exciting exhumations. One of these poets is T. Sturge Moore, whom the present collected edition exhibits in a beautiful typography and binding of his own design. It may aid in calling wider attention to the "exceptional sensibility" which several admirers, among them Ezra Pound, praised in his work twenty years ago, and which steadily underlies his remarkable achievement.

The enthusiast for contemporary styles will be deterred at the outset by Moore's almost complete scorn of fashionable methods or innovations. The reader's adjustment to his specifically personal, uninfluenced point of view, overlaid as it is with traditional feeling, is as necessary as in approaching the work of Francis James or Robert Bridges. It is that point of view, however, which provides the clue to Moore's quality. He has based his work neither upon the perversely eccentric mentality which produces the sensational poetic innovator, nor in the consciously shared experience which robs many modern poets of invigorating isolation and consequent strength of judgment, but on a moral and aesthetic intelligence of his own determination. This intelligence, schooled in classic forms, has not hesitated to draw its attitudes from them when it has found that those attitudes conformed to the poet's own bent or voice. Moore has therefore adapted to his own use historical themes, legends, fantasies, and even familiar phrases and clichés without suggesting servile imitation of his models. And because his poems, whatever their traditional qualities, are formed on the basis of his own resolute convictions, they persuade us again that poetic language is neither made nor ruined by specialized vocabulary, by classical or topical phraseology, provided that it issues from a sincere and authentic self-determination on the part of the poet himself. Our superstition about traditional rhetoric in modern poetry will not be corrected until, as Eliot once suggested, we recognize the existence of "a rhetoric of substance also, which is right because it issues from what it has to express."

Approached in this way, Moore's poems and dramas lose the remote preciousness and oracular aloofness which repel at first glance. He has not always been an exact judge of his limitations. His emphatic personal reserve has not prevented him from exploiting opinions or experiments which are of a purely private significance and doubtless damage the effect of his best work. These defects in proportion must also be held to account for several of his unimpressive critical pronouncements in English magazines, and for some of the metrical novelties scattered through this edition. He has frequently been diverted to trivial utterance by intimate friendships and by some of his more random literary and artistic interests. This will not detract from the pure intention and clarity of tone which pervade his serious work: the exquisite lyrics, of which "The Dying Swan" has been made familiar through Yeats's admiration; the poems of childhood in "The Little School"; the shapely translations from Rimbaud, Verlaine, Ronsard, and Valéry; and the longer dramatic poems, of which "Danaë," "Tyrting," and "Judith" are the best. A better knowledge of these poems will enrich not only our store of modern poetry but, what is more important, our understanding of it.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Metternich and the "Beasts"

Metternich: A Study of His Period and Personality. By Algernon Cecil. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

MR. CECIL takes a special pride in proclaiming himself "a reviving Tory," and one is led to suspect that his chief reason for writing about Metternich is that it gives him an opportunity to recite an object lesson in social and political science. He believes, quite significantly, that "we can learn as much from Metternich as it is possible for one distracted century to be taught by another," and that he was not "merely a man of his world, but a man of the world; and his wisdom, though in some ways the wisdom of his time, was in more the wisdom of all time." Now while Mr. Cecil would perhaps be the last person to deny that he is dedicated wholeheartedly to the Metternich variety of conservatism and its peculiar idea of social salvation, it is almost certain that this very thing has thrown a false emphasis and a distorted perspective on his work as a biographer and historian. His characters, though in many ways believable and human—especially Metternich himself—are continually avoiding him and attiring themselves in the garbs of melodramatic villains and ideal heroes. Not that Mr. Cecil tries consciously to distort fact, for this is most emphatically not the case, but by forever believing that his hero can do no wrong—that is, of course, in the way of social injustice or social shortsightedness—he involves himself in a series of amazing apologies and verbal prestidigitations.

It must be remembered that Metternich's greatest horror was the rumblings and manifestations of social and political change that were sweeping through Europe in the wake of the French Revolution. Anything that threatened or seemed to threaten the existence of his pet ancien régime was for him the blackest treachery and the deepest sacrilege. Believing himself to possess—and Mr. Cecil thinks he did possess—the only knowledge and capacity to keep Europe and civilization from disintegration and chaos, he spent his entire active life fighting the revolutionary spirit wherever he found it. To satisfy his grand passion there was no piece of double-dealing, no political intrigue, no amount of subjugation and repression that he would not undertake.

For Mr. Cecil, all this comes under the head of "diplomacy," and to sustain Metternich in the hero's role he is not only prepared to undertake elaborate and eulogistic explanations, but allows himself to dismiss his enemies by classing them quite generally as the "beasts of the Revolution." Dozens of times, in fact, various revolutionary activities are referred to—without other consideration or investigation—as the work of such "beasts." To write 332 pages treating a period when millions of people realized for the first time—because of the example in France—that autocracy and starvation were, after all, not invariable laws of the universe, and to refer to these people only as "rabble," and to the social forces they generated only as a "plain menace," or the "spectral monster," is to write something that hardly deserves to be called a "study" of that period.

By far the most interesting part of Mr. Cecil's book is that dealing with the personality of Metternich. For in spite of his quite obvious limitations as a historian, Mr. Cecil as a recounter of political intrigue and court life is often vivid and penetrating. The chapters dealing with Metternich's amazing "diplomacy" are told in a tone of Machiavellian delight and with all the mastery of a connoisseur. Indeed, whenever Mr. Cecil allows himself to forget his self-imposed duty of expounding moral lessons and eternal truths, his characters become very lifelike and possible.

VICTOR JOHN KROETCH

Shorter Notices

Sometime. By Robert Herrick. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Utopias become increasingly easy to construct with the breakdown of the social system. By taking all the crank fads of today—nudism, vegetarianism, free love—Mr. Herrick has created the land of Sometime, a glorified playground of the human race, where mankind disports itself eternally in a world that closely resembles the unreal paradise of a modern experimental school. True, the Sometimers have subordinated the machine, abolished money, and regulated the growth of population; but too many of the ideals of American civilization persist in their society—speed, physical comfort, eternal youthfulness—a eupeptic, narcissistic society, a world that might have been created by the genius of modern advertising if all the street-car placards could be more than wish-fulfilment. The Utopia of Sometime is not a daring rearrangement of human concepts, such as Samuel Butler propounded in "Erewhon." A psychic sterility seems to oppress the inhabitants, and the perfection of their society is a state of tension constantly tending toward disruption. Possibly this is the trouble with all Utopias, whether communistic or fictional. At any rate, the total effect of reading about the Sometimers is to reconcile the reader to society as it exists today, and to make him hope that we may find amelioration but not perfection.

Gibbon. By G. M. Young. D. Appleton and Company. $1.50.

Gibbon was a rich man's son. He knew almost none of the extremes of life. His tepid and respectable love affair did not end in marriage but in the kind of quiet friendship in which successful marriages sometimes end. His pleasures were travel and study, and these he enjoyed without having to overcome any great obstacles. So serene was his life that the biographer of Gibbon is compelled to turn for narrative material to the events of the slow composition and publication of his masterpiece, "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Mr. Young uses a bright, allusive style that succeeds in sustaining the reader's interest. His book is one of the more successful volumes in the useful and competent series of Appleton biographies.

Try the Sky. By Francis Stuart. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This is the tale of a strange quartet who are brought together on a disabled motor boat on the Danube: Jose, a young Irishman with a flair for race horses who hopes to write a novel about the turf; his sweetheart, Carlotta, a lovely young Austrian whom suffering has filled with a Dostoevskian love of humanity; Buttercup, a half-breed Indian princess who is plotting to get Soviet assistance for an Indian uprising in the Canadian Northwest, a sort of Chthonian being who rather too obviously symbolizes the ruthless forces of nature; and her mysterious husband, Beltane. The novel glides pleasantly down the Danube on a tide of mystic symbolism which provokes the inevitable D. H. Lawrence tag so popular with blurb-writers this season. This is rather tactless, for the faint symbolism which gives the necessary romantic overtone to this Danube waltz is almost dispelled by such a potent invocation.

An Anthology of Haiku Ancient and Modern. Translated and annotated by Asataro Miyamori. Tokio: Maruzen Company, Ltd.

The Haiku is one of the peculiarly brief Japanese lyric forms. It is limited to three lines totaling seventeen syllables in all—less than our heroic couplets. As a consequence its characteristic is subtle condensation which depends upon suggestion and association. Naturally these are virtually untranslatable except at the points where the literary traditions of the two languages coincide, and the associations of one are matched in the other. Mr. Miyamori's scholarship is excellent, and his introduction and notes are informative. His translations, however, are dull, and only when the content has an indestructible imaginative quality, as in "The white bait [a small transparent fish] looks as if the soul of the water moves," have they any success. Mr. Miyamori, however, wherever there have been previous translations, includes the other versions, which add to the comprehensiveness and value of the work. In format the book is an exquisite example of Japanese book-making.

Memories of Lenin. Volume II. By N. K. Krupskaya. International Publishers. $1.50.

These intimate memories of Lenin, put on paper by his widow, seem strangely pathetic, even forlorn. Here was a determined revolutionist in exile, cut off from his native land, fighting against the defeatism and opportunism of his associates and followers. Lenin himself, though his principles were unshaken, was never quite certain of the future. Thus, Mme Krupskaya recalls a lecture he delivered in Zurich only a few weeks before the February revolution. "We of the older generation," Lenin said, "may not live to see the decisive battles of this coming revolution." But even as he spoke the collapse of the empire was at hand. The forces making for that collapse had been at work for some time. Desertions from the front had been heavy for more than two years. And on August 15, 1916, Minister of War Guchkov felt it necessary to warn General Alexeev that "in the rear disintegration is doing its full work, and the government is decaying at its foundation." Of course, Lenin could hardly have known of these developments. He was in exile in Switzerland and out of touch with Russian affairs. But if Lenin was taken unaware by the suddenness of the February upheaval, he was without question prepared to take advantage of that event. Through the nine years of his second exile, first in Geneva, then in Paris, Cracow, Berne, and Zurich, which Mme Krupskaya describes in this volume, he had fought consistently to preserve and develop the revolutionary content of the Socialist movement. He had fortified himself by constant study and debate. Others had yielded to opportunism, or had wanted to liquidate the Russian party because the fight seemed so hopeless. When the revolutionary opportunity came, Mme Krupskaya points out, Lenin alone of the radical leaders was prepared for revolutionary action.

Man Wants but Little. By Wilson Wright. A. and C. Boni. $2.

The title of this novel speaks for itself. José Perdriga, ■ young Spaniard, emigrates to Cuba at the height of the boom period. Swept into the hectic life of the island, with its background of local politics and revolution and American exploitation of mines and sugar, he reacts to it with all the deep stubbornness of a simple nature which asks but little here below. His needs are fundamental: a woman to love, a family to bring up, and some work on the soil to keep body and soul together. These things might seem easy of attainment, but Perdriga does not find them so. There is plenty of land, but it is not to be had for the asking. Other human beings break in on his peace. He is drawn into ■ complicated net of events. It is his misfortune to be a capable young man, a fact soon discovered by Wilson, the American superintendent, who proceeds to make use of him. Perdriga fights the golden opportunities offered him. "He sat simply facing the 'boss' who was doing so much for him, and wished to heaven something could be done to stop him." His wife's family, too, is ■ bit of ■ nuisance. Existence becomes for him an eternal combat with some dragon, which is perhaps human nature itself. Ultimately he attains ■ measure of the felicity he so ardently desires. Earth is a potential paradise, which can be gained only in snatches. The author is apparently intimately acquainted with Cuban life, which he presents in a series of kaleidoscopic views.

An International Series of Open Letters. International Institute of Intellectual Cooperation. Vol. II. Why War? By Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud. Boston: World Peace Foundation. $1.

The earlier volume in this series was devoted to ■ discussion of the wordily phrased but vital problem, "the means of insuring the representation of intellectual activity in the social, economic, and political life of today." The contributors were Professor Gilbert Murray, chairman of the League of Nations committee which has charge of the series, Salvador de Madariaga, Alfonso Reyes, Paul Valéry, and several others. In this volume Professor Albert Einstein, who is unqualifiedly opposed to war under any and all circumstances, and who has declared his conviction that any given nation could disarm at will with impunity and national profit, draws up the indictment against war with admirable clearness and simplicity (no writer in the world is clearer or simpler than the father of the bewildering theory of relativity), and inquires of the austere old psychoanalyst in Vienna how mankind got that way and whether he believes there is ■ way out. The instincts of hate and destruction, Freud replies, are probably as natural and necessary as those that conserve and unify. There seems to be a principle of polarity involved; at least "an instinct of either category can operate but rarely in isolation." War, which is an easy outlet for the destructive impulses, is thus difficult of eradication; but perhaps—Freud, for all his relentlessness, has always been something of a wistful idealist—perhaps a way can be found to turn the destructive impulses into less odious and evil channels. For Freud, at bottom, is as instinctively ■ pacifist as Einstein. And one feels behind the cautious objectivity of these two scientists the passionate earnestness of two generous souls.

Films

Summer Solstice

IT is not altogether true that the movies differ from the legitimate theater in being less affected by seasonal changes, and that one can see just as many worth-while films during the summer months as at any other time during the year. The current drift to breezy musical concoctions like "College Humor" and "Gold Diggers of 1933" would seem to indicate that exhibitors are taking no chances of letting anything interfere with the proper appreciation of their expensively installed air-cooling systems. In adjusting their programs to the temperature the movie palaces are of course merely following another old tradition of the legitimate stage, which until quite recently always refrained from more "serious" manifestations during the torrid season. In New York further evidence that the dog days are approaching is to be seen in the languishing state of the little cinema houses, most of which have either closed down or devoted themselves to revivals. The latter condition will not seem entirely calamitous as long as it makes it possible for us to see René Clair's "Le Million" (Little Carnegie) for the third or the fourth time, as the case may be. Another circumstance, traceable to the political rather than the climatic barometer, which is also affecting the little houses, is the active boycott being carried on by the German-Jewish audience in our larger cities against all German-made films. One of the good effects of this has been an encouragement of French pictures in this country; and since one could spare ■ great many German operettas for ■ film like "Poil de Carotte" (Europa) one may still be grateful to the Hitler regime.

The newest house to set itself up as the "international cinema" is the Vanderbilt, which has had the courage, in the face of the present difficulties, to bring Richard Tauber's very popular singing vehicle, "The Golden Goal," to the American public. A proper estimate of this would require the services of the music critic, who would be better able to pass judgment on the quality of Herr Tauber's tenor voice, his phrasing of Mozart and Schumann, and his rendition of large sections of "Martha." Certainly, to the amateur, it seems like one of the most thrilling voices so far recorded on the screen, with the richness and volume that one associates with the great tenors, and Herr Tauber's acting personality is distinctly agreeable. The story also is somewhat better calculated to supply a plausible background for vocal prowess than is common in pictures of this sort. We see Herr Tauber, first and last, in the choir of the little church in Bavaria from which he has been tempted away by ■ rich visitor from Berlin. The theme is the ultimate loneliness of the great artist, and because as a theme this is fairly unhackneyed for the screen, and because it is carried with the full weight of Tauber's undeniable talent behind it, the impact is quite strong in the final scenes. From any point of view "The Golden Goal" is worth seeing and hearing, but to the student or amateur of music it will of course have a very special interest.

Not having seen either of the stage plays on which the two Hollywood films viewed this week were based, the present reviewer is handicapped in making the usual comparisons, although it is hard to believe that either original included such remarkably bad acting as Ruth Chatterton imposes on her gullible admirers in "Lilly Turner" (Rivoli). So versatile has Miss Chatterton become that she can now change her style of acting with every scene—and with the most startling effects. One is uncertain throughout whether her accent is going to emerge as lowbrow (Brooklyn), or highbrow (Mayfair-cum-Hollywood), or plain unadulterated Hollywood. The truth is that Miss Chatterton is much too great a lady ever to have undertaken such a sordid role; the nautch dance in particular was a great mistake. Except for an excellent portrayal by a German actor of a circus strong man in an advanced stage of paranoia, the picture as a whole is devoid of point or distinction. "When Ladies Meet" (Capitol) is all too plainly a faithful photographing of Rachel Crothers's popular comedy. As a motion picture it has too little motion and too little variety of background to be acceptable, and while its lines are witty in a genteel sort of way they are probably not so witty as they seemed on the stage. Its chief interest for those who have seen the play will consist in the presence of Miss Alice Brady in the cast. Of Miss Brady's powers as a comedienne one is left with the impression that she is trying just a little too strenuously to make us forget that she once played Mr. O'Neill's Electra. It is almost eerie to observe this sophisticated daughter of the footlights eyeing the camera when she makes her "points" as if it were an Empire or Guild audience. Her performance, however, is a vigorous one, in the best theatrical sense, and since a little vigor is what Miss Crothers's conceptions are most in need of, it helps things considerably. It is good to report also that Robert Montgomery, as the pushy young journalist who saves the heroine's virtue, has improved his acting enormously since the days when he served as one of Miss Garbo's wooden Indians. In fact, the acting in "When Ladies Meet" is more satisfying than anything else—which means, of course, that it is not the sort of screen play one is likely to remember.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

AMOS PINCHOT is a New York lawyer and publicist.

O. S. DEAN is a Sioux City business man who has long been interested in municipal ownership.

MAXWELL S. STEWART, author of "The Inter-Allied Debt: An Analysis," is an economist on the staff of the Foreign Policy Association.

HILTON BUTLER is a political writer for the Memphis Commercial-Appeal.

R. S. WHEELER is a pseudonym for a trustworthy correspondent long known to The Nation, who requested that his name be withheld "as I have no desire to get first-hand experience in any German prison."

NEWTON ARVIN is professor of English at Smith College.

MARK VAN DOREN is the editor of "An Autobiography of America."

PAUL H. DOUGLAS is professor of industrial relations at the University of Chicago.

ERNEST BOYD is an editor of the American Spectator.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is professor of English literature in Loyola University and one of the editors of Poetry.

FILMS

FILMS

2nd BIG WEEK—America's Premiere of Soviet's Great Masterpiece

"26 COMMISSARS"

"Class History on Parade. Ranks with our great films."—PUDOVKIN.

"A Beethoven Symphony."—DOVZHENKO. (English Titles.)

Added Feature MAY DAY CELEBRATION IN MOSCOW

ACME THEATRE 14th ST. and UNION SQ.

Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

FOR SUMMER

FOR RENT

GREENWOOD LAKE, N. Y., Gross Farm, 8 rooms, all improvements, private swimming pool, lake privilege, fishing, tennis. Very moderate rental. Tel. Greenwood Lake 81.

APRIL FARMS COOPERSBURG, PA. 165 acres, fields, woods, orchards, streams. Modern house, electricity, running water—bungalows. Total 9 families—do your own cooking. 50 miles from Philadelphia; 100 miles from N. Y. $50.00 for the summer season.

APARTMENT TO RENT

QUAINTLY furnished large studio apartment in Long Island, with terrace, in restful Oak grove near seashore. Private entrance. Bath. Kitchenette. $60. Thirty minutes from New York. Box 196, c/o The Nation.

SUBLET APARTMENTS

231 EAST 48th ST. Cool, attractively furnished seven room apartment overlooking Turtle Bay Gardens. Three master bedrooms, piano, books. Electric refrigeration. Low rental for Summer. Tel. daytime CORTlandt 7-3330.

LANGUAGES

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Ave. HARlem 7-8446.

Learn languages at home by World's Easiest, Quickest Method. Free Demonstration. LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE, 10 E. 43 St., N. Y.

TUTOR WANTED

SCHOOL TEACHER, male, or young couple to help two boys in study, in exchange for room in Sea Gate. Permanent. Call or write, M. Wachs, 35 Bleecker St. Tel. Spring 7-1490.

A Reminder

Our readers are looking for places to go for their vacations.

If you want to tell them about your hotel, camp, boarding house, or whatever you have that might interest them, use these classified pages.

1/2-inch (30 words) minimum $3.08
Additional lines of 6 words, each .62

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City

OPEN SHELF

TUGWELL

INDUSTRIAL DISCIPLINE

$2.50. Best-seller. 3rd printing and also

INDUSTRY'S COMING OF AGE

$2.00. All bookstores. Columbia

Rational Living Library, by a well-known Revolutionary Doctor and Health Teacher.—Ready: No. 1, HOW'S YOUR STOMACH? (Food, Indigestion, Constipation); No. 2, SEX AND HEALTH (The Sexual Revolution, Anatomy, Physiology, Menstruation); No. 3, SEX LIFE AND MARRIAGE (Sex Life, Married Life, Pregnancy, Childbirth).—20 cents each (no stamps). Address: Rational Living, Box 4, Station M, New York.

PERSONAL

CHEZ MOI

Poster Portraits for $25.00
315 West 86th Street
Telephone Afternoons Schuyler 4-4598

ARE YOU RESISTING SOCIETY'S darndest effort to moronize you? CONTACTS, only correspondence club for the intellectually independent, connects you with hundreds of unconventional, original thinkers everywhere, who scornfully reject most of the accumulated bunk of the ages parading as "civilization." Membership steadily increasing since 1927. Rare books loaned. Send 3c stamp to CONTACTS, 211 East 11th St., New York City.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:

We can now take your classified ads Monday up to noon, for appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands Thursday.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 19, 1933

No. 3550

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	57
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Roosevelt Repudiates Himself	60
Uncle Sam's Jobless	61
The Sinners of 1929	61
Celluloid Czar	62
CARTOON. By Gyula Zilzer	63
IF THE SUPREME COURT OBJECTS. By Paul Y. Anderson	64
WHY CONFERENCES FAIL. By Harold J. Laski	65
CARTOON. By Low	66
WALTER LIPPMANN. III. OBFUSCATOR DE LUNE. By	67
Amos Pinchot	67
LA GUARDIA FOR MAYOR OF NEW YORK. By Arthur Garfield	71
Hays	71
THE INTELLECTUALS OF THE WORLD AND HITLER. By	72
Karl Langer	72
THE COMIC WISDOM OF S. N. BEHRMAN. By Joseph Wood	74
Krutch	74
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	76
CORRESPONDENCE	76
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	77
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Sir Arthur Plans Planning. By Henry Hazlitt	78
Eamonn de Valera. By William MacDonald	78
Pearl Buck's Mission. By Younghill Kang	79
These Here States. By H. L. Mencken	79
Beyond Shakespeare. By Mark Van Doren	80
For Unsophisticated Unbelievers. By Haakon M. Chevalier	80
Science and Reality. By William Gruen	81
The Mountain of Debt. By Harry W. Laidler	81
Shorter Notices	82
Films: The Eisenstein Muddle. By William Troy	83

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

NERVOUSNESS IS DEVELOPING among the administrators of the Roosevelt recovery program. The larger industries have not been coming forward with their "codes of fair competition" as quickly as was hoped. Some industries are suspected of organizing without benefit of the National Recovery Administration, of getting together for the purpose of fixing prices and dividing markets upon their own initiative. Other industries have intimated that they will challenge the constitutionality of the recovery and farm-relief acts in the courts. Others are merely stalling in the hope that natural processes of recovery will presently render codes and other measures of control obsolete and unnecessary. The farmers, too, have been slow in cooperating. This is especially true of the cotton producers. With prices rising, the farmers have not been eager to agree to curtail their production next year. Many feel that they may have more to gain by selling their crops on the open market than by reducing their output and accepting a government subsidy for the difference. Crop-reduction agreements among the cotton growers have been discouragingly few and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has stopped publishing figures concerning them, at least for the time. Persons close to the Roosevelt Administration are beginning to worry; for the first time they realize the immensity of their task.

THE ADMINISTRATORS of the program have, therefore, dropped their soft-spoken language of a few weeks ago and are now talking in terms of positive, summary action. Hugh S. Johnson warned industry that it must come to terms with the government at once in order to prevent "a new collapse." Donald Richberg, general counsel for the National Recovery Administration, told the Merchants' Association of New York in a blunt and impressive address that "industrial leadership" was being given "one more chance—perhaps the last—to justify its authority." The "challenge" of the Roosevelt program, he declared, "must be met in the next sixty days." Attorney-General Cummings promised in words hardly less vigorous to bring the full force of the anti-trust laws to bear against the trade and industrial groups that are attempting to fix and enforce their own restrictive agreements. At the same time conferences have been held at the White House to determine how the recovery and farm-relief laws may best be defended against probable attacks in the courts. What disturbs Administration officials in this respect is the knowledge that there are four old men on the Supreme Court bench who always side with the financial and industrial monopolists and two or three others who usually vote as the interests of big business seem to require.

WHILE there are many reasons for the anxiety privately expressed in Washington, the most urgent has to do with the boom in commodities and securities. This may appear paradoxical, but the fact remains that the price rise has embarrassed the Administration by lessening the enthusiasm of industry and the farmers for government regulation. As Ernest K. Lindley remarks in the New York Herald Tribune: "Industries which were in the red two months ago are now in the black and are envisioning even greater profits in the near future with the help of low depression wage-scales in their own particular industries." Moreover, the boom has been largely one-sided. The June report of the Department of Commerce shows a marked increase in business activity, but it also shows that "employment and pay-roll gains have lagged considerably behind the increase in production." In May employment and pay-roll indexes were still "below the low level of a year ago," and average hourly factory earnings "also were at a new low point." The report warned that "available indexes of consumer purchasing indicate for the most part that goods are not moving into consumption as fast as they are being produced." The Administration considers this the crux of the problem. If the production and price curves go up faster than the purchasing-power curve, it is felt that the disparity between the two will soon lead to another crash. This is what Johnson, Richberg, and other officials had in mind when they warned business men of the drastic consequences the failure of the Roosevelt program probably would have.

There can be no question that if the recovery scheme fails, for lack of cooperation or for any other reason, the reaction upon business in general will be swift and severe.

THE appointment of Secretary Ickes as permanent Public Works Administrator to succeed Colonel Sawyer is an encouraging move. It indicates that the government's public-works program is likely to be carried out for the purposes originally intended—to put unemployed men to work—and that it will not be perverted into a vast party grab-bag. Disturbing reports had been trickling out of Washington that the multitudes of jobs and contracts to be handed out as soon as the program gets under way were being confidently awaited by hungry Democrats. One of Ickes's primary acts should be to see to it that all local and State or regional administrators are held rigidly accountable in the distribution of benefits. Another duty will be to secure for discharged federal employees a first go at suitable positions created under the program. The chances for graft in the administration of a measure involving the expenditure of $3,300,000,000 are so numerous and monumental that only the ablest, most honest, and most courageous executive could possibly prevent them. Secretary Ickes comes as close to these specifications as any person in the Cabinet. Our one doubt about his fitness for this task is based upon his reputed conservatism in regard to the expenditure of the money. While it is proper to proceed with a wary eye to speculators and grafters, it is equally necessary to cover as much ground as possible with great rapidity. Already prices are rising. Already production is increasing. If these developments are not to end in a shattering collapse—like that of a comber rolling up a beach—they must be paralleled by an equally marked increase in purchasing power. Secretary Ickes has apparently sided hitherto with the Treasury's watch-dog, Lewis W. Douglas, in opposition to Tugwell and certain other members of the Cabinet who advocate a generous outlay on approved projects. If assistance through government expenditure is justified at all, it should be applied in large doses with all possible speed.

BREAD IS GOING UP in price. There should be no surprise at this. It is a natural result of the recent increase in the price of wheat and of the processing tax of thirty cents a bushel, effective on July 9, on such of the grain as is milled into flour, with the purpose of creating a fund with which to pay farmers to restrict acreage and so keep prices up. There are, to be sure, grave doubts about the success of this restriction plan, as well as in regard to the entire effort toward price inflation, but the Roosevelt Administration has based its hopes squarely on that policy, and nobody who is supporting the program ought to object to its obvious consequences. At the same time, this is a moment for bakers to go slow and watch for the sign "Sharp curve ahead." Secretary of Agriculture Wallace reminds the bakers with point that when the price of wheat was falling, and they were asked to reduce their charges for bread, they countered by declaring that the amount they paid for grain was only a small item of their total expense. Secretary Wallace estimates that increases in the price of bread should not exceed $1\frac{1}{3}$ cents on a pound loaf and threatens to put profiteering bakers out of business by a licensing system if necessary. A crucial struggle impends here, and the future of the whole Roosevelt program may well hinge on how far Mr. Wallace lives up to his promises. The public can't have its cake and eat it too, says a spokesman for the bakers. True, but if the bakers are greedy, they may find themselves baking their bread and keeping it too.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S proposal for a managed currency that would secure a fixed price level for at least a generation is an ideal most desirable of realization, but we must recognize that the difficulties in the way of its attainment are enormous, and that the present American delegation and the present world conference are clearly not the instruments to achieve it. What is immediately possible, however, as well as desperately necessary, is the fixing of definite figures for devaluation of at least the dollar and the pound and of a definite date for returning to gold at those figures. There is no magic in mere depreciation, mere uncertainty, and daily fluctuations in the currency's value, as the record so far of Great Britain and Japan ought to show. We have formally been off the gold basis for not quite three months. Great Britain, also, following her abandonment of gold in September, 1931, had a three months' period of rising markets and commodity prices, but then, as uncertainty continued, the long sagging movement was resumed. As this is written the dollar in the foreign exchange market is at a discount from the old gold parity of fully 30 per cent. This is about as far as the depreciation should be allowed to go. It seems quite sufficient, when adjustments have been made to it, to restore a workable relation between costs and prices. Any further depreciation will probably be at the ultimate expense of the American retail consumer and American labor. The depreciation must be halted before any further harm is done. There is only one certain way to halt it, and that is by a return to gold at the present dollar level.

THE MORE ENLIGHTENED SPIRIT animating the Department of Labor under its new Secretary, Frances Perkins, is evident in an order just issued permitting foreign students in the United States to work their way through school or college. The new ruling revokes one formerly promulgated by the obtuse Secretary Doak of Mr. Hoover's regime, which prohibited students from working for their maintenance while getting an education in this country. Mr. Doak on September 1, 1932, sent a notice to all college registrars, saying that the privilege of employment, even on part time, was withdrawn from alien students. The American Civil Liberties Union offered its services to test the regulation in court, but the Department of Labor avoided the issue by exempting from the order several students who were selected for the legal issue. In December of last year Mr. Doak's order was somewhat relaxed, in the face of wide protest, so as to permit students already in the United States to continue to work for room and board but not for money. The present superseding order of Commissioner General of Immigration MacCormack says:

A student who has some means, but not sufficient income to cover necessary expenses, will be permitted to accept sufficient employment to meet necessary expenses. A student having no means will be permitted to work to earn sufficient funds to meet necessary expenses. In no case will a student be permitted to accept employment of a nature to interfere with his full course of studies.

WHILE the New York utilities continue to oppose rate reduction on the ground that they cannot afford it, testimony before the Public Service Commission has disclosed more high salaries markedly increased during the depression. The New York Edison's chief executives received emoluments totaling $193,500 in 1927 and $230,800 in 1932, a rise of 19.31 per cent. The Bronx Gas and Electric administrators' salaries in the same period rose 17.1 per cent. For 1933 they will be still higher! The Brooklyn Edison was a little foxier. That company put into effect an apparent salary cut. But it promoted every official so that actually each one received more than before and the administrative increases for the first four months of 1933 are $6,250 above last year. In addition, "consolidation" in New York Edison departments resulted in an increased expense of $20,358 for the same four months! All of which, with other cumulative evidence, proves that the public is faced with a group of unconscionable highbinders who are making a mockery of the whole "public utility" principle. If the Public Service Commission does not wish to strengthen the long-growing belief that it is wholly complacent in the face of this legalized racketeering, it will immediately order those salaries reduced to levels consonant with the decreased cost of living and make its mandate evasion-proof. And the benefit of these, and other equally necessary and obvious economies, should be passed on at once to the public in the form of substantially reduced rates.

ROY W. HOWARD, on the front pages of the Scripps-Howard newspapers which he dominates, urges editorially that the situation in the Far East requires that the United States should immediately commence building its navy up to its treaty quota, "and beyond, if the world wants to remove the limit." His views are important in so far as they tend to shape the editorial policies of twenty-six dailies which have earned the right to be considered among the more enlightened forces in American journalism. Mr. Howard's argument is that a "decade of American effort and progress toward outlawing war has ended in failure—temporarily at least"; that "America's efforts to substitute reason for force in international agreements" are "premature"; that "in Manchukuo Japan has created another Alsace-Lorraine from which she will never be ousted except by force of arms"; that "the Japanese public has been convinced that America is too penurious to fight," and "in that misconception lies real danger." So because Japan exhibits her conviction that might makes right and has made scraps of paper of her treaty obligations, the United States should now arm to the teeth. Are American marines to recapture the Asiatic Alsace-Lorraine for the Chinese? That would seem to follow from Mr. Howard's logic. On the other hand, he declares that "there has never been less cause for disagreement between Japan and America than exists today. . . . Never have the suicidal certainties of conflict been so apparent. But logic and reason do not prevent wars." Well, in The Nation's view, there could be no surer way of bringing about war with Japan than Mr. Howard's proposed policy. True, Japan at present wants to increase its treaty quota from 10-10-7 to 10-10-9 for the maintenance and probable extension of her brutal military conquest on the Asiatic mainland. The Nation, along with Mr. Howard and, we believe, with intelligent people the world over, deplores that policy. But does it follow that we should abandon those principles which Japan has violated and be prepared for war with Japan? Competitive armaments have invariably led to conflict. If the Japanese believe we do not want to fight, we should be highly content with that view and not attempt to prove that they are mistaken.

ON SUNDAY, JULY 9, the Associated Press, a wireless dispatch to the New York Times, and a dispatch from the Jewish Telegraph Agency, all from Berlin, reported that eighty Jewish physicians, many prominent in the profession, and including the internationally known Dr. Felix Theilhaber, had been arrested in their homes and sent to a concentration camp. These arrests were carried out with such speed and precision that no opportunity was given to arrange for substitutes to attend the doctors' patients. The charge was that these doctors had used their consultation offices for the gathering of atrocity propaganda! On the following day, in the New York Times, Anne O'Hare McCormick describes Chancellor Hitler's blue eyes, "curiously childlike and candid," his voice "as quiet as his black tie," his frequent smiles, and declares that when he talks he is "indubitably sincere." Among the statements that Herr Hitler made to this interviewer was that the discrimination was not primarily against the Jews, as such, but "against the Communists and all elements that demoralized and destroyed us." He also declared that he wished the Jews would leave Germany and that he would be "only too glad if the nations which take such an enormous interest in Jews would open up their gates to them." If Herr Hitler is so "indubitably sincere," one simple way of obtaining his wish would be to allow Jews to leave and take with them their portable property and their savings to enable them to start abroad other than as paupers. To date, the Hitler policy has been to confiscate all but 200 marks from those who flee the country to escape Nazi persecution.

ONE MAN and one nation, at least, have got something out of the London Economic Conference. While the delegates of the capitalist countries have moved faint-heartedly to save international capitalism, and worked much more aggressively to conserve economic nationalism, Maxim Litvinov, the peripatetic envoy of Russia, has buzzed about busy as the copybook bee, gathering honey from every opening flower. He is the Boy Who Made Good of the conference. While other delegates have done nothing so far to entitle them to anything but a Bronx cheer, Litvinov brings home the bacon in such substantial slices as to merit at least an accolade from the stern Stalin. With Great Britain Litvinov made a dicker whereby the vexatious embargo on Russian imports was removed in return for the release of the two convicted British engineers whom Russia probably had tired of boarding anyhow. Then, while others were asking whether American dollars in the future were to be of gold or cornmeal mush, Litvinov took a chance and borrowed 4,000,000 of them—nearly always a safe risk—with which to buy American cotton. Meanwhile, just to keep himself fit, he negotiated non-aggression treaties with a string of border states from Afghanistan to Esthonia and found a few minutes to run down to Paris and improve trade relations with France. Who says international conferences are a failure? Not Litvinov or Russia.

Mr. Roosevelt Repudiates Himself

AS these lines are written, the World Economic Conference has still not adjourned. For the sake of appearances the statesmen of the world have decided to move its arms and jaw so that passers-by who do not see very well will get the impression that it is still alive. But everyone with sound eyesight knows not only that it is a corpse but who killed it. The fatal shot was fired by Mr. Roosevelt on the morning of July 3. The assassin remarked tautologically that it would be "a catastrophe amounting to a world tragedy" if his bullet were to have the only effect it could possibly have.

Like every man in a position of great power, the President has found a thousand apologists for and rationalizers of his course, but the blunt truth is that from the beginning his record in connection with the World Economic Conference has been indefensible. He began by sending over a delegation that with the exception of one or two members was third-rate. This delegation, so far as can be learned, went to London with no clear instructions and no positive program of any kind. It was not only divided internally, but it made no attempt to conceal its division. Senator Pittman repudiated the program of Secretary Hull. When the delegation seemed on the verge of a minor agreement, that agreement was promptly repudiated by the President, who apparently informed reporters that such decisions would be made "in Washington," not by the delegation that had been sent over to make them! Then came the announcement that the great Mr. Moley himself was taking ship for London, and the statesmen at the conference were naive enough to suppose that the President was at last sending a representative who would represent him, a spokesman really authorized to speak. But the first innocuous agreement that Mr. Moley reached was repudiated just as promptly, curtly, and publicly as all the previous decisions reached by the delegation.

The climax was reached in the President's astounding statement of July 3. That naive document read as if Mr. Roosevelt had just seen "Gabriel Over the White House" or had been browsing through some gay magazine article called "If I Were World Dictator." The statement was badly written; its economics were amateurish and muddled; it was possible to surmise from it only vaguely what was in the President's mind; and in tone it was not only belligerent toward the conference but frankly contemptuous of those participating in it. Grave as these faults were, there was one aspect of the statement that was even more disturbing. This was the indication it gave of the emotional and intellectual instability of the President. He had repudiated again and again all the official delegates he had appointed; now he was repudiating himself and all his solemn and public pre-conference agreements. From the series of meetings with MacDonald, Herriot, Bennett, Jung, there had emerged a series of joint statements. It is necessary to quote from only two of these. In the statement that Mr. Roosevelt issued jointly with Prime Minister Bennett of Canada on April 29 he remarked: "Economic and monetary policies must be adjusted to permit a freer international exchange of commodities. . . . No one of these problems can be profitably dealt with in isolation from the others nor can a single country accomplish a satisfactory solution." The statement issued jointly with Signor Jung on May 6 was even more explicit. "If normal life is to be resumed," the President then said, "the World Economic Conference must be made a success. It must not only meet soon, but come to its conclusions quickly. . . . We are in agreement that a fixed measure of exchange values must be reestablished in the world and we believe that this measure must be gold." Finally, on May 16, the President declared definitely that "the conference must establish order in place of the present chaos by a stabilization of currencies." After this, what must those at the conference have thought when they found themselves out of a blue sky suddenly denounced by the President for allowing themselves to be "diverted" to the stabilization of currencies?

The excuse has been offered for the President that the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the continued advance in the stock and commodity markets, and the revival in industrial activity changed the situation at home, and so made necessary a change in monetary and tariff policies from those contemplated in May. This excuse must encounter the fact that the President knew all about the recovery act in May, and that the revival was also under way at that time. Why could he not have postponed the conference before it abortively met? And if it was really the change in the domestic situation that caused the President to change his mind, why did he not say so publicly and frankly? In any case it would have been much more fitting for him to apologize to the conference for changing his mind and for rejecting his pre-conference declarations than to denounce the conference for trying to carry them out.

What must give hardly less concern than these sudden and unpredictable shifts by Mr. Roosevelt is the growing strength in Washington of the notion that international cooperation conflicts with our "domestic" recovery program. The exact opposite is the truth: unless we promptly participate in policies of international cooperation our so-called "domestic" program must fail. Are not our export industries domestic industries? Are not our cotton, wheat, automobiles, and farm machinery domestic products? Do not the industries engaged in producing them give employment to American labor just as our non-export industries do? Does not the prosperity of our non-export industries depend in large part on the purchasing power of labor in our export industries? Is it a mere coincidence that in the last three and a half years domestic conditions have become constantly worse as the volume of our foreign trade has shrunk? In so far as a conflict exists between international cooperation and our so-called domestic program it is the domestic program that is unsound. Instead, for example, of permitting sufficient imports to pay for exports, and so permitting the expansion of the market for American cotton, the government is now attempting to get American cotton growers to destroy one-fourth of their crop. We have yet to learn that international cooperation is one of the chief ways of promoting American recovery. Certainly one of the least promising is by the destruction of wealth.

Uncle Sam's Jobless

AS various federal departments put into effect their programs for the discharge of employees in order to keep within their reduced appropriations, it becomes clearer that the result of the policy is a disruption of the civil service—to the extent of the discharges—and a creation in its place of a spoilsmanship personnel. That is, the Administration is turning out into the streets regular employees in the classified service as a measure of so-called economy while at the same time it is building up in the new emergency organizations a structure for the accommodation of a horde of new workers not subject to civil-service requirements and probably to be appointed for political reasons.

We do not believe that in its origin the economy legislation was a plot to bring this to pass. It was muddle-headed devotion to the fetish of a "balanced budget." But that the consequences as we describe them is strikingly revealed by a statement of Secretary Roper reported in the New York Times of July 6. Mr. Roper said in connection with the discharge of 1,891 employees from the Department of Commerce that he was effecting a saving of $7,000,000 for the next fiscal year. At the same time he stated that as a member of the Board of Public Works he would recommend that $10,000,000 from the national-industrial-recovery-act fund for public construction be allocated to his department, which would make possible the reemployment of some 1,500 workers. Secretary Roper did not say—what is the fact—that the 1,500 persons will fill new non-civil-service jobs and may be former employees or may be clamoring individuals from the pap-hungry and persistent horde of Postmaster-General Farley's "deserving Democrats."

As the stupidity of the government's program of discharging its own employees in order to finance "unemployment relief" grows clearer to the public, there has been an inevitable protest against it, and department heads in Washington are trying to retrieve the blunder in various ways. Some are putting into effect extensive furloughs for all instead of discharges for some, which is the best way out of a bad business. Also some effort is being made to place discharged workers in the new emergency services, but the initiative seems to be placed upon the individual, and the Federated Press reports that political credentials have been asked of some of the applicants. The only fair and tolerable course is that the government itself shall arrange the transfers, that it shall do it as a matter of right, not of political favor, and that employees discharged for economy shall have the first claim on work in the new services. Let unemployment relief begin at home!

President Roosevelt is busy with many pressing problems, but he and his friends cannot afford to ignore the original blunder of starving the government departments so as to necessitate a wholesale discharge of workers, nor the further scandal, now imminent, of replacing these men and women with an army of political henchmen most of whom will not come from the ranks of the unemployed but from less attractive to more desirable jobs. The entire relief program will be discredited if the Administration begins by turning its own workers into the streets and destroying the non-political civil service to make jobs for spoilsmen.

The Sinners of 1929

WHEN Otto H. Kahn, with the complacent air of a gay old dog reviewing the reckless days of his youth, described to the Senate Banking and Currency Committee the "simply inexplicable" financial practices brought about by the "spirit of 1929," his words must have brought tears of nostalgia to the eyes of the 156,000 holders of Pennroad Corporation stock. For those security holders who invested some 140 millions of dollars on the expert financial advice of Mr. Kahn's Kuhn, Loeb, and Company saw that investment shrink to little more than $10,000,000; it is now basking in a partial recovery to about $50,000,000. In the light of the experience of investors in other new-era creations, such as were sponsored by Kreuger, Insull, Eaton, et al, the Pennroad stockholders might easily consider themselves fortunate to have recovered one-third of their original investment—if they held on.

But the very fact that this enterprise was carried out without the complete collapse of values that took place in the more spectacular examples of financial exploitation permits us to fix our attention on its intrinsic worthlessness. The picture reveals vividly the complete lack of social consciousness that characterizes big business in its dealings with the public. Here is the Pennsylvania, one of the most powerful and wide-flung railway systems in the country. Here is its distinguished banking counsel, seeking to appear to its clients in the disinterested professional role of "Dr. Kuhn, Loeb, and Company." Here is the public, craving new securities to buy, and particularly securities issued under the aegis of such eminently respectable pillars of capitalist society. What could be more natural than to oblige the public with a brand new company, not even a subsidiary of the Pennsylvania, with its stock conveniently bound over for ten years to voting trustees, giving the Pennsylvania new millions to play with without interference from the Interstate Commerce Commission? The distinguished banking counsel is consulted. Its advice, in effect, is to avoid the pitfalls of funded debt or even of preferred stocks and, since the public is in such a ripe buying mood, to sell the new issue direct to the Pennsylvania Railroad's stockholders, thereby eliminating also the expense of underwriting. For these words of wisdom the bankers are rewarded with stock options from which they glean profits of $2,700,000 or not quite half of their total return from the deal. The public makes an initial contribution of $87,000,000. A few months later it adds another $50,000,000.

What was the real justification for the Pennsylvania's enticing these enormous sums from its stockholders? The best answer Mr. Kahn could think of was as follows:

They felt very strongly that, at that time, when everybody thought that whatever he bought was going to be worth more tomorrow and was certainly worth buying, they should not permit invading forces to come in and buy up properties they believed to be of strategic need for the purpose of serving their great system.

In other words, the Van Sweringen brothers, operating with other people's money supplied by the Alleghany Corporation, should not be allowed to buy properties if the Pennsylvania could get enough funds from the public to bid a higher price.

So the Pennsylvania girded up its loins and entered the lists—with its stockholders' millions. It relieved Henry Ford of the Detroit, Toledo, and Ironton Railroad for $36,600,000, nineteen times the road's average earnings in the four years ended with 1929. It bought terminal properties in Baltimore for $13,400,000. Best of all, it persuaded Frank E. Taplin to part with 223,000 shares or 74 per cent of the total stock of the Pittsburgh and West Virginia Railway for $170 a share. This cost a total of $37,900,000 or $4,300,000 more than the peak price for the stock in the open market during 1929. Other investments were made in miscellaneous railroad securities for roughly $50,000,000 at the choicest 1929 prices, investments which by the end of 1932 had shrunk to one-tenth of their purchase price.

When it was all over, Pennroad had made investments of more than $140,000,000. As those securities gave a peak return to Pennroad, before dividend reductions got under way, of something over $4,000,000 a year, the company was capitalized at about thirty-three times its boom-time income. In the four years of its existence, Pennroad has paid its stockholders a total of $5,400,000 or an average yearly return of nine-tenths of 1 per cent.

Who are the real beneficiaries of these gigantic transactions, aside from those fortunate individuals who were able to unload their stocks on Pennroad at fancy prices? "Dr. Kuhn, Loeb, and Company," of course. It was probably also pleasing to the vanity of General Atterbury of the Pennsylvania to be able to pay a higher price for the Pittsburgh and West Virginia than the Van Sweringens, or the New York Central, or the Baltimore and Ohio could muster. But let Mr. Kahn himself deliver the final alibi for Pennroad, even though his words were not intended to embrace the entire unpleasant picture: "We were all sinners in 1929."

Celluloid Czar

WHEN Will H. Hays, the great fixer, heard of the New Yorker's plan to include him in its series of "Profiles" he was, so it is said, so alarmed that he made tentative efforts to "fix" that also. No one who has read the two-part account of his various activities which has now appeared from the pen of Alva Johnston will be inclined to wonder, for it would be hard to find a more devastating analysis of a big-little man than this biography of one who found politics too real for him but came into his own when he was made the official windbag of a peculiarly windy industry.

Mr. Hays told an investigating committee three different stories concerning the $265,000 worth of Liberty bonds which passed through his hands on their way from "Teapot Dome" Sinclair into the coffers of the Republican Party. Three years ago his organization was caught red-handed in the act of paying considerable sums to "moral leaders" who had been intrusted by various groups with the job of making an impartial investigation of the films. But on the other hand his love life is beyond reproach, and as long as his mind remains as free as it has always been from evil thoughts, no one will suppose that a certain amiable obtuseness concerning the distinction between generosity and bribery unfits him for the job of keeping the movies pure, or, as Mr. Johnston more realistically puts it, exercising his "infallible judgment in fixing the border line between what the public will tolerate and what the public will not tolerate."

Mr. Hays's unction as a politician did not win him the Presidency to which he at one time aspired. It won him merely the Postmaster-Generalship. But when, in 1922, the movies called him with the strong voice of $100,000 a year, he discovered (in his own words) his capacity to see the pictures "not only from the viewpoint of the men who have millions of dollars invested in them but from the viewpoint of the fathers and mothers who have millions of children invested in them." "We must," he added, "have toward that sacred thing, the mind of a child, toward that clean and virgin thing, that unmarked slate—we must have toward that the same responsibility, the same care about the impression made upon it, that the best teacher or the best clergyman, the most inspired teacher of youth, would have."

Just what Mr. Hays thinks appropriate to "that virgin thing," the mind of a child, may be deduced from the titles and descriptions of the films put out by the companies under his absolute control, but the industry is satisfied. No State or federal censorship bill has been passed since he assumed the job of czar, and he has succeeded in pacifying each angry moralist as he arose by a fitting speech and the promulgation of a new "code" guaranteed to make the films henceforth as sweet as a baby's breath. One rule is that respect must always be shown to constituted authority; therefore, in theory, Nero and Simon Legree would have to be heroes. Another rule is that "adultery must not be presented attractively"; therefore, in theory, Paolo and Francesca, Tristan and Isolde, and Abélard and Héloise are out. Fortunately, however, there seems to be no rule against the good old formula which calls for eight reels of transgression followed by 300 feet of retribution, and so all is well.

Indeed, the only point at which we should like to take issue with Mr. Johnston's admirable analysis occurs when he concludes a summary of the attacks made upon his hero by moralists and aestheticians alike with the remark: "Both sides cannot be right about Hays. No man is versatile enough to undermine the morals of a nation by his licentiousness while stupefying its intellect with his prudery." But the truth of the matter is that he has actually succeeded in doing this apparently impossible thing and that he has kept his job so long only because he has known how to do it. Whatever is straight, frank, honest, and truth-telling he has kept out. Whatever "the innocent child mind" might profitably learn about the devious ways of the world and the equally devious ways of the heart is eliminated from the stories to which he gives his approval. But whatever can be smeared over with the varnish of sentiment, whatever can be suggested by clothes that do not quite come off, and beds that are never quite got into, is immediately classified as ideal movie material. The movie-goer is kept in a constant state of titillation by promises never entirely fulfilled and suggestions just definite enough to be grasped by the least mature intellect. The result is that Mr. Hays can call the films moral while they remain, nevertheless, the most completely sex-soaked form of popular amusement ever provided to any society.

"New York Halts Relief for 1,000,000 for Lack of Funds"

Drawing by Gyula Zilzer

If the Supreme Court Objects

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 8

THE most important Washington news of the week comes, as it often does, from New York. I allude to the address of Donald R. Richberg, chief counsel for the National Recovery Administration, defining the purposes and policies of that body. Since so many of the daily papers fumbled the story it may be desirable to sketch some of the more salient points. Richberg, with the official approval of Administrator Hugh S. Johnson, told American industry it probably was facing its last chance to demonstrate its capacity to govern itself successfully. He said that success or failure would come in sixty days, and that the outcome would determine whether the future managers of industry will be chosen by stockholders or the public. He said that slackers could expect no mercy. It has been a long time since Babbittania listened to such strong language from such an authoritative source, and I should like to have seen the collective face of the Merchants' Association of New York as it gave ear to the speaker's beautifully ironic allusion to

... the agony of the hard-headed manager who has stood on his head successfully all his life, viewing the supreme achievement of a business enterprise as a reduction in the pay roll coupled with an increased output; who has not felt the slightest responsibility for maintaining mass purchasing power; and who is now suddenly asked to stand on his feet, and, when no longer looking at the world upside down, to observe that employees are really customers, and that the supreme achievement of a business enterprise may be to pay out as much money as possible in wages without producing more goods than the market will absorb.

What I mean, of course, is that I should have enjoyed seeing the faces of those who understood what the speaker was saying. It is reliably reported that he managed not to smile when he told them that their cooperation would be wholly voluntary. That was quite a feat, but it was hardly a nice way to treat a good, simple, and expressive world like "voluntary." The cotton textile people learned how "voluntary" their part was to be when the heavy-handed General Johnson got them behind closed doors. Undoubtedly he acted for their own good, but some children just will not take castor oil unless their noses are held.

IT is often and pertinently asked what the United States Supreme Court will say about the constitutionality of some of the Roosevelt measures. Certainly there are at least three reactionary old men on that bench who would take profound satisfaction in standing by their plutocratic concepts of society if they knew the mob was battering at the door, and there may be more than three. That eventuality already has been seriously considered here by persons interested in the success of the new deal. There are ways of meeting it. Congress could pass an act requiring members of the court to retire upon passing the age of retirement. That would remove two of the worst. It would also remove the best, Justice Brandeis, but that could be met by a provision enabling the President by executive order to extend the tenure of designated Justices who had reached the age limit. Or the size of the court could be increased by law to permit the appointment of additional Justices whose ideas developed subsequent to the year 1880. It has been done. If this reporter knows anything about the temper of the present Administration, it will never permit the whole economic structure of this country to be disrupted and demoralized because less than a half a dozen dyspeptic old men are determined to uphold precedents established before the invention of the telephone. As has often been made clear on these pages, I do not relish these encroachments of the executive upon the prerogatives of the other branches, but sometimes a condition arises which must be dealt with. The blame for such bad precedents properly rests on those who produce the conditions.

RECOGNITION of Soviet Russia apparently has been hastened by public reaction to the step taken by the R. F. C. when, in substance, it lent $4,000,000 to a government whose legal existence we refuse to admit. All signs indicate that the loan was a "feeler," and that failure of public opinion to manifest any resentment will be followed by a much larger one, possibly $25,000,000 or even $100,000,000. The first loan was to enable Russia to buy our cotton; the next presumably will enable her to buy other American products, particularly copper. The old myth that recognition must wait upon payment of debts contracted by the imperial and provisional Russian governments looks pretty sorry in the light of what has happened to the debts owed us by governments which we do recognize. It is somewhat appalling to think of the mischief which one man, such as Charles Evans Hughes, can do in the course of a long and industrious life. It would be interesting to know just how much in cold dollars we have lost through our failure to recognize Russia.

IT has not been my custom to hold the majority of my countrymen in extravagant esteem. Indeed, I have never forgotten the observation of my venerable contemporary, H. L. Mencken, that they are probably the greatest aggregation of poltroons and scoundrels ever assembled under one flag. Nevertheless, I have been genuinely startled by the volume of mail I have received from Nation readers expressing their rank incredulity that anyone would fail to beat the government out of his fair share of income taxes if he thought he could stay out of jail. That persons in that moral state exist in this country in large numbers, I was well aware, but I simply cannot imagine how they ever happened to hear of, much less read, The Nation. Do they pick it up in barber shops and dentists' waiting rooms? In that connection permit me to plead in passing that I cannot possibly answer all the letters from persons who were impressed—one way or another—by my gentle comments on the House of Morgan. To the many who were kind, I tender my thanks herewith. To the others I will only say that they wasted their time, because under no circumstances would I be interested in the judgments or opinions of people who believe that it is perfectly all right to cheat if you are not caught.

* * * * *

HAROLD ICKES is rapidly being recognized as one of the strongest characters in the Cabinet. This should surprise nobody in Chicago, but in the East he was, prior to his appointment, curiously unknown. I say curiously, because a man who had spent a substantial part of his life defending Chicago against the piratical raids of Sam Insull should have enjoyed a national reputation. At any rate, the vigor and determination with which he took hold of the public-works program was a lesson to those who did not know him. Some of his appointments—notably those of Slattery, Glavis, and Margold—have been excellent. They induce the reflection that one of the things wrong with this country in recent years was the failure of those governing it to avail themselves of the brains scattered around it. Coolidge assumed that thinking was unnecessary in government, and Hoover thought he could do it all. If the foregoing sounds a trifle lyrical it is because I am happy over finding myself surrounded, after all these years, by swarms of men and women actually possessing character and intelligence. Maybe it's all a dream.

Why Conferences Fail

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, June 26

I.

IN the first fortnight of the Economic Conference, certain general truths about all international conferences have emerged with striking force. (1) It is a mistake to hold such a conference unless the preparation has been complete enough either to lay down the broad lines of agreement or to confront its members with decisive alternatives. In the present case, it is clear that there has been no such preparation. (2) It is a mistake to hold such a conference unless its terms of reference are limited and specific. Otherwise the inevitable result is that all national divergences come forthwith to the surface, and in the effort to secure some kind of agreement which may save the conference's face, broad general resolutions are passed in which the reservations are so many, the vagueness so profound, that these resolutions cease to have definite meaning.

It is already obvious that the character of the present conference involves this outcome of its deliberations. At the most, it will pass pious resolutions of principle which seek to obscure the inherent conflicts now daily expressed; and each state will be asked to implement their general tenor in its own way. To regard the conference as a gateway to recovery is already an attitude impossible to any observer who wishes to be taken seriously.

II.

That fact emerged in the first general debate. No speech contained a specific program. We knew, without a conference, that wholesale prices ought to rise, that currency needs to be stabilized, that tariffs are too high, that international debts are a menace, and economic nationalism a disaster. Often Ramsay MacDonald repeated his well-known plea for cooperation, without any indication of how it was to be obtained; and most other speakers offered the news that the conference met at a grave crisis and urged that something must be done. Commissions were set up on currency and commercial policy, which have given birth to enough sub-commissions to provide all the more important delegates with either a chairmanship or the position of a rapporteur.

The conference has not yet seriously confronted its first great dilemma. Tariff reductions are essential if the wheels of international trade are to be set moving; but tariff reductions cannot be contemplated until currency stability has been achieved. The domestic situation of America renders any early settlement of this latter issue unlikely; and it is apparent to most delegates that until Mr. Roosevelt's policy of inflation has reached some equilibrium, no state is likely to risk the invasion of its market by goods whose power to penetrate is simply a function of depreciated currency. Washington's rejection of the central bankers' settlement has brought into the open a divergency of interest between Europe and America which prevents any decisive outcome of the crisis for a considerable period.

The depth of the economic nationalisms here in conflict is obviously profound. The attitude of the British seems to be that while they will make some concessions for a stable currency, everyone's tariff is open to question except their own. France wants a return to gold, and appears to have no other predominant interest; her plea for a great program of international public works, and for shorter hours, struck a dumb note on the conference piano. The Germans, through Herr Hugenberg, put forward, and then repudiated, a fantastic memorandum demanding colonies in Africa and territory in Russia, seemingly on the basis that Germany, in terms of the Spenglerian philosophy, is a "virile" nation. This apart, the only German contribution appears to be Dr. Schacht's comprehensive effort to avoid German inflation by repudiating, so far as he can, all foreign indebtedness. Russia contributed, through M. Litvinov, an excellent essay on the contradictions of capitalism; and Mr. Soong said simply and truly that an increase in the Chinese standard of life would go far to promote world recovery by the new purchasing power it would create.

America's position has not been wholly clear. Mr. Hull made a speech on the evils of economic nationalism; but his proposal for a 10 per cent cut in tariffs—if it was his—was promptly repudiated by Senator Pittman. The latter has applauded plans for the remonetization of silver; and Senator Couzens has emphasized, what Mr. Hull has denied, the divergence between the President's policy and that of recovery by international action. What exactly America really wants, no one seems to know. I think it is fair to say that, so far, her delegation has merely increased the confusion of an already confused conference. It is a great pity, for a decisive and concrete lead from America was the only hope of the conference discussing its issues in an atmosphere of reality. As it is, no one can now say where the conference is drifting; it has become a rudderless ship. Mr. MacDonald harangues the press to the effect that he is optimistic despite "little setbacks"; but he has revealed to no one the grounds upon which he bases his optimism.

III.

The course of the Economic Conference in London has resembled notably that of Geneva on disarmament. So long as it remains on the high plateau of vague generalization, its members can give ardent utterance to the stock commonplaces of the day. Once it descends to the problem of concrete application, it becomes obvious that economic nationalism has created a body of vested interests whose claims are irreconcilable. The British government dare not make a free-trade gesture for fear of the Tory eagerness for tariffs and the economic imperialism of Ottawa. The French will not abandon their complex system of quotas and embargoes for fear of endangering the unsteady equilibrium they have maintained through the depression. Germany has no economic policy; and Japan must, somehow, flood the markets of the world with sweated goods in order to pay for her imperialist adventure in China. Southern and Eastern Europe tremble on the abyss of economic disaster, unable to move effectively in the absence of international agreement by the great states. America is too preoccupied with her own internal problems to act decisively upon any problem, from debts to tariffs, which implies a limitation of the domestic policy to which her main attention is given.

This is, in effect, a conference called to secure international planning as the necessary condition of a unified and interdependent world. What it reveals is the impossibility of any such achievement in a world of capitalist states. The distribution of the results involves hazards for the interests upon which their governments depend too dangerous for them to incur. None is able to confront the necessary implications of economic internationalism because each confronts internal forces which are too zealous for their own chance of individual well-being to make sacrifices for the common good. There can only be international planning, whether in the realm of disarmament or of economic matters, when the interest of states in the result is an equal interest. The inherent logic of a capitalist world is inequality; and this conference is merely a supreme illustration of the contradiction between world needs and an institutional system which denies their title to primary consideration.

ONE VIEW OF THE LONDON CONFERENCE

(Cartoon by Low in the Manchester Guardian)

BRILLIANT SUCCESS OF THE CONFERENCE SO FAR.

Walter Lippmann

III. Obfuscator de Luxe

By AMOS PINCHOT

IT has been the practice of some well known writers to dress commonplace ideas in sumptuous garments as a preliminary to risking them in the arena of controversy. Whether or not these verbal coverings are designed to conceal the age and deficiencies of the thought content—just as gaudy trappings cover worn-out horses in the Spanish bull-ring—is a matter of no importance. Whatever the purpose, it is not a legitimate one. For the object of the writer should be to deal so frankly with his readers that they will carry away an exact instead of a confused understanding of what he desires to say.

As I have already said, Mr. Lippmann's style is good. Yet despite his grace and lucidity his meaning is often far from clear. Frequently he uses words, sentences, and even paragraphs in antiphonal array, from which the gist emerges only after a process of cancelation that leaves a residue that is small compared with the totality of statement. And often, as one reads on, it becomes evident that this residue is precisely what Mr. Lippmann did not mean.

But what is especially noteworthy in Mr. Lippmann, as a successful publicist, is that, through skilful phraseology and constant citation of authorities, he attains impressiveness with a substance that is distinctly banal. Indeed, so many examples of commonplace thinking disguised by form and supported by references to other writers, invite the attention, that one hardly knows what to choose. One is tempted, therefore, to stroll, so to speak, through the galleries of Lippmanniana, pausing only now and then before some particularly arresting example of the writer's art.

In "A Preface to Politics," he is discussing political reform, and especially the unwisdom of attacking the trusts through political action. After quoting Graham Wallas and Gilbert Chesterton to reinforce this point, he writes:

Life is an irreversible process and for that reason its future can never be a repetition of the past. This insight we owe to Bergson. The application of it to politics is not difficult because politics is one of the interests of life.

Aside from their phraseological virtues, his sentences have little value. In the first place, they are obviously false, since, in politics, it is axiomatic that history does constantly repeat itself. In the second place, his citation of Bergson, in support of the cliché that the past never returns, is a trick, though perhaps an unconscious one, by which he saves himself from the platitudinous. Passing over the fact that Bergson does not say, in the sense employed by Mr. Lippmann, that the future can never be a repetition of the past, it would almost seem as though, upon writing "Life is an irreversible process," Mr. Lippmann had suddenly realized that he had fallen into the ditch of banality, and called upon Bergson to pull him out so that he could proceed on his way.

"We are homeless in a jungle of machines," writes Mr. Lippmann in "Drift and Mastery," "and untamed powers that haunt and lure the imagination. . . . No mariner ever enters upon a more uncharted sea than does the average human being born into the twentieth century." And the naive reader bows before Mr. Lippmann, convinced that something significant has been said. Unaware that he has been offered a cream puff, obtainable in any bakery, he devours it in the belief that he is sitting down to a lord mayor's banquet.

In a curious passage, he tells of the concern which, in his opinion, the middle-class person feels as to "who are 'the best people,' and who are the 'impossible,'" and of the "sleepless nights over whether you were correctly dressed, or whether you will be invited to be seen with Mrs. So-and-So." He cites the sad fact that the edifice of class feeling makes "sheep out of those who conform and freaks out of those who rebel." Here, passing over the rather gross exaggeration of the snobbery of the middle-class American, we see that once more phraseology rescues Mr. Lippmann. And we might almost expect him further to buttress his platitude by "This insight we owe to Emily Post." Yet, when all is said and done, it is not the phrase that makes the writer, though in many instances it "makes" the reader. An illusion of distinguished thought conveyed by a knack of words is a strong drug for the seduction of lazy minds.

On June 12, 1933, Mr. Lippmann is delivering a commencement address to the students of the senior class of Union College. He is discussing the farm bill and the industrial recovery act. The point he is making is, or should be, a quite simple and understandable one. To wit, if we are to have a managed industrial order, in which anti-trust laws are shelved and monopoly legalized, the working out of such a scheme requires a tariff wall high enough to prevent foreign competition. European governments, he says, are already reaching such a conclusion.

If you look abroad you will see an amazingly similar development in almost every important country. . . . The essential purpose, the desire to organize a stable and planned and protected economic order is now tending to dominate the policy of the great powers. This new philosophy [i. e. the union of managed industry and high tariffs] has a strange parentage.

Whereupon, he addresses the following bewildering paragraph to his youthful hearers.

The student of history will recognize, I think, that this union of ideas has been foreshadowed as a possibility for more than a hundred years. It is one of the conceivable developments of the philosophy of Alexander Hamilton. It is very clearly indicated in the conservatism of Disraeli. It becomes even more definite in the nationalism of Bismarck. In the field of the social sciences the basic conception of a national economy, as distinguished from the cosmopolitan economic philosophy of Adam Smith, was worked out by Friedrich List as long ago as 1841.

Now, the proposal to abolish trust laws and manage industry behind a tariff wall is an old story. The trusts and their lobbyists have been advocating it at Washington for about half a century. Although Mr. Lippmann's hearers are perhaps unaware of it, when he speaks of "management" in the field of industry he is in reality speaking of our old friend, regulation. But it would hardly do to call it regulation; because a considerable part of the public is well aware that the catch in regulation is that, up to now, it has never worked in the public interest. The regulators, as the history of the utilities shows, are almost invariably controlled by the interests they are supposed to regulate. That is one reason why big business has so joyfully greeted the industrial recovery act. It is fairly confident that the regulators will be open to reason. And, should they prove obdurate, such questions as prices, wages, and limitation of product will be carried to the courts under the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution which forbids confiscation. If, as a move against the depression, we are to legalize monopoly and raise the tariff higher than even Senator Grundy proposed, that is one thing. But let us discuss it frankly, and acknowledge its dangers to independent industry and the consumer. Nevertheless, by a process of obfuscation, Mr. Lippmann surrounds this problem with an atmosphere of mystery. He diverts attention to its philosophical aspects, and confuses the issue by citing five authorities in the same number of sentences. He leaves his hearers clear about nothing, except that the subject is a profound one and that Mr. Lippmann is an extremely erudite man.

Meantime, what can a college senior gather from being told that an idea is a "conceivable development" of Hamilton's philosophy? Is Hamilton so sacred an authority that, in discussing the farm and recovery bills, he should be cited as to a "union of ideas," which, according to Mr. Lippmann himself, is not a part of Hamilton's philosophy, but only a "conceivable development" of it? It is true that, in Mr. Lippmann's eyes, Hamilton is the political hero of the Western world. In "The Phantom Public," when Mr. Lippmann names the four "great state builders of modern times," Hamilton is his American entry. And to one versed in Mr. Lippmann's present philosophy this is not remarkable. For Hamilton was the first strong advocate of plutocratic fascism in America. He stood for a government controlled by the rich. He stood, in the Constitutional Convention, for a President elected for life, with a final veto power over the decisions of both houses of Congress and the State legislatures. He spoke for an absolutism almost as extreme as that of Lenin, Mussolini, or Hitler—whose recent "peace" speech, by the way, Mr. Lippmann greeted in his column of May 19 as a "genuinely statesmanlike address," and as "the authentic voice of a genuinely civilized people."

What is the purpose of Mr. Lippmann's reference to Hamilton? Why does he tell the seniors that a union of managed industry and prohibitive tariffs is indicated in Disraeli's conservatism and Bismarck's nationalism? What bearing has the fact, if it is a fact, that in the field of social sciences "the basic conception of a national economy, as distinguished from the cosmopolitan economic philosophy of Adam Smith," was worked out in the year of our Lord 1841 by the redoubtable Friedrich List? It has no bearing at all. And it is pompous nonsense. Nor has it any place in my discussion of Mr. Lippmann, except as presenting a typical case in which the Great Elucidator elucidates nothing but the alleged richness of his background. And, finally, what are the sadly perplexed members of Union '33 to do on receipt of these pearls of wisdom? Are they to rise from their seats and cheer for Mr. Lippmann, or for Hamilton, Disraeli, or Bismarck? Or will their alert cheer leader meet the occasion by proposing nine raahs and a tiger for that great economic quarterback, List, '41?

I have little hesitation in writing somewhat frankly about Mr. Lippmann. He has been the subject of so much eulogy from men in high place that a dash of criticism should be welcome, as tending to balance the scales. James Truslow Adams, for instance, who is not so popular an author as Mr. Lippmann, but who daily grows in the esteem of a clientele rather similar to Mr. Lippmann's, spoke of him in the Saturday Review last January as "the only national leader who has appeared in these post-war years . . . he is the most important leader of American public opinion today and a genuinely great one."

It would be interesting to learn how Mr. Lippmann arrived at greatness. And luckily we have hints, some in autobiographical form, which throw light on the question. In "A Preface to Politics," he writes two interesting sentences: "I know of one reformer who devotes a good deal of his time to intimate talks with powerful conservatives. He explains them to themselves; never after do they exercise their power with the same unquestioning ruthlessness." There is no doubt that the unnamed reformer was not Mr. Lippmann himself, but Lincoln Steffens. But the point is that, whoever inspired these words, they were, as events proved, prophetic of Mr. Lippmann's adoption of the evangelical technique of reform which he has followed for so many years.

Unfortunately, however, the evangelical method is apt to work with, so to speak, reverse English. The missionaries are too often converted by the heathen, as is shown by the history of Mr. Lippmann himself. And this is not strange. For the well-found camp of privilege is a more agreeable abiding place than that of the obscure, forlorn liberals and radicals. It has more to offer the talented publicist. I do not mean in money only, but in position, prestige, and many things which are soothing to the human heart. As for big business, it is not open to conversion. On this planet, at least, it is organized firmly on a revenue basis. And irrespective of the missionary brethren, it does the thing, and nothing but the thing, that in its judgment pays best.

Whether or not this conjecture as to how Mr. Lippmann came to cast himself in the role of ambassador of goodwill to the philistines—a David with a smile instead of a sling—the fact remains that he has so cast himself. And in this role he sees even the staunchest enemies of liberalism as disinterested men, whom a little tenderness will turn into enlightened citizens. In an editorial in the New York World entitled A Statesman of Big Business, he refers to Mr. Gary as a man who, with "the eye of a statesman . . . saw that confused competition [in the steel business] would give way, as already in the oil and sugar industries, to monopolistic mergers." And in an imaginary dialogue in "Public Opinion" between an industrialist and a labor leader, each of whom states his case with "perfect sincerity," he chooses Mr. Gary to represent the industrialist.

To Mr. Lippmann, Gary may be a statesman, though Morgan was a past master of monopolistic control long before Gary came on the scene. But, in history, Gary's name will live chiefly because, with the backing of Morgan, he succeeded for twenty years in holding the steel workers to starvation wages and the twelve-hour day, and in crushing unionism and collective bargaining. He knew little about steel making. He was a negotiator, propagandist, and super-salesman. In his dealings with labor and the public, he never yielded an inch to fairness except under compulsion. As head of the Morgan trust, he had immense political influence. He sidetracked the investigation of the Steel Corporation, begun in Roosevelt's time, so that the findings were not published until seven years after Roosevelt left office.

Gary learned thrift from his father, who, a friendly biographer tells us, was himself so thrifty that when he went shooting he never discharged his gun until he had two birds in line. Unctuous as a Mormon elder, relentless, resourceful, untiring, Elbert H. Gary, worthy scion of a horse-trading Methodist family, mixed his meaner virtues with all the vices but vice. Yet Gary is Mr. Lippmann's "statesman of big business." There are plenty of decent, able men in American business. Why does he choose Gary?

Again seeking autobiographical data as to the coming of age of Mr. Lippmann's eminence, we turn to a pamphlet called "A Preface to Walter Lippmann," which I referred to in a previous article. Though this pamphlet is a reprint of an article by Beverly Smith which appeared in the American Magazine, it may, I think, be accepted as authorized, if not autobiographical, for various reasons. First, the writer quotes interviews with Mr. Lippmann in a manner that shows an understanding relationship: "'If Dwight Morrow had lived,' he said to me recently, 'the entire course of the last Congress would have been different.'"

In the second place, the "Preface" first appeared as an article in the American Magazine, the property of the Crowell Publishing Company, of which Mr. Lippmann's friend, Thomas Lamont of J. P. Morgan and Company, is a director. It is unlikely that the American Magazine would publish a piece dealing with Mr. Lippmann's writings, his career, and his social and family life unless Mr. Lippmann had approved it. In the third place, the "Preface" has been republished and is being circulated as a promotional pamphlet by the New York Herald Tribune, on whose staff Mr. Lippmann glows as the chief luminary. And it is inconceivable that the Herald Tribune would do this without Mr. Lippmann's consent.

In "A Preface to Walter Lippmann," we are told that the Harvard professors all agreed that Lippmann had "the ablest mind" among the new graduates; that Lippmann was the "close friend" of William James, who sought Lippmann out in his study to congratulate him upon his undergraduate writing; that President Theodore Roosevelt and President Wilson were his warm friends and admirers; that he is too open-minded to have a program; that he is "the Man with the Flashlight Mind, the Great Elucidator"; that when he joined the Herald Tribune

The demand for Lippmann grew like a snowball. And the call for him came, surprisingly, from bankers, business men, merchants, professional men; that, as to the depression,

... he is profoundly convinced that if the American people face the situation courageously, open-eyed and resolute, they can conquer their difficulties. The spirit is what matters; that, as a result of the depression, "we are turning back to an older ideal"; that Rollin Kirby, when examined as to the color of Lippmann's eyes, replied: "I haven't the slightest idea"; but that Mr. Smith himself discovered that they are brown with a trace of gold or copper-color . . . and . . . singularly alive and compelling . . . his most striking feature; that Mr. Lippmann works in a monklike retreat. . . . He cannot even look out of the windows, which are cut through the walls high above his head. He starts work on his daily article at 8:30 in the morning and usually finishes the 700 to 1,200 words in about two hours—very fast for prose of such careful construction; that Lippmann is "calm, serene, detached, impartial . . ."; that he is the friend of "a score of leading business men and financiers"; and especially the friend of two Morgan partners besides Mr. Lamont (whom, strangely enough, the pamphlet does not mention).

On the other hand, we learn that he is a liberal, and that he has even had Socialist friends; that he was for a time the secretary of a Socialist mayor in Schenectady, who represented "really a reform rather than a socialist group." But it is made clear that Mr. Lippmann's excursion to the foothills of radicalism was brief, and that it happened long, long ago. "Theirs was a mild socialism, of the H. G. Wells type," says the promotional pamphlet, "but was considered rather bold in those days." And as to his employment by Mayor Lunn, it is explained that, being bored with the sub-editorship of Everybody's Magazine, "he snatched at the opportunity of a queer job which came his way." We learn that, despite the burden of his business or, rather, his writing, Mr. Lippmann manages to carry on an active social life on Long Island; that his tastes range from tennis to swimming and from "Italian Primitives to detective stories"; that he can "handle his fists upon occasion." On the whole, though most of it is not, in a strict sense, autobiographical, "A Preface to Walter Lippmann" may be regarded as an official portrait of the Great Elucidator.

But the passage which best explains the vogue of our publicist, who, according to its author, "performs the trick [of persuasion] so brilliantly sometimes that I half suspect it's all done with mirrors," is a conversation which took place between the Herald Tribune pamphleteer and a gentleman in a dining car who obviously represents the type of reader to whom Mr. Lippmann addresses Today and Tomorrow:

The heavy-set gentleman across the breakfast table from me in the dining car pushed back his coffee cup, looked over at me, and jabbed his cigar emphatically at the newspaper column he was reading.

"There's a man," he said, "who knows what he's talking about—this fellow Lippmann. He gets right at the heart of things and tells me what I want to know. I've never cared much about politics, myself. Without meaning to brag, I guess I'm a fairly hard-headed business man. I've never bothered my head about international finance, or Congressional appropriations, or national economic planning, or any of that truck. I'd rather read the commodity prices and the sports page."

"Same here," I said, "except that I don't know anything about commodity prices."

"But nowadays," continued my new friend, "with everything going to pot, I want to know why. We've got the same old country, haven't we? What's the matter with us? What's the government doing about it? What can we do to help along? This Lippmann seems to have the dope straighter than anybody else. I don't agree with him half the time. And he hasn't got any cure-all. But he explains what is going on so that a man can understand it."

He paused, puffed his cigar, and gave me a ponderous, amiable wink.

"And maybe my wife," he confided, "doesn't sit up and take notice when I explain to her the tie-up between the war debts and the tariff! I'm not telling her about Lippmann. No, sir. She's beginning to think I'm a master mind. What I would like to know is, who is this boy Lippmann, anyway?"

A lot of other people have been asking the same question lately. For Walter Lippmann has been catapulted into popular fame almost overnight. A year ago he was known to only a comparatively small group of readers, though he had gained considerable distinction as a New York newspaper editor, an editor of so-called "liberal" periodicals, and as an author of books on philosophy and politics.

Today he can count his readers in millions.

With nothing we are told in "A Preface to Walter Lippmann" are we inclined to quarrel. Whatever may be said of its violation of the canons of good taste, the pamphlet is no doubt good salesmanship. It is a shrewd appeal, addressed to all possible readers who crave the excitement of being intellectual and progressive, and are nevertheless mindful of the importance of being considered regular at the bank and country club. To those of a frankly conservative turn of mind, Mr. Lippmann is sold with the assurance that he is sound; that his liberalism is tempered by the friendship of Morgan partners. In his promotional pamphlet, as elsewhere, Mr. Lippmann is characteristically out to please. So he must hold himself free to see that his writings shall bring the greatest pleasure to the greatest number.

In the Sacco-Vanzetti case, while Mr. Lippmann was editor of the World, his desire to maintain an attitude of unoffending independence is perhaps illustrated as well anywhere else. Sacco and Vanzetti have been condemned to death after a trial in which bias and class feeling have obviously swayed both judge and jury. In the columns of the World Mr. Lippmann has published a number of really fine and eloquent pleas for a new trial and for executive clemency. He has warned the State of Massachusetts that the execution may mean a tragic miscarriage of justice. Governor Fuller, evading the responsibility of deciding the question, has appointed a commission of three men to review the evidence. And this review, which is one of the most remarkable pieces of impassioned, special pleading that a quasi-judicial body ever handed down, has sealed the doom of the two men. In consequence, Sacco and Vanzetti have been put to death.

At this juncture, what has Mr. Lippmann to say? First, he congratulates the human race upon the courage and unselfishness with which President Lowell and Dr. Stratton have done their duty. (For some reason, the third commissioner, Judge Grant, is not mentioned.)

In that effort at understanding it should be possible, within a reasonable time, for disinterested men on both sides of this controversy to collaborate. For amidst all the confusion of hysteria and of partisanship there remained one thing which is a credit to the human race. There were men in Massachusetts who were willing to stake their reputations, to sacrifice their comfort, to face danger, in an effort to get at the truth. They were men who had everything to lose and nothing to gain by their voluntary and unrewarded participation in this case. They have served their State, and the cause of justice as they saw it. We should feel that we had failed in our obligation did we not pay our respects to these men.

And so, although we had to question the conclusiveness of their report, the World wishes to record its understanding of the ordeal through which President Lowell and Dr. Stratton have passed. Neither of these men can conceivably have desired any connection with the matter. To both it must have been an utterly painful duty which they could not honorably evade. For both it must have meant a horrible interruption in their personal lives and their professional careers. (Editorial in the New York World, August 24, 1927.)

Then, having appeased the element of public opinion which had cried for the blood of the dead men, Mr. Lippmann turns his attention to Felix Frankfurter, William J. Thompson, and Arthur D. Hill, who devotedly fought to save Sacco and Vanzetti; and lifts them to precisely the same pedestal with Lowell and Stratton:

By the same token, regardless of one's own opinion, it would be snide indeed not to recognize the services of those citizens of Massachusetts who befriended the two dead men, though there was no bond of sympathy except their common humanity and no motive except a desire to see justice prevail. Among those who gave freely, and at great cost to themselves, three names stand out. They are William J. Thompson, Arthur D. Hill, and Felix Frankfurter. They failed in their efforts to have the case retried, but they placed indelibly on the record the fact that there are men in Massachusetts now, as in the past, who are ready to uphold the rights of the humblest and the most despised. Those who are prepared to generalize glibly about the conservative classes in Boston and about Harvard might remember these three names. For they stand very high and very honorably in the roster of patriots.

And this he follows up two days later with an editorial praising Governor Fuller for his courage and honesty, though regretting that he did not have "profundity" when "confronted with a profound issue."

Thus, with the "despised" defendants dead and under the ground, it is incumbent upon Mr. Lippmann to heal the wounds of the living. If the conservatives of the Back Bay have been nettled by doubts cast by the World on the justice of the execution, that irritation must be allayed. If anyone has gained the impression that an irrevocable wrong has been done to innocent men, and a lasting stigma attached to the courts, that impression must fade. If Heywood Broun, a great journalist and, I think, a great man who has done more to promote clear thinking, justice, and kindly common-sense than any American writer of his time, has been dismissed from the World for too earnest an espousal of the cause of Sacco and Vanzetti, that must be forgotten. The important thing is that the contending factions should be united by a common appreciation of Walter Lippmann's fairness.

And so Mr. Lippmann takes his way back to his penthouse tower, leaving his public with the comforting assurance that, whatever may have happened to Sacco and Vanzetti, the honor of Massachusetts is safe.

(The fourth and concluding article on Walter Lippmann will appear in an early issue.)

La Guardia for Mayor of New York

By ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

TAMMANY, corrupt, exposed, but still unchastened, once more faces a mayoralty election. Never in the history of New York City, however, has it incurred the resentment and wrath of so many and so diverse foes. A crushing tax burden and the failure to apply real economy measures have driven into the camp of its enemies many of its former allies. The revelations of the Seabury investigation, coupled with Tammany's brazen refusal to clean house, have alienated even the ordinarily apathetic citizen.

New York City teeters on the brink of a financial crisis. The five-cent fare, the only benefit the city ever derived from its unproductive investments in the privately operated subways, is threatened. The Board of Education has ceased the licensing of new teachers and the construction of sorely needed new buildings. The rising burden of unemployment relief renders absurd the promise of a balanced budget. With tax collections steadily dwindling, even the salaries of the city's army of 100,000 civil servants are in danger.

The Society of Tammany seems not a whit perturbed. Tammany has never claimed to be a philanthropic organization. Its success is due to its business methods and to the dividends it pays. Its opponents and decriers are presumed to be disinterested, self-sacrificing, non-professional public-spirited citizens, amateur fighters for the public weal. It is not surprising that Tammany's professionals put them to rout.

In the coming election it is safe to say that practically the only supporters of Tammany will be those who will gain, either directly or indirectly, by its success. The fixer in the Magistrate's Court, the deputy who never visits his office, the lawyer who is constantly appointed a referee, the armies who thrive on the city moneys — office-holders, contractors, and what-not, will not falter or grow weary in their fight for Tammany. The independent, the disgusted, the disinterested voters clearly outnumber the Tammany faithful. The difficulty is and always has been in galvanizing and uniting the opposition. Tammany's strength lies not so much in its own numbers as in the disunity and bickering of its foes.

Fusion candidates can no longer content the electorate with the pledge of "good government." The cry of "corruption" is feeble indeed, compared with the issues of a five-cent fare, decent housing, tax relief. A program, as well as a personality, is necessary. The formula for a revolt against Tammany is well known by this time. The fusion forces under the leadership of those Republicans who are not jackals to the Tammany tiger nominate an independent Democrat, preferably a Catholic. Some modification in this formula is necessary today because of the growing importance of the Socialist and independent vote. Independent Democrats whom the formula fits are difficult to find. Samuel Seabury refused the fusion nomination; Joseph V. McKee, whose brief stay in office electrified 234,372 pencil wielders, has removed himself from consideration; Alfred E. Smith is bound by sentimental ties to the sachems of Fourteenth Street; Ferdinand Pecora is too close to Tammany. Norman Thomas would be a splendid candidate but he would probably not accept a Republican indorsement, nor have they sense enough to offer it to him. One man of incorruptible integrity, a vigorous fighter with practical political experience, stands preeminent as a possible candidate. He is Fiorello H. La Guardia.

Major La Guardia, the only Republican who has carried a city-wide election since 1901, was elected president of the Board of Aldermen in 1919. In the House of Representatives his work has won him the designation, the "Roistering Rebel." He is the only member of the lower House who was described as a man of real merit in "Washington Merry-Go-Round" and "Sons of the Wild Jackass," exposés of life on Capitol Hill. To gain distinction and without political backing to wield power in the regimented atmosphere of the lower House are rare accomplishments. By conscientious preparation, by dramatic presentation, by independence and courage, La Guardia has forced acknowledgement of his ability and leadership in every progressive cause.

During one of the never-ending coal strikes in Pennsylvania he visited the mines and returned to Congress to describe the miners' squalor in unforgettable language. In a New York strike La Guardia went on the picket line. On one occasion in a debate, to focus attention on high meat prices, he drew from his pocket a tiny lamb chop which he declared cost him thirty cents. It was Congressman La Guardia who flew to Boston the night before Sacco and Vanzetti were executed to plead personally with Governor Fuller.

In 1929 Walker defeated La Guardia by about 500,000 votes, but La Guardia's campaign statements that year were treated as mere wild and reckless charges. The average voter, whose head was enmeshed in a wreath of ticker tape, simply could not believe La Guardia's charges of official corruption. It remained for a legislative investigating committee with an appropriation of $750,000 to prove the truth of his charges. As the New York Times has stated: "If there is anyone who has the right to say 'I told you so,' it is La Guardia."

The Mayor of New York must know not only the city government and its budget, but also the political game and how to play it. It has been said that Tammany loves the individual but despises "the people," while the reformers love "the people" but despise the individual. La Guardia will not make that error. His lack of swank is one of his identifying characteristics. The Mayor of New York must avoid the rigidity, the self-righteousness, and the bungling ineptness of the merely good-government reformer. He must have in mind a "Who's Who" of the grafters, chair-warmers, favorite contractors, and the vast and varied medley that prey on the city treasury. La Guardia has held office for twenty years. He knows New York City politics and its politicians.

La Guardia's defeat in 1929 was caused in large measure by the fact that the Republican organization deliberately knifed its own candidate. He was too radical for the Republicans and so, as La Guardia says, they voted for Norman Thomas. After La Guardia's defeat no less than twelve Republican clubs of Italian-Americans left that party. It is said that since then the enrolment of Italian-Americans in the Democratic Party has increased 50 per cent. The vote of this group, comprising from 350,000 to 375,000 persons, is not to be overlooked. La Guardia has also a tremendous following among the Jewish voters and is strong with labor. He appeals to independent Democrats who like to regard themselves as progressive.

In 1932 John P. O'Brien, Democrat, received 1,056,119 votes; Lewis H. Pounds, Republican, 443,901; Morris Hillquit, Socialist, 249,589; Joseph V. McKee, independent, 234,372; while 227,309 persons who voted did not even take the trouble to pull down the lever for mayor. The anti-Tammany vote was therefore 1,155,171, exceeding the Democratic total. If La Guardia retains most of the Republican and independent vote and gains the support of labor, he may be the next Mayor of New York.

Fusion leaders have a real opportunity. La Guardia as mayor can end the banker domination of City Hall; he can begin with federal funds to raze the dingy rookeries of the poor and erect in their place garden apartments; he can drive out the political parasites that drain the city's blood; he can make transit unification a fact and not a shibboleth. Liberals will not need to blush for the Board of Education and, more important, La Guardia as a practical politician can build up a machine or a following that may make for permanence in the never-ending fight against Tammany. La Guardia has the personality, the integrity, the record, the program, and the philosophy. In addition he is more likely to be elected than anyone else in sight.

The Intellectuals of the World and Hitler

By KARL LANGER

Vienna, June 29

THIS year's annual congress of the International P. E. N. Clubs which met during the last week in May in the Yugoslav town of Dubrovnik (Ragusa) on the Adriatic, presented a sorry picture of the lack of moral stamina and convictions of the literary world. The first P. E. N. Club was founded in Great Britain for the express purpose of promoting international solidarity among writers and freedom of literary expression. Since then the movement has spread to forty nations in Europe and America, and is today the most respected and numerically the strongest organization of creative intellectuals in the world.

It seems self-evident that the assemblage should take a stand on the ousting by Hitler Germany of some of the German Pen Club's most distinguished members, on its suppression of all independent literary activity, on its burning of the works of Germany's foremost writers, and on the persecution of its outstanding artists, authors, and scientists for reasons of race and conviction. The men of literature who had inscribed the fight for intellectual freedom on their banners could not possibly ignore the greatest spiritual tragedy of our decade.

The reactionary rulers of the Dritte Reich knew this only too well. The German section of the P. E. N. Club, usually represented at these international meetings by men like Hauptmann, Remarque, Feuchtwanger, Toller, Zweig, and the brothers Mann, having been purged of all radical and Semitic elements in the initial stages of National Socialist rule for its "racial, cultural, and political purification," was represented by Schmidt-Pauli, Elster, and Captain Busch, writers whose names are little known outside of Germany, but who make up for their obscurity by their absolute subservience to the Fascist cause. But not enough. The German government permitted participation only on the condition that the Dubrovnik congress take no formal action against its persecution of German authors and that the official delegates remain in constant touch by telephone with the proper authorities at home. It announced also that condemnation of the German government would result in the immediate suppression of the German P. E. N. Club.

Preposterous to relate, the threat of the cultural barbarians who have so successfully suppressed all opposition within the Reich was no less effective beyond national borders. Influential circles did their utmost to prevent an open break with the Nazi regime. The executive committee of the American Pen Club, through its only representative, Henry Seidel Canby, editor of the Saturday Review of Literature, had submitted a resolution which, it was piously hoped, would uphold the standards of the organization without precipitating it into "political altercations." It read:

We, the members of the American Center of the P. E. N. Club, call upon all other centers to affirm once more those principles upon which the structure of this society was raised and call particular attention to those resolutions presented by the English, French, German, and Belgian delegates at the Fifth International Congress of P. E. N. Clubs in Brussels in 1927 and passed there unanimously:

1. Literature, national though it be in origin, knows no frontiers, and should remain common currency between nations in spite of political or international upheavals.
2. In all circumstances, and particularly in time of war, works of art, the patrimony of humanity at large, should be left untouched by national or political passion.
3. Members of the P. E. N. will at all times use what influence they have in favor of good understanding and mutual respect between the nations.

We likewise call upon the international Congress to take definite steps to prevent the individual centers of the P. E. N., founded for the purpose of fostering good-will and understanding between races and nations, from being used as weapons of propaganda in the defense of persecution inflicted in the name of nationalism, racial prejudice, and political ill will.

The French, Polish, and Belgian delegations came prepared to submit a resolution of indignant protest against German terrorism; the Society of Socialist Authors in Austria, through its member Sonka, submitted a resolution signed by Oskar Maria Graf, Hermynia zur Muehlen, D. J. Bach, Fritz Bruegel, Josef Luitpold, and others which reiterated "the loyalty and warm friendship of the assembled delegates to all writers and others who have had to suffer for their words and works" and sent "greetings to Karl Von Ossietzky, Ludwig Renn, Erich Muehsam, Sigmund Freud, Heinrich Mann, Alfred Kerr, Jakob Wassermann, and all those other comrades who have been persecuted, banned, and burned in Germany." Of these resolutions the executive committee selected that of the American organization as a preliminary statement of opinion, and it was adopted by a unanimous vote. The Germans also voted in its favor, with the understanding that another resolution dealing specifically with the German situation would be taken up later. The French and German deputations were instructed to make an effort to agree on a statement that would be generally acceptable.

The committee returned with a resolution which condemned the burning of books and other injustices of the German government, with the announcement that the German delegation would vote for the resolution only if it were adopted without discussion. The Swiss delegate Schickelberger and the Austrian Felix Salten warmly seconded this proposal, but they had made their reckoning without their host. H. G. Wells, the chairman of the congress, declared that no group of delegates would be permitted to deprive the congress of its right of free discussion and threw the floor open to the meeting. In the heated altercation that followed Cremeaux (France) declared that it was an intolerable affront to every cultured human being to know that somewhere a fellow-man was being deprived of physical and spiritual liberty. Marinetti called attention to the fact that Fascist Italy has always observed scrupulous tolerance toward all religious faiths and took sharp issue with anti-Semitic intolerance in Germany. Felix Salten, the Austrian writer whose animal stories have enjoyed enormous popularity in Germany and in America, supported the position of the German delegation with the statement that "German Austria and Germany are one people, whose culture springs from the beginnings of the old Germanic race." Mr. Salten resigned the presidency of the Vienna Pen Club at its last general meeting on June 27, after his attitude at the congress had been criticized severely.

Thomas (Belgium) protested with such telling effect against the measures taken by the German government to suppress the freedom of thought and action of the literary profession that Busch (Germany) rose to protest and threatened in the name of his delegation to leave the congress if this discussion of German conditions were permitted to continue. The debate was thereupon shut off and the resolution adopted.

On the following day Ernst Toller, who represented the emigrant German members of the P. E. N. Club and was known to most of the delegates for his activity at previous international congress meetings, and Sholom Asch, the distinguished Yiddish-American poet and writer who has lived for years on European soil, were given the floor. In the previous session the German delegation had declared itself ready to reply to any charges that these men and others might bring, and on the strength of this promise Asch and Toller had willingly postponed their addresses which had been scheduled to take place during the earlier session. Much to the amazement of the delegates, the chairman opened the next day's meeting by reading a statement from the German delegation in which the latter announced, obviously under instructions from Berlin, its refusal to attend further sessions of the congress in view of the attacks upon Germany.

Sholom Asch presented the position of the German Jew in a voice that shook with emotion. Toller's speech on this occasion was the more remarkable because it attacked the intrinsic rather than the adventitious features of the Nazi regime, and in his indignation over the persecution of the Jew and the throttling of literature, did not forget the physical and spiritual suffering of the German masses.

What has the German Pen Club done, Mr. Toller asked, in protest against the expulsion from the country of Germany's most valuable scholars and university professors, such as Einstein, Zondek, Heller, Lederer, Schuecking, and Goldstein?

Where [he asked] was the German Pen Club when artists like Bruno Walter, Klemperer, Weill, Busch, and Eisler were ousted from their work in Germany? What did the Pen Club do against the decision of the German Academy that excludes Kathe Kollwitz, Otto Dix, Hofer, and Klee from work at the Academy, that forced the brilliant painter Liebermann to leave the Academy because he considered it unworthy to continue in membership there? What has the Pen Club done about the discharge of great actors from German playhouses?

What did the German Pen Club do about the exclusion of German writers from the protective society for German authors? What has it done about the blacklisting of authors whose works can no longer be printed in Germany or sold in German bookstores? What has the German Pen Club done to prevent the threatened boycott of the entire output of foreign publishers who print the works of these outlawed men of letters?

The secretary of the German Pen Club today is a certain Herr von Leer. In his book, "Juden sehen dich an," he had the temerity to speak of the Jew as the "devil in human form." Under pictures of Einstein, Ludwig, and Lessing he printed the caption "unchanged"; under the picture of the assassinated Erzberger, who, by the way, was no Jew, were the words "convicted at last." Will our German colleagues condemn this outbreak of barbarous madness? Will they expel Herr von Leer from the Pen Club?

I am not speaking of my private fate, nor of the fate of all those men and women who are forced to live in exile today. It is hard enough not to see the land of one's birth, to be hounded, proscribed, hated by one's countrymen. But the sufferings of others have been worse. I shall be charged in Germany with having spoken against Germany. I oppose the methods of the men who rule Germany today but hold no brief to speak for the German people. Millions in Germany are forbidden to write and say what they think and believe. When I speak here I speak for those millions who have been deprived of their voices. The gentlemen call upon the shades of Germany's great men of the past. What is there in the works of Goethe, Schiller, Kleist, and Lessing that condones the suppression of a million people?

I doubt whether we shall have many more occasions to come together on European soil to speak our opinions unhindered. The rebel is in danger everywhere today. But what of us? Who are we that the future of man should be sacrificed for our sakes? Let us overcome this fear that degrades and shames us. We must carry our fight into many by-ways. There may be ways that will lead us against each other; but in all of us there is the conviction of a humanity that is free of barbarity and lying, free from social injustice and oppression.

Jugoslavia, which many of us look upon as a land of uncultured peasants, greeted Toller's speech with a storm of approval. The lecture tour that followed his attendance at the congress was a triumphal procession. "I have rarely had the opportunity," commented Victor Rubcic, editor of the Posta in Sarajevo, "to see a man gain such popularity and win such honest acclaim within so short a time."

The Comic Wisdom of S. N. Behrman

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WHEN the Theater Guild produced "The Second Man" in the fall of 1928 S. N. Behrman was totally unknown. Since then he has written only two other plays which achieved an outstanding success, but there is no American dramatist who has more clearly defined or more convincingly defended an individual and specific talent. It is, as we shall see, difficult to discover in the rather commonplace incidents of his career any explanation of the fact that the whole cast of his mind should be as different as it is from that of any of his fellows, but from the very beginning it was evident that he had accepted and assimilated the Comic Spirit so successfully that he could write with a consistent clarity of thought and feeling unrivaled on our stage. With us farce, burlesque, sentimental romance, and even satire are common enough. They are, as a matter of fact, natural expressions of that superficial tendency toward irreverence which overlays the fundamental earnestness of the American character. Embarrassed by deep feeling or true comedy, we take refuge in the horse-play of farce or the ambiguities of "sophisticated" romance, where the most skittish of characters generally end by rediscovering a sentimentalized version of the eternal verities. But the remarkable thing about Mr. Behrman is the unerring way in which his mind cut through the inconsistency of these compromises, the clarity with which he realized that we must ultimately make our choice between judging men by their heroism or judging them by their intelligence, and the unfailing articulateness with which he defends his determination to choose the second alternative.

Several other American playwrights have hesitated upon the brink of the decision. One or two of them—Sidney Howard and Robert Sherwood, for instance—have written individual plays which all but defined their attitude and, indeed, Edwin Justin Mayer's almost unknown "Children of Darkness" is a masterpiece which may some day be rediscovered. But Mr. Behrman alone has been clear, persistent, and undeviating; he alone has emerged from the group by virtue of a surprising intellectual quality. One might have predicted him a generation hence. One might have foreseen that a definition as clear as his was bound to emerge and that someone in America would be bound to write comedy in the classical tradition—for the simple reason that such comedy is the inevitable product of a certain stage in the development of any nation's civilization. But the amazing thing was his sudden, unexpected emergency from obscurity with both attitude and technical skill fully formed.

The public was given no opportunity to discover Mr. Behrman until he had completely discovered himself, and "The Second Man" was not only a mature play—quite as good as anything he has written since—but actually a comedy about Comedy and therefore, by implication, the announcement of a program. All its accidental qualities were, of course, those common to nearly every work which even approaches the type of which it represents the fully developed form. The locale was luxurious, the people privileged enough to spend most of their time adjusting amorous or other complications, and the conversation sparking with wit. But the theme was the Comic Spirit itself and the hero a man forced to make that decision between the heroic and the merely intelligent which must be made before comedy really begins.

Like Mr. Behrman himself, his hero belongs to a society which still pretends rather unsuccessfully to affirm its faith in moral ideals. Romantic love, for example, is still theoretically so tremendous a thing that no man or woman worthy of the name would hesitate to give up everything else in its favor. Life, below even the frivolous surface of fashionable existence, is supposed to be real and supposed to be earnest. But our hero—a second-rate story writer—has brains enough to know, not only that his stories are second rate, but also that he does not really believe what he is supposed to believe. He can strike the heroic attitude, but the steam is not really there. A "second man" inside himself whispers the counsel of prudence and common sense, tells him that he does not really prefer love to comfort, or exaltation to pleasure. The only integrity he has is the only one which is necessary to a comic hero—the one which makes it impossible for him either to be a conscious hypocrite on the one hand or, on the other, so to befuddle himself with sentiment as to conceal from even his own mind the fact that he is making one choice while pretending to make the other.

In terms of action the result is that he sends packing the determined flapper who wants to marry him and returns to the wealthy mistress who can support him in the luxury to which he has been accustomed. "I suppose it's dreadful to take money from a woman. But why it's worse than taking it from a man I don't know. Do you?" Incidentally, and in the course of this action, the result is also to develop with bold clarity the whole philosophy of a hero who has surrendered the effort to be heroic and is ready to explain without equivocation why such as he must take themselves and the world as they find them without either trying to pretend that they are different or trying to make them so. The originality of the whole—so far as our particular stage is concerned—consists just in the fact that the play neither shirks the logic of its own conclusions nor presents itself as a simple "shocker" but remains essentially "serious" in the sense that it accepts and defends the premises of all pure comedy. "Life is a tragedy to those who feel and a comedy to those who think." Follow the emotions and you may reach ecstasy; but if you cannot do that, then listen to the dictates of common sense and there is a very good chance that you will be comfortable—even, God willing, witty besides.

S. N. Behrman

Mr. Behrman has concealed from the public the inner history of his development and has not, so far as I am aware, told us even what literary influences helped him upon the way to his exceptional maturity, or enabled him to reach so quickly the core of a problem towards which most of our dramatic writers are still only feeling their way. The records say that he was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, and that, as a stage-struck youth, he managed to get as far as Fourteenth Street, New York, by appearing as an actor in a vaudeville skit which he himself had written. Then he attended Clark University and enrolled in Professor Baker's famous course at Harvard. But since then the outward events of his career have been much like those in the careers of half the men connected with the New York theater. For a period he worked on the Times and for a period he acted as a theatrical press-agent—being connected in that capacity with the resounding success of "Broadway." Since his first play he has spent a good deal of time in Hollywood and he ought, it would seem, to share the weaknesses as well as the strengths of the typical Broadway group into which he seems so obviously to fit. But by now it is evident that "The Second Man" was no accident. He shows no tendency to become submerged in the common tradition, to write merely in the current manner. Instead, each of his succeeding plays has been quite obviously the product of the same talent and the same integral attitude.

It is true that once—in the comedy-drama "Meteor"—he fumbled the intended effect for the very reason that he had, apparently, not thought the situation through to the point where it could be stated in purely intellectual terms. This history of a rebellious and disorganized genius seen through the eyes of a bewildered but admiring acquaintance is not pure comedy because it is suffused with a sense of wonder, because its subject is a mystery, whereas comedy, almost by definition, admits no mysteries and adopts nil admirari as its motto. But since that time Mr. Behrman has not faltered. He made a delightful play out of the delightful English conte "Serena Blandish" and then, in "Brief Moment" and "Biography," he extended his demonstration of the comic solution to the problem of civilized living.

Each of these plays—and especially the last—enjoyed a considerable run. At least "Biography," moreover, was generally recognized by critics as one of the outstanding plays of the season. And yet neither, I think, was taken unreservedly to its bosom by the general public or given quite the wholehearted approval accorded to certain other plays less relentlessly consistent in tone. The comic attitude—like any other consistent attitude—cannot be undeviatingly maintained without involving a certain austerity. The moment inevitably comes when it would be easier to relax for a moment the critical intelligence and to pluck some pleasant flower of sentiment or—in other words—to pretend that some compromise is possible between the romantic hero and the comic one. But Mr. Behrman never allows himself to be betrayed by any such weakness and he pays the penalty of seeming a little dry and hard to those pseudo-sophisticates who adore the tear behind the smile because they insist upon eating their cake and having it too. Just as they giggle when they find themselves unable to sustain the level of O'Neill's exaltation—unable, that is to say, to accept the logic of his demand that life be consistently interpreted in terms of the highest feeling possible to it—so, too, they are almost equally though less consciously baffled by Behrman's persistent anti-heroicism. Comedy and tragedy alike are essentially aristocratic; only the forms in between are thoroughly popular.

"Brief Moment" is concerned with a very rich, intelligent, and disillusioned young man who marries a cabaret singer because he fancies her somehow "elemental," and then discovers that she is all too capable of becoming a very convincing imitation of the women of his own class—not only by adopting all their manners, but by developing a genuine enthusiasm for all the manifestations of fashionable pseudo-culture. One of its points, therefore, is that those "simple souls" which sometimes fascinate the too complicated are really less "beyond" than simply not yet "up to" the follies from which they seem so refreshingly free; but the real theme of the play is larger. Its hero is an inhabitant of that Wasteland described in so many contemporary poems and novels. He is the heir of all our culture, the end product of education and privilege, eclectically familiar with so many enthusiasms and faiths that there is none to which he can give a real allegiance. But instead of gesturing magniloquently in the void, instead of trying, like most of his prototypes in contemporary literature, to turn his predicament into tragedy despite the obvious absence of the necessary tragic exaltation, he is content, first to analyze the situation intellectually and then to compensate for the absence of ecstasy by the cultivation of that grace and wit which no one can be too sophisticated to achieve.

"Biography" is again the vehicle for a comment made by the Comic Spirit upon one of the predicaments of contemporary life. Its heroine is a mediocre portrait painter with a genius for comely living. Her dilemma arises out of the apparent necessity of choosing between two men—the one a likable but abandoned opportunist in public life, the other a fanatical revolutionary idealist. Her solution is ultimately to choose neither, and the play is essentially her defense of her right to be a spectator and to cultivate the spectator's virtue—a detached tolerance. The revolutionist says everything which can be said against her attitude. He denounces it as, at bottom, only a compound of indolence and cowardice which parades as a superiority when it is really responsible for the continuance of all the injustices of the world which the intelligent profess themselves too "wise" to correct. But the heroine sticks to her contention that a contemplative, understanding neutrality is "right" for her. She may be wholly ineffectual. The world's work may be done by persons less reasonable and less amiable than she. But wit and tolerance are forms of beauty and, as such, their own excuse for being.

Mr. Behrman's plays are obviously "artificial"—both in the sense that they deal with an artificial and privileged section of society and in the sense that the characters themselves are less real persons than idealized embodiments of intelligence and wit. No person was ever so triple plated with the armor of comic intelligence as his hero; no society ever existed in which all problems were solved—as in his plays they are—when good sense had analyzed them. Just as the tragic writer endows all his characters with his own gift of poetry, so Mr. Behrman endows all his with his own gift for the phrase which lays bare to the mind a meaning which emotion has been unable to disentangle. No drawing room ever existed in which people talked so well or acted so sensibly at last, but this idealization is the final business of comedy. It first deflates man's aspirations and pretensions, accepting the inevitable failure of his attempt to live by his passions or up to his enthusiasms. But when it has done this, it demonstrates what is still left to him—his intelligence, his wit, his tolerance, and his grace—and then, finally, it imagines with what charm he could live if he were freed, not merely from the stern necessities of the struggle for physical existence, but also from the perverse and unexpected quixoticisms of his heart.

(This is the first of four articles on contemporary American dramatists. The second, The Random Satire of George Kaufman, will appear in the issue of August 2.)

In the Driftway

THE Society of St. Tammany, better known as Tammany Hall, was organized as a benevolent and patriotic body, and considers itself both to this day. Of its benevolence, at least toward its more outstanding members, there can be no doubt, but since the Fourth of July its patriotism has been suspect. For on that day it transgressed the ritual which in recent years the United States Flag Association has been meticulously building up in order that the religion of patriotism may have an appropriate mumbo-jumbo. The New York Times printed on the morning of the Fourth some of the "rules" which the Flag Association has been more or less successful in imposing upon a timid and befuddled public. Foremost was a declaration that the flags should not be hoisted before sunrise and should be lowered at sunset.

THE Society of St. Tammany gathered splendidly on the Fourth and held "patriotic exercises" in front of its Wigwam, from which a whole battalion of American flags was flung to the winds. But, alas, the sachems must have got up too late to read the "rules" for displaying the flag obligingly printed for their benefit that morning, or else they went home so happy that they forgot about them. For the flags—think of it, ye patriots!—were allowed to stay up all night. Of course there were religious zealots to observe the desecration. According to the New York Times, "Indignant citizens who noticed the large flag on the roof and the twelve smaller flags on the Fourth Avenue and Seventeenth Street sides after sundown battered the Hall door in vain. There was no response."

BUT the sachems of Tammany Hall need not be, and probably are not, entirely disconsolate. The Society of St. Tammany is older than the United States Flag Association and may have memories of history which have escaped the pontifical pundits of the more recent organization. The sachems may retort, for instance, that the flag was flown all night once back in 1814 without exciting any recriminations. A certain American who on that occasion went out to the British fleet in Chesapeake Bay to arrange for an exchange of prisoners, and was kept there until the attack on Fort McHenry had been repulsed, testified later that the flag had flown over the fort all night. The occurrence did not annoy him. He did not telephone to the United States Flag Association in a huff. On the contrary, he rejoiced that "the rocket's red glare, and bombs bursting in air, gave proof through the night that our flag was still there!" Indeed, he was so enraptured when "by the dawn's early light" he saw the emblem which had been visible "at the twilight's last gleaming," that he wrote a song about the event which enjoys considerable popularity in the United States to this day. The man was Francis Scott Key. The song is called "The Star-Spangled Banner."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Social Workers, Pro and Con

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Social workers, in The Nation of June 14, were bracketed with racketeers and gangsters. As defenders of the faith—the simple faith that man is our prime concern and in him lies the hope of the ages—social workers need no defense. Social workers who "know little and care less about economic or political theory and practice" are canceled by the members of the Committee on Federal Action on Unemployment of the American Association of Social Workers, whose platform, accepting group responsibility for constructive action in the economic field, was printed in the Compass for May.

For Mrs. Guild's "social worker" who said, "Let the hunger marcher starve," one can cite a head worker in Chicago whose settlement is the accepted meeting place for protest groups of unemployed. The statement, "Publicly, social workers who know the facts say nothing, do nothing," raises the question: What about Jane Addams, Grace and Edith Abbott? They are still up and doing. And Graham Taylor, in his eighties, spent his entire lunch hour at a minimum-wage luncheon in Detroit getting the Illinoisians present to petition their legislature against a bill limiting freedom of opinion in their State.

Obviously it would be unfair to cite the saints and pioneers of social work as typical. But their followers need no apologist. Gathered in conference recently, some 3,000 strong, they met issues on every front from technocracy to food orders. William Hodson, president-elect of the conference, declared in the closing session: "None know better than social workers the misery of the old order. In Washington and their own localities they are bringing their knowledge and understanding to bear to change that order. If social work has courage, intelligence, willingness to work, it will lead. Let us provide such leadership."

It is not easy to strike the golden mean between the reality of here and now and the dreams which can be the reality of tomorrow. Those who find that mean are more telling performers than they who function exclusively in either realm. Returning to social work from some years in other fields, the writer finds that social workers follow that road in greater numbers than most groups.

Just one word in answer to the plaint that social work is a "stop-gap in the present crisis." It's lucky some people have their fingers in the dykes. Social workers are the shock troops who stood the first impact. They are the ones who trained the rookies from other professions who are now standing the gaff twelve to sixteen hours a day in public-welfare departments. Stop-gap? Amen and how!

Syracuse, N. Y., June 19

ELEONORE VON ELTZ

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Social workers have rarely attempted to maintain that social-work technique can "prevent most of the suffering with which they are concerned." Their efforts have centered rather on securing a better understanding of human beings and the pathological aspects of their social relationships. Prevention of suffering, for many social workers, is a goal to be reached with the help of this better understanding as it reaches farther into the community. There are the several limitations of function, scope, and method of social work that make it difficult for the social worker to go, professionally, to the roots of things. Social work will continue to be a mere stop-gap as long as its program continues to be financed by those who have profited most under the present economic set-up.

The depression has awakened an increasing number of social workers to the inadequacy of our accepted social concepts. Affected both as workers and as members of a profession by salary reductions and lowering of standards, their own hurts have led to a growing understanding of, and a concurrent dissatisfaction with, many of our present social patterns.

The old fear that organization for the protection of salaries and standards is unprofessional and undignified seems to be leaving us. The New York Association of Federation Workers, made up of employees of social agencies that comprise the Federation for the Support of Jewish Philanthropic Societies, has actively engaged in the protection of its members in their relations with their employers. The Social Workers Discussion Club has provided a forum for critical analysis of such basic social problems as those presented by the Negro, the danger of war, social insurance. Similar groups have been formed in other cities such as Philadelphia and Chicago.

There is still some hope for the social worker.

Brooklyn, N. Y., June 17

CHARLES FASTOV

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mrs. Guild's trenchant criticism of the failure of social workers to see our national disaster in its true perspective and to act accordingly is well taken, and few of us in the trade will quarrel with her on that score. She could have made her analysis more illuminating by relating the theory and practice of social work to dominant forces in American economic and political life, by showing how the mental-hygiene movement, for instance, and its profound influence upon social case-work (an American invention) and upon the social worker's concept of social pathology as a cumulative series of individual pathologies, how this atomistic view of social adjustment stems from the same sources whence have come the "rugged individualism" that has played so large a role in the development of our society. Still, she has performed a public service in stripping the veil from the illusion held by some that social workers are solving the depression.

In all fairness, however, it should be pointed out that not all social workers have cared little for economic or political theory, and that some have protested against the degrading and medieval nature of unemployment relief. Increasingly since 1929 the younger social worker has been achieving for herself an orientation in relation to her own job and to the larger social picture that is often at variance with that of the older generation. This new attitude has found expression in two ways. The younger worker, in New York especially, has come to regard herself not as a sacrosanct professional dealing in mysteries, nor as a lady bountiful, but as an employee doing a necessary job in our society. Under the pressure of salary cuts and lay-offs she has learned the wisdom of organization for protective purposes. Such a step, revolutionary in a calling linked so intimately with all that is nice and ladylike in the status quo, has aroused a sense of identification with other employee elements in our society, which in turn has led to a wider social horizon and to a sympathetic approach to the problems of our wage-earning classes. This brings me to the second expression of the thinking of the younger social worker: the rapid growth in New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, and Cleveland of social workers' discussion clubs, which have stimulated an interest in the basic social issues of the day—economic planning, federal relief, social insurance, the danger of war, and so on. In Chicago the Discussion Club helped obtain paid vacations for workers in public agencies. In New York the Discussion Club has protested against the inadequacy of home relief, come out for genuine unemployment insurance, and supported the national hunger march of last year.

It is true that these manifestations of revolt against a stale leadership are still relatively isolated and are not participated in by a majority of the profession. They give promise, however, of a social-work leadership of tomorrow which will play a more dynamic role in the reconstruction of our society.

New York, June 21

JACOB FISHER,

For the Association of Federation Workers

The Nation Wins Again

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Life magazine for June 16 mentions that your editorial in the May 7 issue entitled Class Justice was the worst of the year. I'll supplement that by saying it is the worst of a lifetime; and I am using my last cent to buy this card to tell you about it, too, and I don't know when I'll get another cent, either, as I am one of the (ragged) rugged individuals.

Rochester, N. Y., June 22

SAM S. SAMPSON

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HAROLD J. LASKI, author of "Democracy in Crisis" and other volumes, is professor of political science in London University.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, a New York lawyer, is author of "Let Freedom Ring."

AMOS PINCHOT is a New York lawyer and publicist.

KARL LANGER is the pseudonym of a German writer who frequently contributes to American and European journals.

WILLIAM MACDONALD contributes historical and political reviews to The Nation and other periodicals.

YOUNGHILL KANG, a Korean student of the literature and philosophy of the Orient, and a member of the Department of English of New York University, has written the story of his life in "The Grass Roof."

H. L. MENCKEN is the editor of the American Mercury.

MARK VAN DOREN, professor of English at Columbia University, is the editor of "The Oxford Book of American Prose."

HAakon CHEVALIER is the author of "The Ironical Temper: Anatole France and His Time."

WILLIAM GRUEN, formerly an instructor of philosophy in the City College of New York, contributes frequently to the Monist.

HARRY W. LAIDLER, a director of the League for Industrial Democracy, is the author of "Concentration of Control in American Industry."

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

Books and Films

Sir Arthur Plans Planning

The Framework of an Ordered Society. By Sir Arthur Salter. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

The National Industrial Recovery Act: An Analysis. By Benjamin S. Kirsh, in collaboration with Harold Roland Shapiro. New York: Central Book Company. $2.50.

RECENTLY the technocrats held a national conference which immediately blew into fragments, and there are now probably as many competing and mutually antagonistic American technocratic as communistic camps. But if the Social Planners were to hold a conference, would they fare any better? I suspect not. Most of them believe that conditions would improve immediately if "the government took a hand" in affairs, but Sir Arthur Salter is much more skeptical and guarded. He is opposed, it is true, to laissez faire, holding that under present conditions the automatic economic adjustments of the nineteenth century can no longer be made. He is opposed to "a communism which destroys both political and economic freedom, or a fascism which, at the expense of political liberty, leaves a limited freedom for capitalists," and he refuses to believe that these are the only alternatives before us. But he differs from some of his fellow Social Planners in several important respects. He does not blame all of our present evils on competition or laissez faire. He has too much knowledge of tariffs, of mistaken governmental monetary policies, and of happy ideas like the Stevenson rubber restriction scheme; and he is careful to remark that the task of the future is not merely that of controlling what was previously left free, but that of "replacing foolish and improvised control by wisely planned control." And Sir Arthur is not content to point to the governmental errors of the past; they cause him to be skeptical about governmental planning in the future. Indeed, he is convinced that such planning cannot be wisely made by democratic parliamentary government as at present organized. Such government cannot plan, it can merely improvise. "The present commercial policies of the world constitute a kind of bastard socialism, conceived not in the public interest but pressed upon harassed government by strong sectional organizations." Sir Arthur suggests that democratic government will not plan wisely unless parliaments are content to delegate an increasing amount of their powers—meeting, say, for only two or three months of the year and passing merely on major policies, leaving the details of regulation to the executive. The executive, in turn, must not only consult but heed expert opinion far more regularly than at present. And this planning itself must not so much seek to displace the competitive price system as to supplement it, leaving as large a scope as possible for political and economic freedom. There must be developed a sort of institutional self-discipline, directed by Economic Advisory Councils, resting as far as possible on voluntary cooperation.

It is interesting to turn to Mr. Kirsh's little book, which prints the text of the industrial-control provisions of the new National Industrial Recovery Act and analyzes them. The new law seems built almost to conform with Sir Arthur's specifications. It represents the delegation of large powers from the legislature to the executive. It attempts to secure voluntary cooperation. But still I imagine that Sir Arthur must have some very serious misgivings about it. As an internationalist, what must he think of those provisions of the law which authorize the President not merely to raise tariffs, but to impose quotas and embargoes against foreign goods? The tragedy of the Social Planner is that he never gets what he himself would plan.

HENRY HAZLITT

Eamonn de Valera

De Valera. By Denis Gwynn. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

MR. GWYNN'S book has the charm of good writing and the value of exceptional competence and thoroughness. It is modestly described as neither a criticism nor a defense of Eamonn de Valera, but rather as an attempt to discover from his record "the secret of his extraordinary personal ascendancy" and "the real object" of his economic, social, and political program. Yet it would be difficult for anyone to treat with entire impartiality the paradoxes and contradictions of de Valera's career, and while Mr. Gwynn does not fail, however confused the situation or violent the controversy, to present fully de Valera's side of the case, there are a good many things about de Valera's course for which he evidently has no sympathy and not a few for which he feels aversion.

Paradox and contradiction are written large across de Valera's life from the beginning, and they form the main thread of Mr. Gwynn's critical examination. They appear in his birth in New York of Irish and Spanish parents who gave him a name which is "a curious hybrid" of Spanish and French, in his American citizenship which later saved him from a death sentence in Ireland, his drift into the Irish revolutionary movement while he was an abstracted and queerly dressed professor of mathematics, his sudden rise to fame as the last of the Irish commanders to surrender after the Easter-week rising in 1916, the enhanced popularity that followed two long terms of imprisonment in England, his presidency of Sinn Féin, his bitter controversies with Irish leaders in Ireland and the United States, his baffling course in the treaty negotiations which made southern Ireland a Free State, and his fight for the retention of the land annuities and the development of Irish economic independence. His conduct in America "split the Irish-Americans into two camps," "irrevocably antagonized the two principal leaders," John Devoy and Judge Cohalan, and left his followers confused regarding the kind of independence for Ireland he desired; yet his popular reception was extraordinary, he raised, or helped largely to raise, millions of dollars for the Irish cause, and when he returned to Ireland, with guerrilla warfare in full swing and the terrorism of the Black and Tans at its height, the magnetism of his name was such that "there had been no feeling of resentment at his absence, no serious complaint that he had left all the dangerous and thankless work to others while he enjoyed the limelight and the applause of the United States."

Mr. Gwynn repeatedly alludes to de Valera's conviction that he was playing a "messianic role," and that it was through him, and him alone, that Irish Ireland was to be saved. No messiah could have led more vagariously or with less apparent likelihood of convincing his followers of his inspiration, but the idea serves rather better than any other to explain his self-assurance, his assumption of infallibility, his conflicts with the Dail, his quarrels with such leaders as Arthur Griffith and Michael Collins, his political use of the equivocal Erskine Childers, his devious course regarding the treaty and the oath of allegiance, his return to the Dail in 1927 as Opposition leader after five years' absence, his defeat of the Cosgrave Government in 1932, and the fantastic claims with which he supported his attack on the land annuities. Consistent only in his inconsistency, he has outplayed all his political opponents, and has shown what Mr. Gwynn, with studied reserve, calls "remarkable dexterity" by keeping within constitutional limits while "skilfully creating a situation which makes separation inevitable."

Whether or not de Valera can hold his place seems to Mr. Gwynn at least an open question. The new industrial program, "to those who are accustomed to modern conditions," seems "fantastic to the verge of insanity," and "the results of reckless finance and of the deliberate wrecking of Anglo-Irish trade have so far only begun to be felt." A new Fenianism is active, and the Catholic bishops "have shown unmistakable signs of alarm" at the prospect of communism. The Irish republican army "is today incomparably more formidable than it was in 1916." Meantime de Valera, mysterious as ever, is in command. There is no book comparable to this as an explanation of what he is like or how he has come to be what he is.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Pearl Buck's Mission

The First Wife and Other Stories. By Pearl S. Buck. The John Day Company. $2.50.

EVERYTHING that Pearl S. Buck has written I have been forced to read whether I liked it or not. This is because of her large public and because the particular section of the world she writes about is where I came from. In some of my criticisms of her work I have been led into an interesting debate: Is Mrs. Buck describing the Chinese mind or merely her own impression of the Chinese mind? I have not changed my previous views. While I do not admire her work as I do the work of the ancient Chinese painters, who so painted a cat that the observer must feel himself to be a cat, I do admire her Western personality more than ever. She is consistently an able and deep-natured Western woman.

These fourteen short stories are divided into three sections: Old and New, Revolution, and Flood. All deal realistically with events which take place in contemporary China. The common theme is that of the transition from the old ideas to the new. The title is from the long short-story—the most moving one included here—called The First Wife. It deals with the return of the young Chinese husband and father who has received an American education. On going back he finds the young wife, who for seven years has taken care of his mother and father, his son and his daughter, impossible; and when he tries to help her to educate herself to meet his requirements she fails him. The tragedy is between these two, the wife who represents tradition, home, and parents, and the returned son from the West who wants a wife who is able to understand his views. The new wins over the old.

She rose and drew open a drawer in the table, and from it she took out a silk girdle that she wore customarily with her holiday garments. It was of soft white silk, very strong and soft. She climbed upon the massive bed, and with steady hands she tied one end of the girdle about her throat and she reached and tied the other end around the beam that ran just above the bed. From the middle room she heard her son's voice crying merrily, "And shall I ride in an airplane, too?"

This theme is again repeated in The Old Mother, where now the mother is not able to get on with her returned son and his Western-educated wife. Again the conflict is brought to an unfortunate end. The finish is her quavering remark, "Well, I can die—at any rate, I can die! I can hang myself."

The Frill deals with a Chinese tailor who makes dresses for the postmaster's wife from America, who tells him: "You must make yourself tailor—no give small boy makee—spoil." She directs her servant to see that he does not steal anything on the way out. The contrast here is between the self-complacent Western woman and her sense of superiority over the tailor whom she compels to work all night long, so that he may earn the money from her to bury his dead relative. The Rainy Day is a skilful and compact sketch describing Teh-tsen, who after his education in America finds it hard to adjust himself to life in his own country. Western individualism develops in him so much that he can no longer accept traditional Chinese life. Discouraged, he gives up all hopes and dreams of doing anything.

The second group of stories begins with Wang Lung, named for the character who later becomes the chief character in "The Good Earth." The book concludes with a final group of four sketches dealing with flood and famine on the Yangtze River. They are the most realistic in the book, and make a direct appeal for sympathy which no reader can fail to be moved by. Indeed, they were actually written to obtain funds for relief.

Mrs. Buck herself is reported as having said that she has no sense of a mission in her writing. In this I am sure she meant to speak sincerely. But unconsciously, and in a way fortunately, she sees hope for China only in its giving up the old way and in acquiring that of Christianity. But this attitude prevents her from seeing the old way as it really was. Miss Nora Waln, for example, has come far closer to the real Chinese mind and ways. Whether Mrs. Buck admits it to herself or not, she has fulfilled a mission in her writings, which must invariably move Western readers to thank God for Christ and his teachings. I do not mean to criticize her for this, only to congratulate her for her courage and her pattern, which would have been deeply considered by any thinking Oriental a generation ago.

YOUNGHILL KANG

These Here States

My American Friends. By L. P. Jacks. The Macmillan Company. $2.

DR. JACKS, who is the editor of the Hibbert Journal, has traveled in the United States a great deal more than most Americans. He came first in 1886, to find out what he could learn at Harvard, and there he met and plucked wisdom from Charles Eliot Norton, William James, Josiah Royce, John Fiske, and Francis G. Peabody. He came again in 1909, and again in 1910, 1912, and 1913. The war intervening, he did not make his next trip until 1924, but since then he has been among us three more times, and on his last trip, in 1931-32, he remained nine months, and visited forty-two States. A map of this journey is printed at the end of his book. The thin red line which shows his route runs from Hollywood to Palm Beach in the South and from Boston to Tacoma in the North. He missed Reno, but he saw the Grand Canyon, and appears to have had seances with the Mormons of both Salt Lake City and Long Island.

I wish I could say, as one theologian rooting for another, that Dr. Jacks has composed what all the bright young boys and gals are now calling an "exciting" book, but alas the massive and impenetrable facts stand in the way. It is, in truth, a somewhat narcotic volume, and I had not got much beyond the first chapter before I began to regret having contracted to review it. What ails it, fundamentally, is simply the rev. and learned author's heroic determination to be amiable. He refuses absolutely to say anything likely to upset his American friends, and as a result he comes perilously close to saying nothing at all. The same Christian Science smile radiates from him from end to end. Only once, so far as I can recall, does he let it freeze off, and then it is to protest against the inscription on a monument at Pittsburgh, which seems to him to make it insufficiently plain that "in 1756 there was no distinction between the 'British' and 'Americans' as separate nations." But by this time, I suppose, Andy Mellon's camerlingo has given the appropriate orders, and the inscription has been changed.

DO NOT CUT, TEAR OR DEFACE
BOOKS OR MAGAZINES.

Dr. Jacks even goes to the length of arguing, quite seriously and at some length, that the excessive standardization visible in the United States is a good thing, and will have gorgeous effects upon human progress hereafter. Unfortunately, his reasoning here is not quite as clear as it might be. First he maintains that "standardization is a condition absolutely essential to all forms of human originality," and that our apparent excess of it gives us "a somewhat broader basis" than other nations have for "the coming of surpassing splendors in the way of originality and creativeness," and then, on the same page, he hastens to add that this excess really "amounts to very little"—in fact, to no more, relatively, than the bulk of "a pea deposited on the summit of Mount Everest." Here, obviously, one may either take it or leave it. As for me, I find myself constrained to leave it.

H. L. MENCKEN

Beyond Shakespeare

The Christian Renaissance. With Interpretations of Dante, Shakespeare, and Goethe, and a Note on T. S. Eliot. By G. Wilson Knight. Canada: The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

MR. KNIGHT, who in four tumultuous volumes—"Myth and Miracle," "The Wheel of Fire," "The Imperial Theme," and "The Shakespearian Tempest"—has plunged through the sea of Shakespeare's imagery and held up as he swam full many an important catch, now reaches the other shore with naked symbols in his hand. For in this new book he goes beyond Shakespeare, who, though he is great enough to include Dante and Goethe, is not really great enough for Mr. Knight. He goes headlong on, in short, to the only poem which is perfect—the New Testament.

"It has, of course, been evident," says Mr. Knight, "that my interpretations of Shakespeare must, sooner or later, necessarily have something to say about Christianity." I must confess it was not evident to me. I read every new volume of those interpretations with the greatest attention and respect, and never once did I discover that I was being led along a path at the end of which the New Testament would appear "to be the most consummate vision of any." I had been simple enough to suppose that Mr. Knight's books about Shakespeare had been about Shakespeare. Now, of course, it is clear that they were not—at least in Mr. Knight's own mind. I still believe them to contain some of the most brilliant and illuminating remarks ever made about the poetry of the plays. But I can see also that they were leading up to the burst of prophecy which is the present book.

For Mr. Knight now makes it plain that he is concerned not so much with poetry as with Life, to which he thinks it gives the key. He has been interested less in the symbols of Shakespeare than in the truth to which he is able to make them refer. Such a man is bound to come, and Mr. Knight very swiftly it seems to me has come, to a point where symbols are sufficient things. Poetry, where he first found them, now strikes him as something mixed—the flesh adheres to the spirit, the "meaning" is obscure. Better for him, if not for us, the pure meaning, the naked symbol. Thus it is that he can say of the Gospels: "Not only is this book poetic: it holds all possible poetry potential in its pages." He prefers, that is to say, poetry which is possible to poetry which is actual—the New Testament, for instance, to Shakespeare. There is only one more step to take, and at the rate Mr. Knight is going I have no doubt that he will take it in his next book. He will announce an exclusive allegiance to that poetry which cannot be written at all. He will praise the in-effable, the impossible. He will say in four hundred excellent pages: Henceforth let there be Silence.

I shall not follow him there, nor do I here, where I see him in the process of detaching himself from the flesh and blood of poetry. The process, indeed, began as early as "The Imperial Theme," where his obsession with symbols led him to overpraise "Timon of Athens" because its key had been left in the lock, and where his praise of "Antony and Cleopatra" was determined not so much by the merits which anyone else may see in the work as by the fact that its "meaning" fitted attractively into his system. The process for that matter went on in "The Shakespearian Tempest," where Mr. Knight was prone to find perfection in Shakespeare's last plays because their mythological personages are such clear projections of a theme. They are clear, certainly; but they are not one-tenth as interesting on the level of poetry—of written poetry—as the divine beings who live unseen in Hamlet and the other tragic heroes, and whose existence, probably, Shakespeare did not suspect.

Now in his new book Mr. Knight is capable of calling the New Testament a greater tragedy than any of Shakespeare's because its hero, Jesus, is perfect. It is a greater tragedy because it must have been written by a greater man—one who was still greater than this hero. Who wrote it? The answer, I suppose, is implicit in the following sentences: "Jesus's life distills the very quintessence of human reality: his story presents an absolute, finished, and complete life in perfect harmony with a sublime ethic; that is, with the innermost principle of life itself." The author, then, was Life.

Mr. Knight may be inspired throughout, and the prophecy which he finally makes of a great age of poetry now about to appear may be all very well. But one who prefers poetry that is written by men—men in their prime, to whom life presents itself in the lower case—may be pardoned for a certain feeling of bewilderment. I for one do not see poetry and religion blending at the present moment to produce the most perfect literature man has ever been privileged to read. Nor do I look with much pleasure toward that not far distant hour when, Mr. Knight assures us, "both religion and poetry, as practiced and understood today, will pass. They will pass, when the time is ripe, to bring to birth a greater thing than either, a new Life, splendorously paling those twin candles that have stood before its altar."

MARK VAN DOREN

For Unsophisticated Unbelievers

A Calendar of Saints for Unbelievers. By Glenway Wescott. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS book is likely to inspire in the gentle and cultivated reader a certain uneasiness. He will be puzzled as to why Mr. Wescott should have written it and why anyone should want to read it. It is a neat and charming volume containing a wealth of material delicately presented, and for the reader unfamiliar with saintly lore it will no doubt have an appeal. But as he reads on through pages and pages of these thumb-nail sketches of human types of all kinds who, for good reasons and bad, have been sanctified by the Catholic church, he will find the author's point of view even more elusive than it is in the smirking foreword, which reads like William Bolitho at his worst. If this reader, though unbelieving, has had some intimate acquaintance with saints in his early years; if he has spent long hours over the magic "Legenda Aurea" as piously compiled by Jacobus de Voragine, and delved at odd moments into the hagiographers of different centuries; if he has delighted in the masterly works of Louis Menard and Maspero and felt a certain jarring dissonance in the portrayal of saints by even such scrupulous artists as Renan and Anatole France, he will lay Mr. Wescott's book aside as a faux-genre of the most pronounced type.

It is not that Mr. Wescott is not entitled to treat this subject, piously or otherwise. It is merely that he has nothing whatever to contribute to it. So much has been done in this field, so many great spirits have devoted a lifetime of labor to it, that an angel would, indeed, fear to tread there today. One can at least take off one's hat to this American youngster's pluck.

HAAKON M. CHEVALIER

Science and Reality

The New Background of Science. By Sir James Jeans. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

INSTEAD of disclosing the new backgrounds of science this book exhibits the new science against the background of an old philosophy. The dilemmas in which the author finds himself are the inevitable consequences of this incongruous setting.

Modern physics is here depicted as a quest for an ultimate, undefined reality. The objects of science—protons, electrons, and photons—are supposed to be somehow nearer to this reality than the objects of daily experience. This fundamental fallacy rests on the implicit presupposition that the more pervasive aspects of things are more real than their individual traits. In this connection it is significant that the chapter on The Methods of Science is the most inadequate part of the book. A closer study of scientific method would have shown that the concepts of science are not disclosures of a basic reality but logical constructs designed to express metrical relations in the qualitative continuum of experience.

Scientific method involves a reconstruction or modification of its subject matter. Such modifications are an essential feature of experimental science, for an experiment is measurement through modification and selective control, and the laws of science are valid only in terms of such selection and transformation. It is only through the spurious identification of objective reality with what is unalterable and permanent that these selective modifications of science can be regarded as evidence of the subjectivity of scientific laws. It is this singular misunderstanding of scientific method that leads Jeans to write that "we can still only explore nature by stamping it with our own footprints and raising clouds of dust, so that our present pictures of nature show our human stamp over it all. In time we shall perhaps learn how to remove our own footprints from the picture, and shall then see that nature has a real existence, as much outside ourselves and independent of ourselves as the Sahara." One is reminded of Kant's satirical answer to this last naive hope: "The light dove, piercing in her easy flight the air and perceiving its resistance, imagines that flight would be easier in empty space."

Atomic physics has shown that both matter and radiation may be regarded alternatively as atomic or wavelike, and that in adopting the one or the other of these theories we must sacrifice either the determinacy of physical events or their characterization by spatial and temporal coordinates. Since recent experiments have confirmed the predictions of the wave theory of matter, the latter "begins to appear as the true picture of reality." In consequence we must abandon the physical descriptions of phenomena in space and time and we are left only the mathematical laws of wave mechanics. This situation leads Jeans to conclude that either "our supposed laws of nature become a mere specification of our own mental processes, telling us little or possibly nothing about nature, but certainly something about ourselves," or "reality must have something of a mental nature about it."

This, of course, is a necessarily crude summary and it must be said that the author is not entirely unaware of the serious philosophical difficulties involved in his position. Nevertheless, he adheres firmly to the traditional metaphysical and epistemological theories which led him to these conclusions. One of the major defects of these theories is that they rest on a separation of knowledge from the method of acquiring it. By ignoring the operational origin and instrumental function of scientific laws it is possible for Jeans to apply to them a criterion of existential reality which they were never meant to satisfy.

That the objects of science have no simple location in space and time does not mean that reality is mental. It means that science, that is, knowledge, is mental. Jeans's own exposition of modern physics shows that the concepts of science cannot be regarded as representations of "reality," because scientific concepts are not pictures of nature. It need not surprise us, therefore, that electrons and photons as expressed in the laws of physics do not bear the substantial, qualitative aspect to which we are accustomed in the objects of daily experience. These laws are not representations of things in themselves. They express determinate relations in events. Their function is not—as Jeans supposes—to tear the veil of phenomena from the "real" substratum of nature. Their function in science and technology is rather to disclose some order and connection between events and to endow the arts with intelligent foresight and some measure of control.

WILLIAM GRUEN

The Mountain of Debt

The Internal Debts of the United States. Edited by Evans Clark, assisted by George B. Galloway. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

THE technocrats as a school are no longer good copy. But many challenges they have issued have still to be met. One of these challenges is how we as a nation can grapple with our mounting private and public debt. These debts, declared Howard Scott and company, cannot and will not be paid. They amount to the colossal sum of over $200,000,000,000 and, if amortized at a fair rate of interest, would absorb a considerable part of the national income.

The contentions of the technocrats have been heatedly attacked and just as heatedly defended, but few of their critics or defenders have added to the sum total of human knowledge on this important subject. In the meantime tens of thousands of men and women who know nothing about the technocratic school—owners of mortgaged homes in city and country and debtors in other fields—have been staggering under an almost insupportable burden of indebtedness.

A few months ago Evans Clark, as director of the Twentieth Century Fund, selected a group of experts in specified fields to assist him in mobilizing all the readily available information on the internal debt structure of these United States. Dr. John Bauer was asked to estimate our public utility debts; Gardiner C. Means, to compile the debts of industrial corporations and banks; while representatives of various competent research bureaus and their advisers were asked to investigate other phases of the debt problem. Evans Clark and George S. Galloway undertook to weave the story into a unified whole. The result is a book of great timeliness and importance, thoroughly readable, admirably summarized, graphically illustrated with charts and statistical tables and replete with factual material regarding economic trends and well-considered suggestions for future action.

The sum total of all long-term debts now outstanding, according to the contributors to this volume, is approximately $134,000,000,000 and of short-term obligations, $103,000,000,- 000. Statistics are available for $126,800,000,000 of the long-term indebtedness from pre-war days to the present. About one-fourth (26 per cent) of these debts are governmental; the remainder, private. Of the $33,000,000,000 in government debts, $14,000,000,000 are federal obligations, $19,000,000,000 those of State and local units. Of the private debts, farm-mortgage loans—contrary to popular imagination—amount to only 7 per cent of the nation's long-term debts, less than $9,000,000,000 out of $126,800,000,000. Public-utility and industrial debt total about $10,000,000,000 each; railroad debt, about $14,000,000,000; of financial institutions, $22,000,000,000; while loans on mortgaged real estate constitute the largest single item, around $27,000,000,000.

The most striking fact about these debts today, compared with previous years, is their enormous growth. The grand estimated total of $134,000,000,000 represents an increase of $96,000,000,000 from the pre-war figures, which were $38,000,000,000 for the same categories of long-term debt. Of this increase, $37,000,000,000 came before the post-war depression (1921-22), $51,000,000,000 more came between 1921-22 and 1929, and $8,000,000,000 developed during the current depression . . . So that, for every $1.00 of debts we carried before the war we carry $3.53 today.

During this period considerable changes have taken place in the relative importance of the various types of debt. The federal debt, for instance, was relatively unimportant during the pre-war days, representing only about 2 per cent of the total. Now it amounts to 11 per cent. Urban mortgage debt has advanced from 14 to 22 per cent. Railroad debt, on the other hand, has declined from 31 to 11 per cent. "The rapid growth of urban mortgages from $5,000,000,000 to over $27,000,000,000 and of federal obligations from less than $1,000,000,000 to $14,000,000,000 are the most striking changes. The debts of financial institutions also showed a marked growth—443 per cent."

These totals of our debt burden, however, mean very little in and by themselves. They must be related to the national wealth and the national income to gather significance. So related, we find that, before the war, our long term indebtedness was about 20 per cent of our national wealth and 6 per cent of the national income; today it amounts to about 45 per cent of our wealth and 20 per cent of our income! We are thus over twice as heavily in debt in relation to our national wealth as we were before the World War, and over three times as heavily in debt in relation to our national income.

During the war, the great increase in our debt structure occurred, in the nature of the case, in government expenditures for military purposes. In the boom days of 1921-1929, the 'new era' of economic madness, on the other hand, we liquidated about $4,000,000,000 of federal long-term obligations, but took on $55,000,000,000 in other fields, an increase of 93 per cent. "Even if we assume that the debt policies of pre-war years were sound—an assumption which some would challenge," declares Mr. Clark—"our performance in the post-war boom was almost beyond belief."

Some parts of our industrial structure are more debt-ridden in comparison to their capacity to pay than are others. In some cases, as among many of the farms in the Middle West, among our city mortgagors and among our railroads, the burden is particularly great. In 1932, bankruptcy sales, foreclosures, and tax sales accounted for more than half the transfers of farm land.

As a means of attacking the debt evil, the authors, in the first place, propose measures of temporary relief. Interest rates, where necessary, should be reduced. A moratorium on interest and principal charges should in case of need be resorted to. Maturing obligations should be refunded, foreclosures proceedings started only as a last resort. In the second place, the authors urge measures which will help to break the business depression. Toward this end the government, they believe, should expand the volume of money and construct public works. Finally, steps should be taken toward permanent economic stability. The volume of loans and investments should be controlled through government regulation of the private banking system or, if this proves to be impracticable, through government-owned banks. "Undoubtedly banking is the most important single public utility in our economy. If in private hands it cannot operate to serve the public interest, its nationalization seems imperative." This should be followed by the creation of boards to investigate how best to control the flow of capital to our industries. As for our future debts, the authors believe that they should be limited in relation to the size of the assets against which they are issued and in relation to the probable life of these assets. A clause might be inserted in future contracts, furthermore, permitting the automatic scaling down of interest rates and amortization requirements in times of severe economic depression. Finally, bankruptcy laws should be entirely revised.

On these proposals, however, there is no unanimity among the authors. Wilfred Eldred objects to the policy of inflation, while Dr. John Bauer has little faith in the ability of the government to compel private industry to plan. He urges a permanent plan for public works, public ownership of banks, and full employment at socially useful work, with constantly higher standards of living. Despite the constructive suggestions of the authors of this volume, the pyramiding of debts, so noted in the past, is likely to continue as long as our industrial structure is run for private profit. While the remedies proposed for the present debt situation, however, may be criticized as inadequate, the value of the volume does not depend on the validity of these proposals or on the authors' social interpretations. It depends, rather, on the mass of important data which has been so competently compiled and published—despite the many gaps in the underlying statistics—at a time when this problem is of such vital importance to great masses of our population.

HARRY W. LAIDLER

Shorter Notices

Foreign Investments in China. By C. F. Remer. The Macmillan Company. $5.

As a source book this sober and well-constructed work is certain to prove of great value to students of the Chinese problem. It takes rank with such eminent studies as those of W. W. Willoughby ("Foreign Rights and Interests in China") and J. B. Condliffe ("China Today: Economic"). While Dr. Remer has of necessity included a great deal of material that is familiar, he has also brought in many facts and statistics that are new or at least have been given no general attention as a part of the economic problem of China. The author takes pride in his statement of China's balance of international payments. Of course, several other scholars have undertaken to strike such a balance and have accomplished the task with no less success. Yet we are indebted to Dr. Remer for presenting his findings clearly and intelligently, and for bringing the balance of payments down to the year 1930. Without such studies it would be difficult to gauge the international economic position of the country. Dr. Remer naturally devotes considerable space to American, British, Japanese, and Russian investments. His treatment of Japanese and Russian interests is especially good. When we come to the author's conclusions, however, we are inclined to hesitate. It seems difficult to separate the imperialistic exploitation of a country like China from the political implications of such exploitation, and it is rather hard to understand how China's economic position can be examined as a whole without paying more attention to its natural resources (of lack of resources). Dr. Remer has not entirely ignored these factors, but he would have been better advised had he gone into them more fully.

New Road. By Merle Colby. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Tracing the life cycle of a small pioneer settlement in the Ohio wilderness of 1820 from its earliest beginnings as the home of a few lonely squatters, through its rapid maturing into a full-fledged American town, Merle Colby has written an absorbing novel, and one that is fictionized history in the best sense. Melodrama and coincidence play a conspicuous part in shaping the destinies of the town of Toward; but it is melodrama put to a legitimate use: to epitomize the play of conflicting forces, to point and accentuate the complexities of history in the making. One could wish that "New Road," as a supplement to the usual textbooks on American history, with their abstractions and platitudes, could be made compulsory reading throughout the country, so vividly and honestly does it portray a major phase of American development.

Appius and Virginia. By G. E. Trevelyan. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Miss Trevelyan's original fantasy of the staid maiden lady who adopted a baby ape for her son and trained him in the gentle art of being a perfect Victorian child demonstrates again, as "Alice in Wonderland" did, that the reverse side of Victorian smugness was rich in the possibilities of intellectual comedy. "Appius and Virginia" is a jeu d'esprit, a take-off on the Victorian belief that every soul, however brutish, might be admitted to the grace of good breeding—an article of faith that has a certain grandeur and pathos about it. Parts of the story—where Appius learns to say his prayers and eat in a mannerly fashion—strongly recall the writings of the good Dr. Tuke, an early advocate of the polite treatment of lunatics, whose tome reads like the purest Lewis Carroll. Another Victorian preoccupation, heredity versus environment, is slyly satirized in the course of the ape-child's education; in the bewildered musings of Appius concerning his own status—whether ape is man or man is ape—the fundamentalist and Darwinian will find much matter for reflection.

Phyloanalysis. By William Galt. With a Preface by Trigant Burrow. The Baker and Taylor Company. $1.

Phyloanalysis describes certain analytic researches into the underlying emotional and physiological status of man as a race or phylum; hence the name. There are, in the emotional life of man, "distortions which in their individual expression take the form of neurosis and crime and which are represented in the community in such manifestations as war and other social catastrophes." The behavior of individuals, communities, and nations is characterized by these generally unrecognized neurotic reactions. Mr. Galt gives a detailed explanation of the phyletic significance of attention, and shows how much of present-day confusion is due to a disorder of this function. The attention of each of us is at every moment deflected from the matter in hand to ulterior considerations of how our comportment is impressing others, whether we are gaining or losing, and similar inhibitory, constrictive considerations. This attitude is inculcated in us as children by the community; the "lag of attention" obtains throughout the whole race; and we think in terms of "social images" or racially accepted fallacies. The laboratory investigations described were initiated by Dr. Trigant Burrow. The transcriptions from actual group meetings are interesting, and the completely unorthodox finding that the "transference" is a social manifestation essentially obstructive in character is in striking contrast to the current psychological theories.

The Science of Human Reproduction. By H. M. Parshley. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

The most amazing thing about this book is perhaps the simple fact that it has been published at all, especially as it is intended for popular distribution. Only the more recent technical books on contraception equal it in accuracy and detail. Dr. Parshley develops his subject from general zoological and cytological considerations, through a detailed, straightforward account of the anatomy and physiology of human reproduction, to a final briefer discussion of population, eugenics, and sex behavior. Illustrations are profuse and adequate. This book is an assuring indication that we are getting away from the era when model animal and human figures for classroom study were made without sex organs. It emphasizes that sex is as fundamental a problem of biology as are "nerve irritability" or "muscular contractility"—subjects which occupy many more pages in textbooks. College students should be quizzed on the contents of this book before they are given their degrees.

Films

The Eisenstein Muddle

NOTHING quite like the current dispute over the forthcoming version of Eisenstein's "Que Viva Mexico" has ever before happened in the Hollywood screen world. Not only does it involve one of the greatest directors and one of the most widely read social propagandists in the world, but its implications, which are both ethical and aesthetic, are of the greatest importance in relation to the more serious consideration of the cinema as a fine art. From the beginning, of course, the Eisenstein film has been surrounded by a great deal of turbulence and mystery. One had heard of the Soviet director's repudiation by Hollywood, which seemed a sufficient scandal in itself, and of his sudden retreat into Mexico to make a vast "film-symphony" of that country's cultural and economic development from primitive times to the present. Then from across the Rio Grande border drifted confused reports of misunderstandings and disagreements with his financial backers; his return to Russia was attended by all sorts of complications, legal and other; and for a time it seemed as if the film he had left behind in California was destined never to receive a public showing. References to Eisenstein's "Mexican film" and solicitous inquiries as to its fate became so frequent as to build up around it much of the atmosphere of a myth, and as with so many other myths one ended by growing very tired of hearing about it. In fact, there was probably enough skepticism present in the New York Film Forum members to save them from being too much disappointed when the picture failed to be shown, although it had been promised, during last season. The reason for the Forum's failure to carry out its promise, however, becomes apparent in the light of the final development of the film's stormy history. Like so many of its other stages, the present stage consists of a violent interchange of arguments, this time between Upton Sinclair, as spokesman for the film's backers, and Seymour Stern, editor of Experimental Cinema, head of a group that is stirred to action by the imminent appearance of what they hold to be a shameful "desecration" of a great work of art.

So far Mr. Sinclair has not had an adequate opportunity of stating his side of the case, and it will probably turn out that he has had grievances enough and that he will be able to offer some better justification than that he was determined by purely practical considerations. In the meantime, there is only the overwhelming fact that he has turned over the celluloid rolls in his possession to commercial interests in Hollywood, who have had them cut by professional studio cutters without Eisenstein's supervision. The result, soon to be viewed under the title "Thunder Over Mexico," is the picture which the Experimental Cinema group characterizes as an "unmitigated mockery" of Eisenstein's original intention. According to the latter's manifesto, the commercial version uses only 7,000 of the 200,000 feet of film taken by Eisenstein during his stay in Mexico. Moreover, "The original meaning of the film has been perverted by a reduction of the whole to a single unconnected romantic story." Others who have seen both the original and the fragment point out certain grotesque effects resulting from the attempt to reconcile the Soviet director's already oversimplified pattern with the conventional American pattern that is superimposed upon it. It is similarly noted that what little of the celebrated Eisenstein camera symbolism is retained appears totally disjointed and meaningless. All in all, from the descriptions that have so far been offered, "Thunder Over Mexico" promises to be one of the most astonishing films ever presented to the public.

To consider the matter first from its ethical aspect, one must take some account of the report that Mr. Sinclair and the other backers made every effort to persuade the Soviet authorities to permit Eisenstein to cut the picture himself, either here or in Russia. Failing to make an arrangement that would also guarantee their own property rights, it is argued, they were faced with the alternative of accepting a complete loss of their money or of turning the rolls over to a commercial distributor. What is not perfectly clear is whether Mr. Sinclair and his friends regarded the money handed over to Eisenstein as a gratuitous loan or a formal investment. If they regarded it as the latter, the dispute serves to revive the old question whether it is ever legitimate or possible to invest in anything so unpredictable as a work of art, and also the related question whether the work, in such a case, is the property of the artist or the investor. Certainly, if Mr. Sinclair had chosen to put his misfortune down to misguided philanthropy or mere bad luck, he would have spared himself the grave disapproval of a number of people interested in art and the motion-picture art in particular.

And this suggests how closely the ethical and the aesthetic are interrelated in the case. The real seriousness of "cutting" the work of a director, whose whole technique and reputation rest on an elaborately worked-out theory of montage, can only be understood if one imagines a magazine editor who would dare rearrange the episodes in a story or the images in a poem. By the wrong sort of cutting a novel by Proust or Mann could be made into something completely opposed to either author's intention. A slight change of syntax would render almost any poem by T. S. Eliot (who happens to resemble Eisenstein in a cultivation of the synoptic) altogether banal. The episodes or images, individually considered, would be the same, but the articulation of them into a deliberately conceived pattern would be destroyed. In an Eisenstein film, the montage supplies the syntax, the larger structural rhythm (as distinguished from the incidental rhythms of movement, which are, however, usually identified with it), and because this element is always the most intimately personal in any work of art, to interfere with it is to disturb what is the most inviolable property of any artist—his style. "In the cinema," writes the Russian critic, Serebriakoff, "the montage is a means of expression, one of the elements of style." In Eisenstein's case, it would be possible to go even further and say that it is the irreducible element of his style. What the current dispute has brought out more clearly than anything else, therefore, is a recognition on the part of a number of people of the importance of cutting or montage in a film. It has helped a few, but apparently not all, to distinguish between the motion picture as a pile of celluloid and as a work of art. The indignation that it has excited is a good sign, because it constitutes another assertion of the cinema's right to be considered as a fine art.

WILLIAM TROY

OPEN SHELF

TUGWELL

INDUSTRIAL DISCIPLINE

$2.50. Best-seller. 3rd printing and also

INDUSTRY'S COMING OF AGE

$2.00. All bookstores. Columbia

Henry

Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men. —sent free.

None may sell himself

educated in social thought (says

Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.

ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
Park Place, New York City

SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

CURIOUS BOOKS

Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed Unexpurgated Items Exotically Illustrated Limited Editions

THE FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. N, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York

SHARE COTTAGE

COLLEGE woman will share her country cottage, swimming, commuting, artist group. Peggy Bridge, New City, New York.

NEWS REEL

SHISTORY IN THE MAKING! H

World-wide Panorama of Events. Personalities in the Public Eye. News of Timely Significance. Reported in sound—pictures—talk. Change of Program Every Saturday.

Continuous 10 a.m. to Midnight
25c ADMISSION AT ALL TIMES
EMBASSY NEWS REEL THEATRE
1560 Broadway bet. 46th and 47th Streets

SUMMER

FOR RENT

GREENWOOD LAKE, N. Y., Gross Farm, 11 rooms, all improvements, private swimming pool, lake privilege, fishing, tennis. Very modern rental. Tel. Greenwood Lake 81.

IN BERMUDA. Furnished cottage, 3 rooms and bath. Ideal location, near sea, at $25.00 monthly, for July, Aug. Sept. Oct. Box 197, care of The Nation.

SUBLET APARTMENTS

231 EAST 48th ST. Cool, attractively furnished seven room apartment overlooking Turtle Bay Gardens. Three master bedrooms, piano, books. Electric refrigeration. Low rental for Summer. Tel. daytime COrtlandt 7-3330.

EAST 22nd STREET, New York City. Modern furnished studio apartment, large north-light room, dressing room, tile bath, complete kitchenette, modern building, for rent July 15 to August 15 or September 1. $55 a month. Telephone STuyvesant 9-2529 between 9 and 10 a.m.

POSITIONS WANTED

FAMILY IN WANT. One daughter, 22, and another thru 1st year college, can do office work; and Mother willing to care for home in country with 8 year old daughter. Box 199, c/o The Nation.

Real Estate Ads

—If you have a house, or property to sell, or lease, try THE NATION classified advertising section.

—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

THE NATION

20 Vesey St. New York City
Phone COrtlandt 7-3330

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 26, 1933

No. 3551

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	85
EDITORIALS:
Civil Service—or Pretense?	88
The Steel Code	89
Meeting the Nazi Threat	89
Thespis on Vacation	91
ISSUES AND MEN. THE ROOSEVELT REVOLUTION. By Oswald Garrison Villard	91
CARTOON. "BUSINESS IS PICKING UP." By William Gropper	92
EATING WITHOUT WORKING. A MORAL DISQUISITION. By Stuart Chase	93
CAN CURRENCIES BE MANAGED? By Henry Hazlitt	94
HOW TO REDUCE YOUR LIGHT BILLS. By Judson King	97
CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S NAZI NEIGHBORS. By Egon Erwin Kisch	99
THE MEMORY OF MUSIC. By Irwin Edman	100
MORE RELIEF FOR THE FARMERS. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	101
I DON'T BELIEVE IN DEMOCRACY. By Robert Herrick	103
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	104
CORRESPONDENCE	104
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Iberian Coast. By George Dillon	107
Whittier. By Horace Gregory	107
Twelve Hundred Pages Long. By Dorothy Van Doren	108
Sections—or Classes? By Louis M. Hacker	108
Bundles of Fragments. By William Troy	110
A Revolutionist's Field-Book. By Alter Brody	111
Films: Documentary Films. By William Troy	111
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	112

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING FRED A. KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S farm-relief program is getting under way. On August 1 a federal tax of 4.2 cents a pound will be put on the processing of cotton. The proceeds, expected to reach about $210,000,000, will be turned over to those cotton growers who have been obliging enough to destroy about a fourth of their crop. Thus we are asking consumers to pay a sales tax of approximately 35 per cent on a necessary commodity in return for reduced acreage, though we are yet to learn whether or not the remaining acreage will be more intensively cultivated. This faith that prosperity can be achieved through destruction rests on the belief that what is troubling not merely cotton but other leading agricultural commodities is an excess of supply rather than any disorganization and falling away of normal demand. Normally we depend on the outside world to buy more than one-half of our cotton crop, but under the policy of "intranationalism" we are not particularly concerned about losing this market. The experiment begins under the most favorable circumstances. Since March, cotton has already approximately doubled in price even without any processing tax. It will be interesting to watch both the immediate and the longer effects of the plan. When the British adopted the Stevenson rubber restriction scheme, it seemed to be working at first in the interest of the producers. Rubber rose violently in price. But the violent rise encouraged the Dutch, who were not included in the scheme, to increase their output. The result was that the British share of the world market was left on a permanently lower level. "It seems incredible, in retrospect," writes Sir Arthur Salter, commenting on the Stevenson plan, "that any government could have employed official action to enforce a restriction scheme of which the ultimate effect was bound to be merely to profit the Dutch competitor." Let us not forget that our Southern States are not the only territory in the world where cotton can be profitably raised.

THE WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE is scheduled to recess on July 27; meanwhile it becomes a more and more pathetic spectacle. The American delegation, in particular, seems bent upon making itself seem increasingly silly. Senator Pittman, the one-ideaed representative of the silver interests, seems on the verge of abandoning his campaign to compel all nations to adopt a higher silver content in their subsidiary coinage—such a move would be clearly wasteful—and may consent to accept instead a promise by these nations not to "debase" their silver coinage any further. How even insistence on this second promise can be reconciled with the American contention that what any country does with its currency is its own "domestic" policy the Senator from Nevada does not say. Meanwhile Senator Couzens, who has never indicated that he wants the war debts to us canceled—quite the contrary—rises to assert emphatically that he is against lowering our tariffs to permit our debtors to pay us in the only way they possibly could pay us. Finally, while we have been intimating strongly that we do not believe in international cooperation and that our foreign trade is unimportant anyway, we seem to be actively engaged in making trade agreements with various South American countries. The purpose of these agreements appears to be to stimulate our export trade. Do we want to begin again the folly of selling on credit? Or will we be prepared to recognize that more exports to South America will imply more imports from South America? And if we accept that consequence with South America, why not accept it with Europe? While we are making up our minds, the European countries are apparently going ahead with trade agreements which leave us out.

RAYMOND MOLEY, dean of the Washington brain trust, has returned from London looking decidedly sheepish and somewhat ridiculous. Only the President's intervention, it now appears, saved him from making an utter fool of himself. His departure from the United States was dramatic enough, but he wanted to make his arrival at the conference as spectacular as possible. It is reported that he first had the notion of going incognito to London, arriving unannounced at the conference hall. His unexpected appearance would take the delegates by storm and the conference would be saved. When Mr. Roosevelt vetoed this plan, the professor decided to fly to London from Cobh, where his steamer made its first stop. This scheme was likewise rejected by the President. Nevertheless, his presence in London was looked upon as a matter of great moment. He was the President's confidential advisor and had just come from Mr. Roosevelt's side. Surely he was bringing new instructions, a new formula, something of substance that would turn the tide. But within twenty-four hours it was discovered that he was as barren of ideas and suggestions as any of the American delegates, and within a week he silently departed, having accomplished precisely nothing. Why he went to the London conference in the first place is beyond understanding. With his positive "intranationalistic" views, and with the Roosevelt recovery program what it was, he could not possibly have hoped to contribute anything worth while. It is said that he carried a secret message to the American delegation, but we cannot think of anything so important that it could not as well have gone by the regular courier service of the State Department or by cable.

THE American Federation of Labor appears to be gathering in new members, or at least reenlisting many who had dropped out, under the protection of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Several new unions have been organized and affiliated with the federation. Existing unions have been expanding. For example, the United Mine Workers say that they have enrolled 300,000 coal diggers in the last two months. They have been helped, of course, by the placards they have tacked up everywhere through the coal country declaring that the government now "requires" the miners to join the U. M. W. A. While we are anxious to see a sound and substantial labor movement develop in this country, we are by no means sure that such a movement can develop under the leadership of men like William Green, Matthew Woll, and John L. Lewis. These officials seem to be much more desirous of rehabilitating themselves and their political machine than of helping the working class as a whole. Union representatives sent to Washington to take part in conferences on wages and working hours have been for the most part men utterly ignorant of labor economics. On the other hand, the industrialists and bankers have gone to Washington laden with statistics and supported by an army of economists and lawyers. In such an unequal contest the latter are bound to win every time. The union leaders may get the recognition which the recovery act appears to promise them, but what value will that have if the bankers and industrialists are to dictate the terms of the new working agreements, as they are virtually doing? Only militant and intelligent leadership can help the workers in these critical weeks.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY of America has recently made public confession of its difficulties. Through the columns of the Daily Worker it admitted that "in spite of the radicalization of the masses of the workers, the party has not developed into a revolutionary mass party of the proletariat." This end could have been foretold. Indeed, it was predicted by many sincere friends of the Communists. But these friendly critics, most of them intellectuals, were denounced and vilified for daring to point out weaknesses. The parochialism of the party alienated many persons who otherwise would have been eager to participate in its activities. The incomprehensible jargon of the party organizers frightened away potential members. Many of the unemployed openly sympathized with the efforts of the Communists to obtain more adequate relief for them and to prevent evictions for non-payment of rent, but when the Communists began to din such phrases as "theoretical levels" and "rightist deviation" into their ears, these jobless workers, unschooled in radical ideology, shied off from further contact with the party. Again, the party has depended exclusively on Moscow not only for instructions in strategy but also for its intellectual inspiration. This has served to divorce it from the realities of American working-class life. Let the Communists come down to earth. Let them seek cooperation with other radical groups, exactly as Lenin did before 1917, at points where they can do so without sacrificing any of their essential principles. Let them talk in realistic and intelligible terms. Then perhaps they will make progress.

AN IMPORTANT naturalization case is now before the federal courts, and may reach the supreme bench, in the application of Rebecca Shelley for citizenship. Miss Shelley is a native-born American who lost her citizenship in 1922 through marriage to a German shortly before the Cable law went into effect, making it possible for an American woman to retain her citizenship in spite of marriage to an alien. In Miss Shelley's case there was no remedy except to go through the regular naturalization process, but she was unwilling to take an oath to bear arms in defense of the country in time of war. In consequence, she failed in two attempts to get citizenship from the courts of Michigan. Her third application—in which she has the backing of a special committee of distinguished Americans and half a dozen pacifist organizations—is now before the federal court in Detroit. The committee behind Miss Shelley contends that her case is not governed by the Bland and McIntosh decisions of the United States Supreme Court. She has taken pains to say that she is ready to take the citizen's oath without mental reservations but that she interprets the word "defense" as not demanding military action.

MAHATMA GANDHI refused to call off the civil disobedience campaign despite the persistent prophecies of the Indian correspondents who continued to report that he favored an end of the movement until the very moment when he reiterated his constant position, namely, that the campaign should go on until an "honorable settlement" is reached. Why the correspondents should have been so sure that he was about to shift his position completely is a mystery. His reasons for supporting the campaign still exist. The brutal ordinances, which no Englishman would tolerate at home, are still the law of India; under their provisions thousands upon thousands of Indians have been thrown into jail where most of them are classified as Class C prisoners and therefore treated as common criminals. A short quotation from the Indian Emergency Powers Ordinance is sufficient to make it clear that civil rights are non-existent in India:

Any officer of government authorized in this behalf by general or special order of the local government may, if satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any person has acted, is acting, or is about to act, in a manner prejudicial to public safety or peace, arrest such person without warrant, and may, in so doing, use any means that may be necessary.

As for the impending constitution of India, it has lost none of its safeguards since Gandhi and the Congress Party rejected the results of the round-table conference on whose findings it is based. And it is not likely that an India bill backed by Stanley Baldwin and the Conservative Party will leave out a single one of the provisions by which the viceroy would be empowered at any moment he saw fit to take control of "self-governing" India at any point in its governmental structure. Viceroy Willingdon has refused Gandhi's request for a conference at which he wished to discuss the terms on which the disobedience campaign would be called off, and Gandhi is ready to go back to jail. At this writing, an "honorable settlement" which would provide real self-government and civil liberty for India seems far in the future. Unless, by some miracle, Great Britain turns to the left, Indian independence, like political and economic world peace, appears to lie on the other side of that vast struggle for power, national and international, which grows daily more imminent and which the intelligence of the world is apparently powerless to avoid.

A PECULIARLY DESPICABLE sort of revenge is that adopted by the Nazis against the relatives of Philipp Scheidemann, formerly Chancellor of the German Republic, because of an unfriendly article published in the United States. As Scheidemann himself is out of reach, five of his relatives in Germany have been imprisoned, an action which indicates a return to a policy previously invoked against the Jews but discontinued because of wide protest. Other similar arrests are reported, the victims including the wife of Deputy Ludwig of the Palatinate Diet and Frau Kunze, wife of the secretary of the Social Democratic Party in Dresden, the husbands of both these women having fled from Germany and refused to return. This policy of seizing hostages goes hand in hand with two recent decrees. One provides for seizure of the property and withdrawal of the citizenship of critics of the government living abroad. Under this provision Germans abroad can speak against Hitlerism only at the risk of losing any possessions they may have in the Reich and of bringing reprisals upon relatives at home. The second decree, aimed mainly against recent Jewish immigrants, makes possible the revocation of citizenship granted since the World War. Tactics similar to these of the Nazis have been employed by Mussolini, but otherwise they are almost unknown in civilized countries except as part of the code of gangsters.

HERR HITLER shows his genius in nothing more clearly than in the mastery of the details imposed upon him as the result of that rapidly advancing consolidation which seems destined soon to make him the only man in Germany allowed to have an opinion on any subject. Only a few weeks ago he issued an order forbidding butchers to make sausages in the shape of the swastika—doubtless because he feared that it might lead some to conclude that the symbol is only a lot of boloney. Rapidly recovering from the drain upon his energy incident to making such a decision, he has now issued another decree forbidding parents to name their new-born either Hitler or (in case the infant happens to be female) Hitlerine. It has remained, however, for one of his subordinates to achieve what is, so far, the best example of Nazi wit. According to the Associated Press, this subordinate has just announced that henceforth the imperial eagle will be shown grasping a sword "as a symbol of peace."

IT IS REPORTED that Professor Irving Babbitt had no great respect for many of those who climbed aboard his Humanist bandwagon when, for some mysterious reason, it got started about three years ago. Now that he has just died in Cambridge at the age of sixty-seven he leaves Paul Elmer More as the last remaining representative of the older generation of those quasi-Christian American scholars who carried on a losing battle against both romanticism and that naturalism which they regarded as essentially a later development of the same thing. Professor Babbitt, author of many books and for thirty-eight years a member of the faculty of Harvard University, had a prodigious familiarity with international literature, which he seemed sometimes to read chiefly in order to denounce it. By comparison with Professor More his whole attitude and work seemed relatively negative. It was a strange paradox that this aloof professor should have been accepted as the leader in a short-lived controversy of more or less popular character. The explanation of the paradox is that there was a certain connection between his ideas and those of a reactionary group of younger critics. It is doubtful, however, if the older and the younger Humanists ever understood one another, and Professor Babbitt allowed himself to be quoted as an authority without, except upon one occasion, taking an active part in the controversy, which was already dying when the more recent aggressiveness of the Marxian critics pushed it into the background.

AT a luncheon given by the Royal Society of Literature Rudyard Kipling told his hearers that "writers cannot lie." We do not know exactly what he meant, but it does not matter. We have daily and irrefutable evidence that liars can write.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, we are informed in a press dispatch which fairly breathes amazed admiration, attended a formal banquet the other evening "attired in white linen trousers with soft collar and shirt" and made a speech in which he congratulated himself for daring to be comfortable. It is a great moment in the history of the world when those who own it have the courage to do as they please even in such minor matters as cool pants. We can hardly wait for the news that the Prince of Wales has sat down at a troops review or that J. P. Morgan has punched a Senate investigator in the nose. Until then we must bear as well as we can the tribulations of the theoretically all-powerful, of which a particularly painful example is now on view at Albany, New York. Kidnappers, as everybody knows, dared to make off with the legal and political heir of the O'Connells, the bosses of Albany who perform the same functions for that lucky city that the sachems of Tammany perform for New York. At this writing, the O'Connells have absolutely refused to allow the duly authorized enforcers of the law in Albany to come near the case—have not thrown to them a single paltry clue to be baffled by. Apparently, in the course of their long and complete control of Albany, the O'Connells have reduced the law and its officials to such depths of inefficiency that they know better than to expect help from that quarter. Our sympathy for them in this their hour of need is prodigious.

Civil Service—or Pretense?

WE should like to hail President Roosevelt's order of July 12 in regard to postmasterships as a praiseworthy extension of the civil service and a step away from the spoils system in public office. At first glance the order had some such appearance. Unfortunately, examination of the details compels the disappointing conclusion that the order is only a political flourish and fails to advance the progress of a non-partisan government personnel in any substantial way.

Not only is Mr. Roosevelt's immediate order to Postmaster General Farley of slight consequence, but his direction to the latter to prepare legislation for action by Congress next winter promises hardly better. Practically all advances made so far toward the merit system in government service have been accomplished directly by executive action. Congress generally has been an obstructive agency, more intent upon preserving party patronage than having efficient federal departments. If President Roosevelt sincerely wants to take our post offices out of politics—instead of merely making political capital by a gesture in that direction—he can do it without any reference to or bother with Congress. He has the appointing power, and all he needs to do is to issue an executive order limiting his own action—just as other Presidents before him have done.

Exactly what does the new order propose? According to the most recent data, there are 1,122 postmasterships of the first class, 3,425 of the second, 10,485 of the third, and 32,672 of the fourth—47,704 in all. The fourth-class postmasterships are already in the civil service. The other three groups are not, but in regard to third-class postmasters it has been the custom for the Civil Service Commission to conduct a written examination of the applicants and send the names of the three with the highest rating to the Postmaster General. The latter has then submitted the names to the local Congressman or political committees, and the choice thus arrived at has been recommended to the President for appointment.

So far as first- and second-class postmasters go, the custom has been for the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department to send an agent to the town where the vacancy exists to make a personal inquiry and report. The new Roosevelt order will change this so as to apply the same procedure to first- and second-class postmasterships as to third. Mr. Farley says that the Civil Service Commission will require applicants to fill out "complete questionnaires under oath." Even granting that this technique is effectively carried out, it will hardly do more than save something in expenses. It may also eliminate sheer dunces, but our post offices have suffered less from them than from party henchmen who have used their offices for political purposes. First-, second-, and third-class postmasters have the disposition of considerable patronage—nearly 60,000 appointments in all.

It may be asked why the certification of the three names highest in the rating of the Civil Service Commission is not a satisfactory method for the appointment of postmasters, since that is the way used with fair success in filling other positions in the federal departments and in general is the civil-service technique in use by American States and municipalities. The National Civil Service Reform League replies that although the certification of three names works tolerably well elsewhere, the postal system has been so notoriously exploited for years for political purposes that it seems impossible to eliminate politics from it except by more drastic means. Moreover, a reading of Mr. Roosevelt's order requiring a certification of three names from the Civil Service Commission discloses a proviso "that the Postmaster General may reject the name or names of any persons so certified if he shall find that such person or persons are disqualified." The leeway that this proviso allows is obvious. No wonder Mr. Farley is pleased with the new method!

The way to handle the situation in the public interest is to return to the method introduced by Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. The former ordered the Postmaster General to choose the first person on the eligible list in appointing rural carriers and fourth-class postmasters. President Wilson extended the plan to apply also to postmasters of the first, second, and third classes. Unfortunately, this procedure was not allowed to stand by President Harding, who preferred the certification of three names with a possibility of choice among them.

If, as we said earlier, the President sincerely wants to take the postal service out of politics, he can do it all by himself through a simple executive order, just as Woodrow Wilson did, reestablishing the technique set up by the latter. This, the President was specifically asked to do by the National Civil Service Reform League in a letter sent to him on April 22, last. In its letter the league strongly condemned the present method of appointing postmasters and concluded: "We are convinced that it would be better to have the postmasterships openly and flagrantly spoils appointments, exposed in all their hideous nakedness as they used to be, than to have them continue nominally and hypocritically ascribed to the competitive merit system and to the alleged misconduct of the Civil Service Commission."

In our last issue we commented upon the grave danger that the Roosevelt program would be overwhelmed by patronage scandals which would destroy the faith of the public both in the competence and the honesty of the Administration's effort. The attack on the federal civil service so far is twofold, first, through the abolition of thousands of positions in the previously existing classified personnel, and, second, by the creation of numbers of jobs, all outside of the civil service, in the new emergency organizations. The exemption of places in the emergency services from civil-service requirements has been defended by some on the ground of the need of haste, but the National Civil Service Reform League said in its recent annual report: "Adherence to the merit system would not in the least delay the organization of the new bureaus. Indeed, existing eligible registers of the Civil Service Commission, if used, would greatly facilitate the employment program for the government."

There is still time for President Roosevelt to come out in the public interest both in regard to appointments to the new emergency services and to the postal system.

The Steel Code

AT last the code of the steel industry has been submitted to the Recovery Administration and the issue of union organization has emerged frankly into the foreground. Most of the codes previously submitted have tiptoed around this issue as if it were a high explosive, as indeed it is. They have included in their provisions the section of the Industrial Recovery Act relating to labor ("that employees shall have the right to organize and to bargain collectively . . ." and "that no employee . . . shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union or to refrain from joining, organizing, or assisting a labor organization of his own choosing") and have doubtless hoped that they might thus avoid more explicit agreements. Only the women's cloak and suit industry, the sixth to submit a definitive code, included a clear-cut commitment to collective bargaining with existing independent unions in the industry.

The steel code, long awaited, is of profound significance. Steel is the heart of American industry and the men in control of steel are also those who wield the greatest financial power in the country. Attempts at labor organization have time and again dashed themselves to bloody bits on the threshold of the United States Steel Corporation. Wages have been held down and hours held up by the same firm hands that have fixed prices and controlled output.

Undoubtedly the authors of the code have accomplished a feat of dexterity, if nothing else. They have drawn up an agreement regulating hours and wages and establishing standards of industrial conduct which is designed to satisfy the members of the industry while fulfilling the basic demands of the government. The one element which has not been accorded equal consideration is labor. Not that labor is left out of account. Far from it. The steel code not only establishes maximum hours per week and minimum wages (the former set at 40; the latter ranging from $10 to $16) but duly quotes the statutory provisions guaranteeing collective bargaining and the employee's right to join the organization "of his own choosing" and to remain out of company unions. But the code then proceeds directly, with no apparent conviction of inconsistency, to expound the virtues of the employee representation plans "which are now in force at plants of members of the industry generally." These are the solemn words in which it declares its faith:

It is the belief of the industry that the method of collective bargaining set forth in such plans provides for a day-to-day adjustment of all matters relating to the employment of employees in the industry and at the same time insures to such employees a knowledge and understanding of the conditions of the business of their employer which they would otherwise be unable to obtain; that such principles should be maintained; and that the rights of the employees and members of the industry to bargain through representatives elected or appointed and acting in accordance with such plans without interference, restraint, or coercion of any sort should be preserved and protected.

The authors of those ponderous phrases will perhaps be grateful if we translate them into simpler words and clearer meanings. The steel industry believes that company unions comprise a useful department of the industry. They can be made to understand their employers' needs, whereas an independent union would certainly be less interested in those needs than in the needs of the workers. Therefore no outside labor agitators, or even the law itself, should interrupt the pleasant intercourse between the steel-company unions and their bosses. In fact, the Administration should itself protect them from such interruption. What the steel companies want, in short, is to obtain government support and legal backing in their long-drawn-out, bitter, and successful fight to prevent the independent organization of their workers.

The labor provisions of the steel code will be eagerly seized upon by other employers. Already a ludicrous race is on in many industries to slap together company unions and present them to the Recovery Administration as accomplished facts before the regular labor organizations have had time to get in and form independent unions. Organized labor, meanwhile, has been galvanized into action. The A. F. of L. headquarters in Washington is swamped with requests from every industry and every section of the country for charters and for organizers and help. Despite a lack of systematic effort, unionization is spreading like a forest fire. The battle is on and if the federal Administration hopes to remain above it, it is going to be speedily disillusioned. If it bans the labor clauses of the steel code it will win the confidence of the great body of workers, organized and unorganized, and will present the best possible evidence that its real interest is the welfare of the millions whose economic roots have been torn up in the collapse of industry. But at the same time it will face the hostility of big business headed by the Steel Corporation and the house of Morgan. Which will Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Johnson choose?

Meeting the Nazi Threat

THE Nazi assault on reason is a challenge to the whole world. It constitutes a repudiation of all the essential values which the human race has painfully established in its slow rise from the Dark Ages. Particularly does it challenge every basic American principle—the aspirations enshrined in our bill of rights, freedom of speech, of conscience, of press, the equality of all men before the law regardless of race or religion. As the enormity of the Nazi crime and its menace to mankind are established, ways to meet this peril become the subject of study and thought. The boycott is an effective weapon. But while usefully destructive, it does not meet the need for positive action.

Fortunately a constructive opportunity is provided. Alvin Johnson, director of the New School for Social Research in New York City, has formulated a plan to bring to this country the outstanding scholars of Germany, victims of Nazi obscurantism, and to establish them here in an autonomous "University in Exile." American universities are themselves in financial distress. The majority have been forced to retrench radically, to cut salaries, to drop some of their teaching staff. For them to make a place for even the most eminent academicians from abroad, except in a few special cases, and to sacrifice American teachers who have a prior claim, would be unjust and unpopular. Dr. Johnson purposes establishing in New York an entirely new academic unit, with funds specially subscribed. Beginning modestly, the proposal is to engage fifteen German scholars in the social sciences at $4,000 a year, and to guarantee their employment for two years. The sum required for this initial program, $120,000, has already been subscribed, and this fall the "University in Exile" will be inaugurated, with a faculty of international repute. The class-room facilities of the New School for Social Research will be turned over to them. They will be free to continue the work interrupted by the furor hitlerica and to lecture to all who desire to listen.

The number of scholars ousted from German universities is under 400. They have been dismissed, or have resigned, partly on racial grounds, but more especially because they are scientists, searchers after truth, who could not possibly teach the grotesque falsehoods implicit in Nazi economics, Nazi history, Nazi sociology, Nazi philosophy, Nazi biology, Nazi anthropology, and Nazi ethics. Some of these professors have already been engaged by universities in London, Madrid, Paris, Prague, and Zurich. Those available would probably not exceed 300, a negligible figure numerically when viewed in terms of absorbing them into our cultural life. But what would it not mean to the United States to secure for coming generations some of the best of German scholarship? Even more than from the forty-eighters who, fleeing from monarchist tyranny eighty-five years ago, brought so much of value to American public life, the potential contribution of these ousted German scholars would be incalculable. But apart from any selfish motivation, apart from the essentially valid and human objective of offering the finest kind of relief to fellow beings in deep distress, is the even greater opportunity for America in this day and age to reassert its faith in its own heritage. For surely it must be apparent that liberty, that almost forgotten ideal so long cherished by Americans, is under assault as never before.

The struggle for human freedom takes on different aspects in different ages, but civilization is today driven back to defend terrain supposedly conquered by our forebears once and for all time. The issue cannot be avoided. Atavistic barbarism will engulf peoples which are supine and indifferent, as it engulfed the German republicans, Social Democrats, and intellectuals. We in America must face and meet this challenge head on and level-eyed. Here then is the opportunity. It is infinitely better that the endowment for a greater "University in Exile" be met by the small contributions of hundreds of thousands of Americans than by the endowments, welcome though they be, of a few wealthy and public-spirited individuals. The nucleus of the "University in Exile" is already an established fact. The cost of extending it to include 300 German scholars—to take in faculties in the natural sciences and in arts and letters—would be $1,200,000 a year, and that cost would diminish in successive years as the classes tended to become self-sustaining. The entire expense of such a university for a generation would be less than the price of one battleship. Here is a chance for those who wish tangibly to help the victims of the Nazi outrages and to contribute their mite to a reaffirmation of all that should be most dear to Americans.

The sponsors of the "University in Exile," asked by Dr. Johnson to serve, are Wilbur L. Cross, John Dewey, Felix Frankfurter, Ernest Gruening, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Robert M. Hutchins, Robert M. MacIver, George A. Plimpton, Edwin R. A. Seligman, and Herbert Bayard Swope.

Thespis on Vacation

A DRAWING in a recent issue of the New Yorker showed two city slickers interviewing a rustic realtor. Underneath was a legend which ran: "Have you got a medium-sized barn? Something with a seating capacity of about two hundred." More serious evidence of the spread of the summer theater is given in a special issue of the Stage which lists seventy theaters in the East alone and expresses the opinion that before the season is over at least twenty-five more will have made their bid for an audience. One tends to forget that there was a time when the Provincetown Playhouse was actually at Provincetown, but it is only during the last two or three years that the summer-theater movement has reached such proportions as to call for its consideration as a major phenomenon.

The true summer theater is not to be confused with the local stock company. The manager is generally someone who is or would like to be connected with the metropolitan stage, and he is merely passing what used to be his vacation in the neighborhood of a summer colony. The company may possibly contain some amateurs, but at the more ambitious theaters it is more likely to be composed of professionals glad to find summer work away from the city, and a "visiting star" is likely to be invited for each new production. Some of the plays are revivals of Broadway successes, but many are try-outs of new pieces with aspirations toward Broadway which Broadway managers come to see. The audience contains many vacationists, but there is often also a generous sprinkling of natives who are learning that the movies are not the only form of dramatic entertainment which survives in the United States.

Enthusiasts see in the situation the beginning of the theatrical millennium. Playwrights and actors who—like the wicked lord in "The Happy Hypocrite"—have not seen a primrose in years now stumble over honeysuckle (or poison ivy) on their way to the stage door and find wisps of more or less new-mown hay in their dressing rooms. Moreover, there are other less purely spiritual gains. Play production is relatively cheap in what has come to be known as a "horse and cow theater." Relatively free experimentation is therefore possible and scripts which no Broadway manager would take a chance on have an opportunity to demonstrate their possibilities. One may also whisper the fact that a good many capable performers are very glad at the end of a starvation winter to get at least board and lodging in some pleasant vacation resort.

One need not be a torch bearer to see the spread of the summer theater as at least a healthy and gratifying phenomenon which has some of the advantages without all the drawbacks of the more orthodox little theater of the winter season in provincial towns. Not all the seventy-odd playhouses listed by the Stage will justify their existence. They range all the way from such thoroughly professional institutions as Lawrence Langner's Country Playhouse at Westport, Connecticut, to others completely amateur in the worst or the best sense of the term. But they are carrying the theater to regions remote from Broadway. Quite possibly they will play an important part in that long-delayed rebirth of "the road" for which everybody has been longing.

Issues and Men

The Roosevelt Revolution

IN the three months which have elapsed since this page was discontinued because of the writer's departure for England, momentous things have happened on both sides of the ocean. Whoever is responsible, whatever the cause, the whole scene has changed marvelously for the better on this side of the Atlantic: on the other, everything is overshadowed by the economic chaos and the triumph of despotic barbarism in Germany, which for the first time makes it truly a country to be feared and to be watched with eagle eyes lest Hitler precipitate the final ruin of Europe.

But here! How can one express the amazement one feels at the revolution which has taken place in so short a time? It has seemed to me as if all my fellow craftsmen, not excluding the editors of The Nation, have been so close to the bewildering, kaleidoscopic happenings as perhaps not to have been able to see the whole of the forest for the trees. Certainly that would be entirely pardonable. Never in the history of the American press have editors been called upon to pass as many or more momentous judgments as they have since March 4 last.

Measures of the utmost importance have been introduced, reported, and jammed through Congress with such speed that they have become the law of the land before editors of weeklies had time to comment upon them. The most involved and delicate questions and proposals have come up for comment overnight, usually heralded by days of utterly contradictory forecasts as to what the President would or would not do. The President has rushed in where angels might well have feared to tread—only to be acclaimed because he was doing something and the mass of the people were too frightened and harassed to care whether it was for better or for worse.

At the English end of the cable it was almost impossible to follow Mr. Roosevelt's course intelligently. The brief, cabled summaries were chiefly bewildering especially because the English press does not report American happenings with anything like the detail with which English events in every field of activity are reported in our papers. Often I have sighed with relief to think that I was no longer the responsible editor of The Nation called upon to decide policies and pass upon concrete proposals utterly beyond my limited financial and economic vision. And always I have thought with deepest sympathy of my associates, the editors of The Nation, and marveled that they did their difficult job as well as they did.

Yet I confess that sometimes I have wished for a greater note of jubilation, and for a more general view of what has happened. Not that I believe in everything that Mr. Roosevelt has done. His recent treatment of the World Economic Conference seems to me to have been disgraceful in manner, to have discredited utterly our delegation and our country abroad. If the President was justified in suddenly reversing his stand on stabilization and kicking the Conference in the abdomen, why did he ever send the delegation and Moley over there? As for the announcement of the Secretary of the Navy, with Mr. Roosevelt's approval, that we are arranging to build our fleet up to treaty limits, and our establishment of a new—and somewhat aggressive—naval policy, all I can say about that is that it is worthy of Adolf Hitler. At this stage of our own and the world's history such an action is criminal folly, indefensible from any point of view. Yet a demand for naval expansion was precisely to have been expected from Franklin Roosevelt, whose big-navy proclivities he long ago sincerely and openly avowed—which is one reason why I could not vote for him for President. Yet despite these things and many others, despite the menace of dictatorship to be discovered in so many places in these new laws, I still find much in the American scene today to be thankful for and in spots to marvel at.

Who, for example, could read of the voluntary (?) action of the textile leaders in abolishing child labor without bursting into cheers? Think of those years of hopeless struggle to abolish child labor by law and then to amend the Constitution only to find it impossible to get more than four or five States to vote for the amendment. And now suddenly to achieve our long-cherished vision by the simple device of a minimum wage which at once made child labor financially unprofitable! I do not know who thought of that, or if it came about by accident. But I do know that it has removed one of the deepest and darkest stains from the American flag. And then when I read of those trade codes that industry is being bludgeoned into and find such persons as Frances Perkins, Harold Ickes, Donald Richberg, Joseph Eastman, and John Collier in dominating positions, with Harold Ickes in charge of the whole program of public works, I want to go down on my knees and salaam respectfully three times to the East.

No, we are not out of the woods and no man knows what still lies before us. But the great thing is that a mental revolution has taken place with a speed which defies belief. To come back to America and hear no more of Hoover, no more of rugged individualism, no more complaints that the government is delving too far into private business, except in the columns of a few papers like the New York Herald Tribune and the Chicago Tribune, and those comparatively mild; to find the American business man actually thinking about new methods and a square deal, about being decent to the people in his industry and his competitors; to find the taint taken off socialism to a considerable degree and the recognition of Russia at hand, for these things let us bless our stars. No one can yet tell us how far this mental jolt may not lead us, or how much we shall yet get out of it, but the great and wonderful fact remains that, whether they know it or not, their world has dropped out from under the Babbitts, our great capitalist rulers.

Dwight Garrison Killard

"Business Is Picking Up"

Drawing by William Gropper

Eating Without Working

A Moral Disquisition

By STUART CHASE

IN the last resort," said Thorstein Veblen, "the economic moralities wait on the economic necessities." No single one of the economic moralities is held in more tender regard among Western peoples than that carried in the phrase: "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat thy bread." To secure useful goods, one must give useful labor. This is, to date, axiomatic. Useful labor, moreover, has taken on a moral dignity, almost a divinity, which would have shocked Plato or Pericles, who held common labor to be menial and degrading.

It is true that the modern rule has one important exception. It is not applicable to that 2 per cent or so of the population which Veblen has characterized as the kept classes. Those who live by virtue of the absentee ownership of profitable investment, whether in lands, buildings, royalties, or stocks and bonds, are totally exempt from its compulsions. It is manifest that in so far as they live on the usufruct of their portfolios they eat without working. Fortunately the classical economists have been at some pains to rationalize this breach of a great moral principle. It appears that the kept classes consume without producing now, because in the past they have produced without consuming. They are justly entitled to a "reward for abstinence." This would be news to many young gentlemen and ladies in exclusive finishing schools; it would be news to every fortunate gambler in real estate and stocks; news to all the recipients of engraved certificates of esteem from the house of Morgan; it would be news to Mr. Charlie Mitchell and the million-dollar bonus boys—corporate, not khaki—but so the classic apologia goes. And certainly no group in the community is more alert to the moral virtue of diligence, application, and industry, on the part of others, than the kept classes. "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." Even child labor is defended on the grounds that it keeps children out of mischief. Indeed a perspicacious psychologist might amuse himself with the theory that lack of useful work in a given group is compensated by their profound regard for the necessity of useful work at other points in the social structure.

The economic morality of work stands, then, for 98 per cent, more or less, of the population, charmingly and persuasively encouraged by the remaining 2 per cent. Impinging upon this principle, however, comes a thoroughly unmoral economic reality. Its pressure is already immense, and day by day grows stronger. Raw natural energy, harnessed in a prime mover and yoked to an operating machine, is destroying human work. The curve of technical invention is cumulative and tends to grow, according to Dr. William F. Ogburn, at a geometrical rate. It is perhaps the strongest economic force in the modern world; nor can it be stopped short of scrapping what is known as Western civilization, and retreating to the handicraft of the Middle Ages.

The economic reality of the automatic process and quantity production has a steadily declining use for human labor, particularly manual labor. What it does demand is efficient consumption of its fabulous output. Unless its serialized machines and processes are run at approximate capacity on the "balanced load" principle, it cannot properly function—as in the present depression. It demands efficient functioning at the cost of wrecking the whole economic structure. To function it must have millions and millions of the sturdiest sort of consumers; consumers with admirable digestive tracts and great powers for depreciating personal equipment. Slowly, under this imperative, consumption is becoming, as a matter of economic reality, more important than work; purchasing power more important than man hours.

Slowly, reluctantly, even kicking and screaming, industrial nations are being driven to the hitherto abhorrent notion that the consumer must be furnished with purchasing power whether he works or not. Two years ago in this republic the word "dole" carried rather more opprobrium than the word "racketeer." Yet the dole marches on, five hundred millions of it in the last Congress.

It is touching to watch the tortures of the moralists caught on the horns of this dilemma; one school of them seriously proposes that the output, rather than be allowed to fall into the hands of the consumer, should be destroyed. A billion pounds of coffee, millions of bushels of wheat, thousands of bales of cotton, uncounted gallons of milk have recently been subjected to holocaust and destruction, thus preserving the economic morality of the wayfaring citizen. He has not worked, so he must be prevented from consuming. This censorship, however, like another recent noble experiment in prohibiting consumption, has not served economic realities, however much it may have served the cause of beautiful morals. The jam in the industrial mechanism is not relieved by even such monumental measures of deliberate waste.

The consumer must be permitted to consume. There is no other final outcome to the pressure of the technical arts. The 98 per cent must absorb, with or without working, even as the 2 per cent have done hitherto. That this will reduce the relative advantages of conspicuous consumption on the part of the 2 per cent is regrettable, perhaps, but inevitable.

A few business men and a few college professors saw the handwriting on the wall as early as 1922. Mr. Henry Ford saw it even earlier. They began the now familiar talk about the "economy of high wages," furnishing the worker with power to buy back what, with his declining assistance, the machine process could make. This movement never progressed much beyond talk, but it was the thin entering wedge.

From a broader point of view, of course, the consumer is not without moral claims of his own. The output of modern industry rests on five fundamental factors: (1) Natural resources available; (2) skilled and unskilled labor (a declining factor but still very important); (3) technical management (an increasingly important factor); (4) non-human forms of energy (from coal, oil, water power); (5) the cultural heritage of the technical arts.

If the consumer can find a job to aid production in factor 2, well and good; that gives him a direct if modest claim on the output, as has long been recognized. But increasingly he will be denied a job as technological unemployment gains. Either that, or the work demanded of him will be startlingly reduced by a shorter working week. In either case, toil will decline, and with it those claims founded on useful work.

Technical management has a sound and growing claim on the output; but as there are probably not more than 200,000 families headed by active technicians in the United States, this is far too small a group to be of any appreciable help in carrying off the product. There are 30,000,000 families in the country.

The other three factors—natural resources, energy, and the technical arts—are, or should be, the common inheritance of the whole community, which is the same as saying the common inheritance of the consumer. His common property provides the factors which are most important in the whole productive mechanism. He has, accordingly, from this broader point of view, a reasonably good moral right to the usufruct of his property. Now this may or may not be good moral doctrine; certainly economic realities are on the road to making it a practicable doctrine. To establish the right of the consumer to consume will take time—it may, indeed, take a revolution or two. But if I read the march of history aright, it will not be gainsaid.

While history will undoubtedly solve this problem in her own brusque and hidden ways, it may not be out of place to speculate upon the methods which she may conceivably pursue. In the serried vanguard of the opposition which now blocks the free flow of consumption stand the private banking system and the debt structure. It is probable that both must be liquidated to a percentum of their present grandeur, a percentum which it would be rash to estimate, save for the reservation that it will be extremely small.

The creation of money, the allotment of purchasing power, is a social function of the first importance and should be restored to the federal government, in whose hands the Constitution placed it. It is forever impossible for the private banker, working for private gain, adequately to finance the consumer. It wounds his moral sensibilities, for one thing. By reducing his time-honored toll and that of his stockholders, it would condemn itself to him as "unsound." If recent history does not demonstrate the incompatibility of private banking and effective consumption, mathematics can prove it readily. The consumer, therefore, cannot adequately consume until the private banker, as the chief executor of the nation's credit, is lifted gently but firmly out of the picture. It is unfortunate that Mr. Roosevelt did not seize the unparalleled opportunity to lift him out, to the applause of a grateful nation, on March 4 last.

The liquidation of the debt structure promises to be an even more drastic and shocking business. History may handle this problem by inflation, by devaluation of the dollar, by deliberate scaling down, by a hit or miss tumbling down, after the fashion of the walls of Jericho. It is to be noted, however, that the walls of Jericho were solid stone and mortar, not notes and paper.

As for the methods whereby the consumer will ultimately be financed, history has a wide choice. She may select minimum subsistence payments per capita or per family; she may choose consumers' dividends, or a straight rationing of prime necessities, or an enormously shortened work week with undiminished wages—thus keeping all able-bodied consumers nominally employed; or a guaranteed job, more or less of a nominal character, in the public-works division; or a combination of these methods.

Somehow, somewhere—but in the not too distant future—mass consumption must move up to the technical requirements of mass production, at the cost of whatever moralities and financial dream castles lie in the way. No realist will even consider retreating to the economy of the Middle Ages. Yet this retreat, painful and disorderly as it would be, is the sole alternative to deliberate and purposeful mass consumption. All men cannot at present work. All men must eat.

Can Currencies Be Managed?

By HENRY HAZLITT

WHEN President Roosevelt, on July 3, rejected the efforts of the World Economic Conference to achieve a "temporary stabilization" of currencies, he was not merely rejecting the proposal to stabilize the leading currencies in terms of each other for the next few months; he was also hinting at a fundamental change in monetary policy.

The sound internal economic system of a nation [he said] is a greater factor in its well-being than the price of its currency in changing terms of the currencies of other nations. . . .

So, too, old fetishes of so-called international bankers are being replaced by efforts to plan national currencies with the objective of giving to those currencies a continuing purchasing power which does not greatly vary in terms of the commodities and needs of modern civilization.

Let me be frank in saying that the United States seeks the kind of dollar which a generation hence will have the same purchasing power and debt-paying power as the dollar value we hope to attain in the near future.

It is obvious that the President—either through a direct reading of Maynard Keynes, or of some such popularizer of Keynes as Stuart Chase, or through the advice of some member of his "brain trust"—has been greatly influenced by the advocates of a so-called "managed" currency. How successful would such a currency be? Perhaps the best way to approach this problem is to consider the leading proposals so far offered and such experience of "managed" currencies as we happen to have.

Proposals to abolish the gold or any other metallic standard in favor of some other system of currency have been made from time immemorial. To the men in power immediately after the French Revolution, to our own statesmen immediately after the Civil War, who held that the irredeemable paper currency then in circulation "rests on the property of the whole country, and has for its security the faith and patriotism of the greatest and freest country on the face of the globe," to our Populists in 1892, and to the hordes of currency cranks always and everywhere, gold reserves and gold convertibility have seemed not merely unnecessary, but positively ominous—"a vast conspiracy," as the Populist platform put it, "against mankind." But a sharp distinction must be drawn between those simple-minded persons who believe that wealth can somehow be created by the printing press, or those who from time to time have favored inflation as a means of paying off debts for a few cents on the dollar, and those serious reformers who have felt that it is possible to devise a currency that would be more effective than those based on the orthodox gold standard in keeping the prices of commodities stable.

The two most intelligent proposals of this nature are those of Irving Fisher and of John Maynard Keynes. The Fisher plan was first in the field, and Mr. Keynes's proposals are in the main a modification of it. Professor Fisher has long been recognized as the leading adherent in America of what is known as the quantity theory of money. He believes, in other words, that the price level of commodities varies in direct proportion to the volume of money in circulation (including bank deposits and allowing for changes in the "velocity of circulation.") Curiously enough, however, his famous plan for a "compensated" dollar rests essentially on the radically different "bullionist" theory. This theory holds that under the orthodox gold standard a price, at bottom, expresses the relationship between the value of a given amount of the commodity priced, and the value of a fixed weight of gold. Professor Fisher's proposal, therefore, is that instead of retaining a gold dollar of a fixed weight and fineness (until March of this year this was 23.2 grains) we change the weight of the dollar constantly in exact ratio with changes in the general level of prices. In more detail, Professor Fisher's plan is this: He would make use of one of the existing "index numbers" or create a new one especially for this purpose. An index number is based on an average of the prices of a large number of different commodities, sometimes including several hundred. Suppose we should decide now, for example, to return to the price level of 1924-1925 (as recently suggested by the President) and to stabilize there. We should then assign to the 1924-25 price level the arbitrary value of 100. If we should discover that present prices (after allowing for the rise that has been caused by the recent depreciation of the dollar) were 40 per cent below that level, we should then cut the gold content of the dollar by 40 per cent—returning, of course, to gold convertibility. Thereafter, we should change the gold content of the dollar each month by the same percentage as the price average had changed—or rather, as suggested by Professor Fisher, we should change it by a maximum of 1 per cent a month in either direction. As, prior to the World War, changes in the general price level almost never were as great as 12 per cent in any one year, Professor Fisher thinks this change would be sufficient to keep prices from fluctuating.

How would this plan be likely to work? Let us pass over, for the moment, the question of immediate devaluation, and consider the proposal for keeping prices stable thereafter. The first result to be noted is that, if the plan were put into operation by any one country acting alone, while other countries returned to an orthodox free-gold basis, the exchange rate of the country on the "compensated" currency basis would be subject to monthly fluctuations in terms of the rest. This would put a serious obstacle in the way of a free flow of foreign trade, and would be particularly injurious to the foreign trade of the nation on the "compensated" basis. An even more serious defect of the plan—still assuming that it were adopted, say, by the United States acting alone—is that both American and foreign speculators could trade constantly against the government with impunity. Suppose, for example, that during any month commodity prices were falling. It would be relatively simple for speculators to calculate before the end of the month whether or not the decline had exceeded 1 per cent. Moreover, if the decline had exceeded 2 per cent in the preceding month, speculators would know that the dollar was due for another reduction of 1 per cent in its gold content whether or not commodity prices were falling during the current month. They would therefore redeem their paper dollars in gold, knowing that after the turn of the month they could turn the gold in again for more paper dollars. Conversely, if prices had been rising during the month, speculators would turn in gold for paper dollars, and after the end of the month they could turn in the paper dollars and draw out a larger amount of gold than they had turned in.

It is obvious not only that the government would be playing an inevitably losing game against international speculators, but that the Fisher plan would greatly aggravate a country's currency difficulties in times of crisis. Falling prices usually occur when business is disturbed and stagnant and when confidence is low. With the Fisher plan in effect, it is precisely at such a time that the greatest raids would be made upon the country's gold supply.

Professor Fisher has partly recognized the dangers of speculation against the government and believes he would avert them by fixing a spread of 1 per cent between the "buying price" and the "selling price" of gold. Such a spread, however, would be wholly ineffective against speculative operations extending over several months. Mr. Keynes—to anticipate—in recently advocating a return to a qualified gold standard, has suggested that the buying and selling prices of gold be separated by as much as 5 per cent. But this too would fail to prevent speculators from trading against the government when cumulative price changes were large enough; and it would permit a fluctuation of 5 per cent in exchange rates. As contrasted with present conditions, such a fluctuation may seem very small; but it might still be sufficient to hurt foreign trade to some extent, and it would certainly be sufficient practically to end any free international transfer of liquid funds. Mr. Keynes recognizes this second consequence and even welcomes it. It is true, of course, that it would, as he suggests, put an end to unwise international transfers of funds, but it would be just as effective in stopping necessary and desirable transfers. For example, a central bank subjected to a raid on its gold supply at home may desperately want temporarily to borrow funds from abroad; but it could not borrow except at an interest rate at least sufficient to cover any possible loss resulting to the lender from a fall in exchange to the lower gold point. Under normal conditions the international transfer of liquid funds, far from increasing the international flow of gold, greatly reduces it.

The unsophisticated may suppose that all these troubles could be averted by the simple refusal of the government or the central bank to redeem currency in gold at all. Such a move, however, would abolish the whole stabilization scheme itself, and neither Mr. Keynes nor Professor Fisher has recommended it. Only free redeemability can keep the currency at any desired value. Mere gold reserves in themselves, no matter how large, are wholly useless for this purpose unless they are actually employed. It is merely necessary to point to the fact that the dollar has already gone to a discount of 30 per cent in the few months since gold convertibility has been abandoned, though our gold reserves are not only hundreds of millions of dollars greater than they were in the first week of March, but greater than in the entire history of the Federal Reserve system.

If the Fisher plan were adopted internationally, at least the drawback of fluctuating exchange rates would not exist, and the speculative raids against the various central banks would be relatively much less than they would in the case of any country acting alone. But here a formidable political difficulty presents itself. We must either adopt separate index numbers of prices for different countries, or a single world index number. If we adopt separate index numbers, we come back again to the problem of fluctuating exchange rates. If we wish to adopt a single world index number, we have to face the fact that for short periods prices in different countries may move in different directions, and that while they tend to move in the same direction in the long run, they do not always change to precisely the same extent. This discrepancy occurs if only because some nations are dominantly agricultural and others dominantly industrial. Even assuming, therefore, that we could get all nations to agree on a common index number, the effect of its adoption would be sometimes to aggravate the price fluctuation in a given country rather than to offset it.

Mr. Keynes's stabilization plan is more difficult to describe than Professor Fisher's, if only because he leaves so much of it vague and has so frequently shifted his position. For the latter tendency, indeed, he might be called the Lloyd George among economists. His plan is, to begin with, much more complicated than the Fisher plan. Instead of permitting the buying and selling prices of gold to change automatically in accordance with changes in an index number, he would allow the central bank or a governing board to change these figures at its discretion. Without depending upon this measure alone, he would supplement it by permitting this board to regulate the volume of paper money more directly, and to regulate the volume of bank credit through changes in the discount rate, through open market operations, through the control of investment, and so on. Space does not permit a discussion of these measures in detail. It may be said, however, that they rest on several fundamentally false assumptions. It is not true that the price level bears any fixed or invariable relation to the quantity of money and credit outstanding. The quantity theory of money has been statistically discredited time and again since the outbreak of the war, but its adherents go blandly on. It is not true, again, that the volume of money and credit can be predictably controlled by changes in discount rates: low discount rates through several depression years did not prevent a continuous shrinkage in the volume of credit. Finally, the automatic changes in the gold-content of the currency as proposed in Professor Fisher's plan is, with all its drawbacks, infinitely preferable to changes by a political board as proposed by Mr. Keynes. For the decisions of such a board would almost certainly conform to political pressures rather than to economic facts. The political pressures in nearly every case would be for higher prices, almost never for lower prices. The farmers would demand higher prices; manufacturers would demand higher prices; and labor, instead of opposing higher prices, would much more probably demand higher wages. It is unlikely that the gold-content-fixing board would be any more above political influences than is the present Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board not only failed to take any initiative in heading off the 1927-1929 boom, but actually turned down the belated application of the New York Federal Reserve Bank to raise its discount rate with that end in view.

We have, perhaps, one example of a country already on a "managed" currency. It is, at least, frequently cited by the managed-currency advocates. This is Sweden. Sweden was forced off the gold basis after Great Britain in September, 1931. Since then the currency has been allowed to sink to a discount of 30 per cent or more, and the official policy has been directed—in accordance with the ideas of Mr. Keynes—toward stabilizing internal prices even at the cost of a fluctuating exchange rate. The official index of prices has actually been more stable than that of any other country during this period.

Rufus S. Tucker, analyzing the situation more closely in Barron's weekly magazine of June 19, however, finds that this price average conceals two very diverse movements. The prices of imported goods between August, 1931, and February, 1933, rose 13 per cent, while the average price of domestic goods and of goods produced for export fell 9 per cent. The decline in the value of Swedish exports during approximately the same period was greater than the decline in American exports if both are measured in the same kind of currency. The total number of bankruptcies in Sweden in 1932 increased 25 per cent over those in 1931, compared with an increase in the United States of only 11 per cent in the same period. The most damaging figures are those for unemployment. By August and September, 1932, unemployment in Sweden was more than 50 per cent greater than in August and September, 1931. The increase in the number of trade-union members reported unemployed, between the end of August, 1931, and the end of February, 1933, was 144 per cent. In the United States the increase in trade-union unemployment in the same period was only 38 per cent. Before Sweden left the gold standard, unemployment among trade-union members was only two-thirds as great as in the United States; in February last it was greater.

These figures are enough to show that there is no magic in the stability of a mere average level of prices, or merely in the existence of a currency depreciation. And our analysis is not such as to lead us to place any confidence in the most serious proposals for currency "management" so far advanced. This does not mean that we need abandon currency or price stabilization as an ideal, but it does suggest that it is not wise to attempt it until monetary economists have agreed upon some plan that seems much more promising than any so far offered. It is to be remembered that Professor Fisher's plan has been before the public now for more than two decades, and Mr. Keynes's for at least one, but that neither plan has met with the approval of most of their fellow monetary economists. But the Fisher plan may prove to contain a valuable germ idea. It is at least sound in embodying the recognition that prices under the gold standard express a relationship between the value of gold on the one hand and the value of goods on the other; that more gold will buy more goods, and less gold less; and that changes in the gold content of the dollar are the quickest and most predictable way we yet know of to change the price level. For that reason the present writer suggested in March of last year the devaluation of the dollar as a desperate expedient to meet a desperate situation. I believe it has been our abandonment of the former gold parity, and the sharp depreciation of the dollar in anticipation of an ultimate cut in its gold content, that has mainly produced the violent rise of prices and the astonishing recovery in industry in the last few months. But a major operation to offset the most violent collapse of commodity prices in a century is one thing; a continuous series of monthly operations is quite another. Devaluation, we must never forget, depends for its workability upon the fact that it is not generally expected; for when it is, everyone will raid the gold supply in advance.

The immediate need is to return to the gold standard at a new level, certainly in collaboration with Great Britain, and preferably in collaboration with as many other nations as possible. For the future, let the President appoint several first-rate American monetary authorities (not politicians) to an international commission composed exclusively of such authorities, and assign to this commission the duty of reporting upon the possibility of managing currencies and the most promising plan, if any. Unless we turn the question over to such a commission first, we shall not be planning; we shall merely, as Sir Arthur Salter would put it, be improvising.

How to Reduce Your Light Bills

By JUDSON KING

THE power issue has reached the stage where the people of the United States have become acutely "rate conscious." Rate wars are in progress in every section of the nation. Such efforts would be multiplied if the officials and people of so many municipalities were not appalled at the expense and labor involved in an engagement with the power monopolies, with the likelihood of obtaining only a slight reduction in rates, or none at all, after a long conflict before a State utilities commission and in the courts. The progress of justifiable rate reduction would no doubt be speeded up if consumers were aware that a simple, effective method of determining honest electric rates has recently been developed, the legal soundness of which has been affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. The purpose of this article is to explain this new technique for the benefit of those who are in rebellion against excessive electric charges and want to know what to do and how to do it.

Assume that the League of Women Voters, or the Citizens' Union, or some other organization in a typical small city, town, or village has begun to study the power question with a practical end in view. A thirty-year franchise is about to expire, or they are resentful over excessive monthly bills. The power system which serves their municipality, let us say, is but one of many tied into a vast privately owned super-power system ultimately controlled from New York or Chicago. If they make the mistake of attempting to pry into the true "valuation" of the company with its holding-company ramifications, they will end in a hopeless muddle. Regulation through attempted determination of a "fair return" upon "valuation" has failed through the past twenty-five years.

Laying aside financial manuals and the company's annual report, they should start off with a study of costs. They should ask what it actually costs: (1) to generate a kilowatt hour of electric current at the switchboard in a power plant; (2) to send this kilowatt hour over a high voltage transmission line to a town; (3) to distribute this kilowatt hour from the step-down station at the city limits to a home, a store, a factory, or the city streets. In other words, they should find out average costs in both private and municipally owned systems. Common sense dictates that rates be based upon costs.

Our inquirers will soon discover that in a great modern steam or hydroelectric station the average cost of generation is from 2 mills to 5 mills a kilowatt hour; next, that it costs on the average 1 mill to 2 mills per kilowatt hour to transmit the current, say 100 miles. Getting down to "distribution" costs, however, they will encounter trouble, because the literature of neither the engineering societies nor private companies yields any light. The power trust desires to keep such information from the people, because this is the field of the large-scale looting. Great help, however, is available in the findings of a group of engineers now investigating distribution costs under the auspices of the New York Power Authority. Morris L. Cooke of Philadelphia, able consulting engineer and member of the Power Authority, has published the results of this inquiry as far as it has gone, and the volume is indispensable to investigators, since it contains information to be found nowhere else. The data used in this article are largely taken from the papers of the contributing engineers which are brought together in this book.*

If the search for basic facts is pursued with reasonable diligence, our citizens will soon find themselves possessed of sufficient information on which to base intelligent action. Meantime, city officials have been consulted and have become interested. A public hearing before the mayor and the city council is called, with the city attorney present. Also in attendance will be found the company's local attorney and engineer, supported by a distinguished holding-company attorney, sent from headquarters.

Out of courtesy the spokesman of the League of Women Voters, which started the fight and is probably the best informed group in town on the question, will be given the floor. She states that the women of the town, because of high rates, cannot use as much electric current as they need to relieve household drudgery; that they find private company rates vary greatly in comparable towns; that as a rule municipally owned plants sell current at much lower prices than private companies; that women are paying an average of 8 cents per kilowatt hour for domestic power service, while factory users and the street-car company buy it for 2 cents or less. This looks like discrimination. She would like to have the company's engineer explain whether he employs any scientific method in keeping records or determining the cost of current to different classes of consumers.

* "What Electricity Costs." A Symposium on the Cost of Distribution to Domestic and Rural Consumers, edited by Morris Llewellyn Cooke. Published by The New Republic, Inc., New York. $1.

The company engineer replies that rate schedules are fixed in New York; that he is not required to keep such accounts; and (growing embarrassed) that "no one really knows. . ." The suave holding-company attorney, sensing danger, breaks in with some such explanation as this:

"Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, the answer to the lady's question lies in the tremendous cost of distributing electric energy in small quantities to thousands of residence meters scattered over this municipality as contrasted with the low cost of delivering a huge block of current to one meter, for instance in a factory. Potatoes cannot be delivered to your back door by the peck as cheaply as by the carload to a warehouse. The cost of generating current in huge volume is now so low that we could well-nigh afford to give it to you, if that were all. It is this expensive distribution that causes what you mistakenly consider excessive rates.

"The capital invested in our great XYZ system, which serves this town, is $492,000,000. You are served by gigantic hydro and steam generating plants with a vast network of expensive transmission and distribution lines. By established legal practice, the valuation of this entire system must be used as a rate base and your rate allocated so that you pay merely your just share of a fair return upon the total capital structure, which is only reasonable and . . ."

The city attorney interrupts: "Mr. Chairman, just a moment. The gentleman is wrong. In the Martinsville, Indiana, case, decided January 9, this year, the United States Supreme Court held, in effect, that valuation of an entire superpower system is not necessary to establish a rate base. Martinsville took the average system cost per kilowatt hour of delivering current to the city's gateway. It then added the ascertained local step-down and distribution cost per kilowatt hour, and so fixed the schedules. Roy Husselman, a Cleveland engineer employed by the city, has given an interesting history of this case in a paper which I have read in conjunction with the decisions of the federal courts. Hence, we can disregard this vast capitalization, including water, over which my friend grows so eloquent, and first turn our attention to what it costs to deliver current at the door of our city."

The mayor asks: "What was the wholesale cost at Martinsville?"

The city attorney answers: "On that system it was 1.72 cents per kilowatt hour."

A spokesman for the Citizens' Union chimes in: "That's about right. An engineer by the name of T. Herbert Clegg made a study of the wholesale prices paid to private systems by forty-five municipalities which owned their own distribution lines. The figures ran from 9 mills to 2.6 cents per kilowatt hour, with an average of 1.25 cents. He found large and medium-sized factories paying an average of 1.5 cents and large consumers, like railways, 9 mills per kilowatt hour, or even less. This gives us reasonably accurate figures on wholesale prices from private companies on which to base our tentative estimates."

"Very well," remarks the chairman, "what does it cost to distribute current within the city limits? That seems to be the big mystery."

A member of the city council gets the floor. "I have been studying that point. Major Clayton W. Pike, consulting engineer retained by the New York Power Authority, analyzed the official reports of the private power companies doing business in that State. He found that the average State-wide local distributing cost for domestic users was 2.36 cents per kilowatt hour. I noted also that in public systems domestic distribution costs are much less. In London, Ontario, it is 5.5 mills per kilowatt hour, as shown in the paper by Engineer E. V. Buchanan. London is a member of the great superpower system of Ontario. Engineer E. F. Scatergood of the Los Angeles public plant reports 1.68 cents per kilowatt hour, and Engineer J. D. Ross of Seattle's City Light reports 1.68 cents. These contrasts give us something to think about if we are aiming at the cheapest possible electric service for our town. The difference in distribution costs as between the public plants noted puzzled me until I found that Ontario municipalities finance plant construction and extensions wholly from bonds, sell at cost (which includes both capital and operating costs), and have a monopoly, whereas the Seattle plant competes with a private company and finances a good deal of plant extension out of profits, which keeps their rates higher to that extent. Los Angeles also could reduce rates if it did not finance considerable construction and improvements from surplus profits."

The local company counsel rises to remark: "The fallacy in the argument lies in the fact that these municipal plants do not pay taxes, while we contribute hundreds of dollars in taxes every year." Whereat a delegate from the women's group responds with cool sarcasm: "Well, we have found out that you only pay 2 or 3 mills per kilowatt hour for taxes, while we deserve a rate reduction of several cents per kilowatt hour. Besides which, you do not amortize your investment and pay off your debt which serves as a rate base, while the public plants do. So that's that!"

After the laughter subsides the chairman of the Citizens' Union is recognized. "The ladies appear to want double the amount of electricity for the same price. That may seem unreasonable, but their demand is justified by a remarkable chart, exhibited by Engineer Ross of Seattle at the New York conference and reproduced in Mr. Cooke's book. I have had it copied on this huge cardboard so that you all might see it." He exhibits the following table:

EFFECT OF COST ON USE

1931	Rate (Cents)	Average Consumption		Average Bill
		Kilowatt Hours Monthly	Yearly	Monthly	Yearly
All Private Power
Concerns in U. S.	5.78	48.6	583.2	$2.81	$33.72
Twenty-six Cities of
Ontario	1.45	148.3	1,779.6	2.14	25.68
Seattle Municipal
Plant	2.818	91.5	1,098.0	2.68	30.94
Tacoma Municipal
Plant	1.726	129.2	1,550.3	2.23	26.77
Winnipeg Municipal
Plant	.879	347.0	4,169.0	3.05	36.64

"This proves," he continues, "that low rates are the real salesmen for large domestic usage. Note that Winnipeg householders, paying less than 1 cent per kilowatt hour, buy on the average nearly 350 kilowatt hours per month, or seven times as much as the average United States householder, who pays nearly 6 cents and uses less than 50 kilowatt hours."

It is next brought out by the engineer of the city water works that Major Pike has devised a simple formula by the aid of which city authorities, or any group, with the help of an electrical engineer, can work out an approximate rate schedule which will provide lower rates and yet be just to the company, or equally well serve as a guide for the rates of a prospective municipal plant. The editor of a local paper expresses fear that all this agitation, especially for lower rates, will decrease the value of utility securities, many thousands of dollars of which are owned by local citizens, including widows and orphans. He is answered by a business man, who says: "It will have a bad effect only on speculative stocks. Having lost several thousand dollars in Insull holding-company securities, I have my eye teeth cut. If the electrical industry is not going to abandon that sort of business and get down to an honest return on an honest investment in its operating companies, the quicker we know it the better."

The local banker, who carries the private company's deposits, will here doubtless want to know by what process such results could possibly be achieved by novices even with the aid of an engineer. An electrical worker responds: "That is simple. First get your wholesale cost, say 1½ cents per kilowatt hour. Next get the sub-station cost of stepping down the current from high to low voltage. Engineer Otto M. Rau shows it to be around 3 mills per kilowatt hour. Next make an inventory of the company's property used in distribution—the number of poles, length of wire, underground ducts, number and kind of transformers, meters, and so on. Make that inventory for each class of customers, such as stores, factories, streets, and homes. These figures computed with reference to load factor and other factors in Major Pike's formula such as density, measured by the length of wire per average customer, the percentage of wires under ground, the number of kilowatt hours used, and so forth, will give the base for reasonably accurate rate schedules. Add to the wholesale cost, which is fixed, the distribution cost in each class, and you get an average rate for each class of customers. By such a process the average domestic rate in this town ought not to exceed 4 cents per kilowatt hour. We are paying 8 cents. I could almost do the job myself, but I would like to work at it with an engineer."

The discussion concludes. The chairman of the League of Women Voters moves, and the motion is seconded by the chairman of the Citizens' Union, "that it is the sense of the citizens' groups that the city council should employ an independent electrical engineer to make an inventory of the company's property within the city limits, and that if the money available in the city treasury for such a purpose is not enough it be supplemented by a fund raised by popular subscription."

Enterprising citizens will have little difficulty in getting official action. If the mayor or the city council has not originated the move, they will at this time take the lead. At the close of the meeting the city attorney will remark:

"I congratulate you on this action. I have long doubted the advisability of launching a rate case of the usual sort against this powerful monopoly. However, with this new method, I am sure we can establish a case which neither the State commission nor the courts can ignore or overthrow. With a minimum expenditure of time and money we can secure lower rates. The Martinsville case opens the legal door. If this fails, our only recourse is a municipal plant."

[This is the eighth of a series of articles on electric power and the consumer. The ninth will appear soon.]

Czecho-Slovakia's Nazi Neighbors

By EGON ERWIN KISCH

THERE is life in the border hills again. As once King Frederick and later Napoleon studied the maps of the mountain range that separates Silesia and Saxony from Bohemia, considering the relative merits of the passes of Nollendorf, Kulm, and Zinnwald, so German pacifists are studying them today. They and many others—the men and women who have made their escape from the great concentration camp that the masters of Germany have called "Grosse Erhebung" (the great upheaval), and the many victims of that form of "national" training that finds expression in castor oil, steel whips, mutilation, pogroms, suicides, and shooting "while trying to escape." All of them are making a desperate attempt to find their way into Czecho-Slovakia over the wild ridges and passes of the frontier.

A day of precipitous flight from the home to the station to catch any train that approaches the border region is followed by a night on foot along lonely, densely overgrown, and often dangerous footpaths. Everywhere the Brown Terror is on the watch. In the border inns whole divisions of Nazis are quartered. Nazi patrols crash through the shrubbery with their bloodhounds. Nazi watchmen are placed on look-out posts with powerful field glasses and searchlights.

At every railroad crossing storm troopers, armed with carbines, stand guard. Nor is he safe who has managed to put the frontier posts behind him. Hitler's hangmen get their victims from Czecho-Slovakian territory with impunity. The Nazis in the German sections of Czecho-Slovakia render eager assistance; there is a liberal price on the head of every fugitive.

In Kreibitz a fugitive is given shelter by his comrades. In the middle of the night an automobile drives up to the house. A "comrade" who has secretly joined the Nazis is at the door with three "fugitives," for whom he begs temporary refuge. Before the householder can reply they have spied his guest. Revolvers are drawn, the helpless victim is stunned with blows on the head, kicked down the stairs, and dragged senseless into the automobile. No one has seen him since.

Regular battles have occurred in these frontier towns. In the night preceding Sunday, March 5, twenty workers returning from a festival arranged by a local workers' singing society were attacked and shot at on Czecho-Slovakian soil in front of the Gasthaus Blechhammer near Weipert by from sixty to eighty heavily armed SA (Sturm-Abteilung) and SS (Schutz-Staffel) troopers from the German towns of Bärenstein and Kühnburg. In Weipert itself three workers were overpowered by German SA troopers and taken across the border. The Czecho-Slovakian authorities ordered an investigation of the incident but no official statement has so far been forthcoming; it is said, however, that the garrison stationed at Weipert has been increased to 150 men.

In Ullersdorf, between Grottau and Zittau, according to a notice in the Reichenberger Vorwärts, German storm divisions, aided by the Czecho-Slovakian gendarmerie and custom guards, searched the homes of workers who were known to the Socialist functionaries, looking for refugees. They alleged they were looking for smuggled goods. A few days later Czecho-Slovakian gendarmes from Platten arrested the Communist, Franz Nesvetal, a municipal councilor from Johanngeorgenstadt in Saxony who had sought and found refuge in the Barringer territory, and delivered him across the border into the hands of SA troopers.

But there is really no need of the all too willing Czech police. The SA man is sufficient unto himself since he no longer fears persecution for his misdeeds at the hands of a protecting government. A troop of these fellows makes a pleasure trip across the border to Ebersdorf, for instance, in the Friedland district. On reaching their destination they kidnap the young worker, Elster, for having distributed leaflets during the municipal-election campaign, and escort him to Görlitz, in Prussian Silesia.

Such happenings are customary in China. There it is not uncommon to hear that a provincial ruler has kidnapped a man from the neighboring province. Indeed, Europeans, Americans, and Japanese have justified a highly profitable interference in China with the argument that such kidnappings are permitted there; a nation, they argue, that is not able to protect the personal safety of its inhabitants cannot be intrusted with the management of its own affairs.

On the night of Wednesday, March 15, SA soldiers crossed the Erzgebirge frontier and made their way to Katharinaberg to search for two Social Democratic families which had fled from Germany. They forced their way into the Hotel Adler but their victims had already departed. Two young persons who were about to leave the hostelry were commanded to raise their hands. One of them, a young Social Democrat named Albin Schmieder, did not immediately obey their order. He was shot down and beaten with rubber clubs. In the hospital at Bruex it was found that he had been shot through the lung and was in a serious condition.

In Stolzenhain, on Czecho-Slovakian territory, is a vacation camp maintained by Jewish sport organizations. On March 16 at exactly 9 p.m. it was attacked and shot at by German Nazis. The gendarmerie patrol made an effort to arrest the attackers, but they wrested the gun out of the hands of one gendarme and forced the other at the point of a revolver to drop his weapon. Both policemen were then brutally beaten. The Nazi attackers withdrew jubilantly into the Dritte Reich, carrying with them the guns they had taken from the Czech guards.

Their next victim was Johann Ullsperger, who lives in Schwaderbach, a Czecho-Slovakian village, but has a little shop on German soil in which he manufactures parts for harmonicas. On Thursday, April 27, a small boy came to his home with a message that a customer was waiting for him in his shop. Ullsperger hurried over, was taken into custody by an SA trooper from Rodewisch, and carried off, no one knows where. Two brothers named Walter from Dittersbach and the thirteen-year-old son of one of them were attacked and beaten in a woods in Kunnersdorf and carried off as prisoners. From Schwaderbach three young workers, Gustav Langhammer, Max Sattler, and Theodor Müller, were taken to Klingenthal.

The train that runs between Reichenberg and Warnsdorf crosses German territory for a short distance where the borderline projects at a sharp angle into Bohemia. But the interior of the cars is, according to international agreement, under Czecho-Slovakian jurisdiction. Nevertheless, storm troopers arrest whom, when, and where they please, and they know where their victims may be reached. Their Nazi comrades in the enemy's country take care of that. It is their business to know who is a Socialist and when he crosses the border. And those who live on the frontier can hardly avoid an occasional trip into the neighboring country.

In many Bohemian families in that part of the country it is traditional for the men of the family to cross the border each morning to their daily work in the factories of Saxony. The great-grandfather began it, and grandfather, father, son, and grandson became in turn seasonal workers in Germany. What they did with their evenings, Sundays, and holidays in Bohemia no factory owner, foreman, or colleague at the work bench ever bothered to inquire. At home they were municipal councilors or star-gazers, Socialists or herb doctors, free thinkers or beer drinkers, book worms or card players. No one knew or cared. Under the Nazis all this is changed. Incur the enmity of a Nazi in Bohemia and you lose your job at the work bench at which your great-grandfather worked before you.

Worse still is the lot of those who, like frontier folk everywhere, make their living off the price ratio on either side of the border. The unemployed Bohemian who attempts to eke out a precarious existence by smuggling salt, tobacco, Black Forest clocks, bridge cards, pine-needle bath salts, or cigarette lighters across the border must beware, if he is in bad with the Nazis at home, not only of the customs guards but of the SA as well, to whom his most secret paths are betrayed.

Self-protective organizations called into being by Social Democrats and Communists to defend their members from National Socialist attacks have been suppressed by the government. Officially Czecho-Slovakia is adhering to a middle course, striking out against all extremists both right and left, in the interests of democratic government. Actually the Czech democracy is helping fascism into the saddle.

The Memory of Music

By IRWIN EDMAN

The memory of music
Itself is music; deep
Below the singing heard by ears,
It murmurs, half asleep.

Till at some twilight wakened,
It brings the heart release,
Its glory now an echo,
Its echo soft with peace.

More Relief for the Farmers

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, July 12

ON July 9 the government began collecting a processing tax of 30 cents on every bushel of wheat used in the manufacture of food products for domestic consumption. The tax is to be levied whether the wheat is grown in this country or shipped in from abroad. In the latter connection it serves automatically to increase the present 42-cent tariff on wheat to 72 cents. The tax will not be applied against wheat destined for export or for the farmer's own use. The proceeds of the levy are to be distributed as a form of government bounty or subsidy to farmers who agree to reduce their wheat acreage in 1934 and 1935.

This is the first definite measure of major importance taken under that section of the Roosevelt recovery program dealing with the needs of the farmers. Since May 12, when the new farm relief act became effective, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has been perfecting its own organization, a task not yet completed. It has been gathering and analyzing statistics to determine how much acreage should be taken out of production and the amount of the processing tax to be levied against wheat, cotton, tobacco, and other farm products that come within the scope of the law. It has had thousands of agents in the field, assembling information and explaining to the farmers the purposes and requirements of this newest farm-relief program.

No little courage was needed to proclaim a wheat-processing tax in face of the recent tremendous rise in grain prices. The price of wheat had already increased approximately 100 per cent, May futures going as high as $1 on the Chicago Board of Trade, when the announcement was made. The tax would have the effect of adding another 30 per cent. The potential price of wheat products would thereby be increased, and that might antagonize the consumers. It was also possible that the farmers might not take kindly to the idea of reducing their acreage at a time when a rising market appeared to promise a fair return on their normal production. Yet Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and his assistants saw clearly that the price rise was due to abnormal conditions. The shortness of the 1933 crop, gambling in grains by brokers and private speculators, and several other factors contributed to the rise. A full crop next year, which would necessarily mean an increase in the existing surplus, would unquestionably bring the price down again, leading perhaps to renewed demoralization of agriculture. Hence it was decided to put the allotment plan into effect at once so that it would be in operation before the farmers began sowing the 1934 crop. In no other way could the administration be assured that production next year would be adjusted to the estimated needs of the country, which is one of the objectives of the recovery program.

Other processing taxes are to be proclaimed within a short time. The tax on cotton is to be put into effect on August 1, and the remainder soon thereafter. The preliminary work on these matters can be undertaken in Washington, for they have to do largely with statistics. But no processing tax and no acreage-reduction plan could possibly succeed unless the farmers were disposed to cooperate with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. The National Recovery Administration can center its efforts almost entirely in Washington. The manufacturing industries are so organized that they can send representatives here to work out agreements with General Hugh S. Johnson's office. The agricultural administration, on the other hand, must deal with millions of farmers spread over the country. Neither Secretary Wallace nor George Peek, the agricultural administrator, can enter into a single agreement with the farming industry as a whole or even with any specialized branch of that industry. They have to negotiate a separate agreement with each individual farmer. In order to arrive at an equitable understanding in each case, as well as to obtain the co-operation of the farmers as a whole, the agricultural administration has been compelled to assemble a gigantic corps of field agents, and this corps will in all likelihood have to be increased rather than reduced in size as the farm recovery plan is put into complete operation.

In the last several weeks I have discussed the Roosevelt farm program with sixty or more farmers in various sections of Maryland and Virginia. I have found about three out of four skeptical as to the outcome of the administration plan but nevertheless willing to go along with that program. Probably 10 to 15 per cent of the farmers were enthusiastic, convinced that the program would prove successful in all its essential aims. Another 10 per cent were just as convinced that the scheme would fail, and in any case were not inclined to cooperate unless compelled to do so. Judging by both official and private reports received here, the latter in the form of press association dispatches from the farm centers, the frame of mind of the agricultural population as a whole is about as I found it in Virginia and Maryland.

This is not to say that the farmers are not anxious to squeeze whatever personal or selfish advantage they can out of the relief plan. When the cotton growers were asked, with a view to estimating how much of their land should be taken out of production, how much cotton they had raised in the last five years, many of them padded their reports, in some instances by as much as 250 per cent, for they were to be compensated for the acreage plowed under in accordance with the productivity of their land. It was no doubt a tactical mistake for the literal-minded subordinate officials of the agricultural administration to publish the fact that the cotton growers were seeking to take advantage of the situation. When Secretary Wallace, who was absent at the time, returned to Washington, he promptly issued a denial. He probably saw that even the slightest suggestion that one group of farmers was not cooperating wholeheartedly and unselfishly would have an adverse effect on the attitude of other groups.

Where or with whom the idea arose of asking the cotton farmers to plow under a part of their growing cotton is not clear. Late in June Charles J. Brand, co-administrator, declared that 25 per cent of the growing crop would have to be destroyed forthwith in order to prevent an increase in the existing surplus, which Brand felt might drive the price down to somewhere around 3 cents a pound. On the same day President Roosevelt threw his weight behind this proposal, declaring he had "every confidence that the cotton producer will face the facts and cooperate fully in the reasonable and practical plan that is proposed." It will be recalled that on August 12, 1931, Herbert Hoover's Farm Board proposed "the immediate plowing under of every third row of cotton now growing." This suggestion was universally condemned. The Nation, for one, declared:

Even conceding that it were possible to put such a plan into effect it would be little short of criminal. This does not mean that the members of the Farm Board who suggested the plan had themselves any criminal intent; they are merely well-intentioned men whose economic beliefs are simple, naive, and tragically muddle-headed. Why is cotton down? Because there is an oversupply. Therefore we need simply destroy the surplus, and everything will be well. That is the essence of the Farm Board's economics. But if it works for cotton, it should work for everything else. . . . Therefore let the nations of the world take hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat, thousands of tons of sugar, rubber, and copper, and millions of barrels of oil and dump them all into the sea. Then prices will go up, prosperity will return with a rush, we shall all be jubilant, and a Republican victory will be assured.

The producers have been rather reluctantly subscribing to this latest proposal to destroy a part of the cotton crop. For sentimental reasons they are opposed to plowing under growing plants upon which they have spent a great deal of labor. And they feel that with prices rising they may stand to realize more by selling all of their crop on the open market than by destroying a part of it in return for a government subsidy. However, the agricultural administration's corps of 22,000 special agents in the cotton belt (most of whom, it must be said, are volunteer workers) have been convincing the producers that they stand to gain more in terms of hard cash by cooperating with the government than by gambling on a continued rise in the cotton market. While the cotton-destruction campaign is still far from its goal, enough farmers have already agreed to the plan to make it appear certain that some time before the end of the present year more than 1,600,000,000 pounds of growing cotton, worth at the present market more than $160,000,000, will be plowed under. Whether this will suffice to buoy up the market and bring the cotton grower an equitable return on his investment and labor remains to be seen.

It is a curious fact that while agricultural prices have been rising in the last few months, the operation of the Agricultural Adjustment Act has had nothing directly to do with that rise, for the law, to all practical purposes, has only now begun operating. While the Roosevelt program is designed to increase farm prices, the present boom may result disastrously for that program. Upon several occasions since 1929 the farmers have been misled by false booms. In October and November, 1931, wheat rose 25 cents. The usual ballyhoo about the return of prosperity appeared in the daily press and the trade journals. Bradstreet's weekly review reported that "the farmers are benefited by the advance and their buying is expected to be a factor in helping a return to prosperity." Actually, however, little wheat was coming into the markets from the farms, and when it began to arrive in fairly large quantities late in November, the speculators, to quote the New York Evening Post, took advantage of the situation "to unload on the first 10-cent break." Again in the summer of 1932 hog prices started up, rising from $3.50 late in May to $5.55 in the second week of July. And again cheery headlines appeared: Live Stock Rise Heartens Farmers and West Smiles Again as Hog Prices Rise. The latter headline appeared over a Chicago dispatch to the New York Times, which reported that the live-stock boom was "causing the Western farmer to smile again and the nation in general to feel that beef and pork may be leading the way upward from the depression." But further down in the same dispatch may be found the real explanation for the rise:

When prices were lowest early in the spring no one apparently wanted cattle, hogs, or sheep. Farmers were broke, or so nearly so that they were almost panicky in trying to sell their live stock to pay rent, mortgages, and other expenses. It was said to be one of the best clean-outs that the industry has known in years. . . . Suddenly it was discovered that the liquidation from the farms had run its course.

And then hog prices began to go up. The farmer had been cleaned out and could not take advantage of the rise at that time, but when he again had marketable live stock to dispose of prices promptly slumped.

There is little question that the disillusionment created by these false booms contributed to the political revolt against the Hoover Administration. Secretary Wallace appears to realize that something of the same sort may happen if the present boom collapses. There is first the natural inclination of the average citizen to blame his misfortunes on the political powers. Secondly, the extraordinary publicity received by the Roosevelt farm program has tended to identify the price rise with the operation of that program. If prices should now go down, many farmers will be disposed to attribute the downturn to the failure of the Roosevelt program or to the shortcomings of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. That obviously would make it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain their cooperation, which is essential to the success of the program. It was doubtless for this reason that Wallace some weeks ago warned the grain trade against allowing the boom to make too rapid headway.

The increase in industrial prices has likewise disturbed the Roosevelt Administration. Here, indeed, lies the real problem. If the prices of the things the farmers must buy go up, the farmers will be relatively no better off than they are now even though farm prices also go up. Yet it is hard to see how this can be prevented. A bull market in grains or cotton is almost always accompanied by a rise in other commodity prices. Moreover, the second major objective of the Roosevelt Administration is to increase the purchasing power of the urban workers. To the extent that this will enable city dwellers to buy more farm produce the farmers will be helped, but to increase the pay of the factory mechanic and city worker is also to add to the cost of producing the tools and other goods the farmer needs, and increased production costs invariably lead to higher prices. The outward implications of this problem seem to be understood by Wallace, Peek, Johnson, and other officials concerned. General Johnson has warned industry against "any wild-cat price lifting." Wallace has threatened to bring anti-trust proceedings against profiteers. But unless these officials know how to balance industrial production costs (i. e., prices) and urban purchasing power against farm income they are likely to fall far short of their goal. And there is no certain evidence that they do know how to strike such a balance.

Some officials seem to believe that the trick can be turned by restoring prices to the 1909-13 level. "We chose that period," Wallace has said, "because the prices the farmers got for their crops in those years and the prices they paid for manufactured goods and urban services most nearly approached an equitable relationship." It is possible, of course, that basic conditions may have changed so greatly in the meantime that a return to the 1909-13 price levels will not bring about the balance desired. Other officials have talked a great deal about the necessity of controlling prices and preventing "extortionate practices," but they speak in the vaguest and most general terms. When General Johnson was asked to explain the meaning of some of these terms, he replied: "Now, I can't sit here and define the beginning of extortion and extortionate prices. But the American public damn well knows what they mean." Unhappily, the American public does not. Nor could anyone know what constitutes an unfair or inequitable industrial price level, from the standpoint of the farmer's economic interests, unless a really serious and scientific effort were made to balance all of the factors entering into the national economy, including savings, investments, prices, wages, and profits. There is no indication that the Roosevelt Administration has anything of the sort in mind.

"I Don't Believe in Democracy"

By ROBERT HERRICK

HER finger nails were so vividly red that one could not for long keep one's eyes off them; her black eyebrows were plucked to a thin line; a broad smiling mouth. A product of Chicago, all the blood in her for two generations being drawn from Chicago, she was a neighbor of the late lamented Insull—or she had been until the utility magnate transferred his residence from Chicago to Athens.

"A nice man," she assured me, "and a very good neighbor!" (She explained how he had good-naturedly let her have milk from his prize herd, which had greatly benefited her children.)

"All the same he was an expensive citizen for many of his neighbors," I suggested.

She fired at once. "Oh, Sam Insull is all right—he was just unfortunate. If this dreadful depression hadn't upset everything, we should all have been for him still, as we all were before."

I recalled the last tale I had heard of a widow who had been advised to put her husband's insurance money into one of the numerous Insull holding companies and was now literally in the bread line.

"If she had made some money in it, she would have thought him a grand man," the ruby-red-fingered lady commented cynically.

"Just the same," I suggested, "he is no better than a common thief who has taken money from his employer's till." She looked at me coldly out of the almond eyes from under the plucked eyebrows. "Why?" she said. "He was just unlucky. If we had gone on making money with him, as we once did, we shouldn't have cared how he made it!"

"Even when he took the securities of his sound companies that were already pledged and put them up at the banks as collateral for his personal loans?"

That was a too subtle distinction. She came back to the old argument of ends and means. "He used the money to sustain the market for all his stocks, didn't he?"

"At least, it was bad judgment! And what's worse, he didn't own the securities. They belonged to the holders of the debentures he had sold to the public."

She shrugged her not unlovely shoulders as though to say I was becoming tiresome. It was merely human to grasp at any straw when one was drowning, even somebody else's straw. It was evidently time to change the topic. "You know Mrs. L.?" she asked, and we talked about Chicago acquaintances. "The poor L's—they have lost everything, everything they had, in Kreuger and Toll!"

"Oh!"

"Yes, the son-in-law was with Lee, Higginson, and he put all their money into Kreuger and Toll!"

"More unfortunates who guessed wrong," I murmured.

"All the partners lost too," she said proudly.

Remembering a handsome villa where one of the partners still lived in comparative affluence I ventured: "Not quite everything. At least D. didn't!"

"Oh, that's his wife's money—she was a very rich woman, you know."

I recalled a Boston gentleman who had said of these unfortunate bankers: "They are all honorable men, every one of them! Why, Frank X is a cousin of mine—I won't believe anything bad of them!" (At what point do negligence, incompetence, and stupidity become criminal? But the cousin of Frank X was no more interested in such ethical subtleties than my red-fingernailed lady.) We turned to broader topics—the banking situation, the government, which she regarded as a joke, the outlook for the future.

"What this country needs," she announced with an air of newly discovered wisdom, "is leadership! Most people are morons." She stretched the red fingernails toward the cigarette box, accepted a light, and after a long inhalation turned full upon me. "I don't believe in democracy anyway!" she said daringly.

"No? Not really!"

"The mass of people are morons," she repeated. "How should they know what is good for them? They have to be told."

"By the Insulls, the Kregers, the Lee, Higginsons, the Mitchells, the—"

She interrupted my honor role of American leadership, and looking at me as if I were the ambassador from Moscow she shot back: "No thinking person these days believes in democracy!"

"Have we ever tried it—yet?" I protested weakly.

"Democracy has failed," she pronounced positively, "it's time we tried something else."

"So? And who is your candidate for dictator? Sam Insull or Smedley Butler?"

She looked at me witheringly out of those slits beneath the plucked eyebrows, but before she could annihilate me our hostess intervened—"We'll have our coffee in the garden."

Chicago, I reflected, was surely growing up when its leading citizenesses had so entirely outgrown the democratic ideal. Mrs L. (the lady whose son-in-law was one of those confiding bankers that intrusted their personal fortunes and those of innumerable clients to the match king) also did not believe in democracy the last time I met her; she had talked with glib disdain of "morons," meaning plain people, and "strong men," meaning Kreugers, Insulls, Mitchells, et al.—although her grandfather had entered the United States via Ellis Island. Was that to be woman's special contribution to our political life—contempt for democracy, admiration for fascism? Perhaps. No women's voices have been raised in denunciation of the crooked bankers, the thieving promoters, and all the other maggots that have been eating at our social foundations. No woman stockholder (and few men) has ever protested against hundred-thousand-dollar executive salaries and million-dollar bonuses. "To those that have it shall be given, and from those who have not even the little that they have shall be taken away"—so runs Holy Writ (but not in their sense!).

To an old-fashioned American like myself this universal indifference to dishonesty, the moral callousness of our supposedly "best people," is the amazing fact of the day. Mr. Lewis correctly portrays his intelligent modern heroine as caring nothing whatever about her grafting lover's crime, but only about the unlucky fact that he got caught and had to go to prison for a few months. It may be that our troubles lie deeper than unbalanced budgets, mortgage indebtedness which cannot be paid, unemployment, and the gold standard, all those problems they are frantically fussing over in Washington these days. The social infection which manifests itself in so many unpleasant symptoms may lie in the very fiber of American character itself, which no longer condemns crime when it attains six figures. Democracy, if it is to work at all requires a belief at least in the ideal of common honesty.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter, who has recently been drifting through the wide open spaces of this great nation, namely the Middle Western empire known as God's country, can report with confidence that fundamentally America stands firm. Iowa farmers may take the law into their own hands and put a rope around its neck; the unemployed may march to county courthouses and demand food for which they have not worked; but the fresh vegetable, that much publicized, vitamin-bearing commodity which modern children are being taught from the cradle to insist upon, has made no headway in the average American restaurant. The Drifter's experience of home cooking during his wanderings was limited, and he cannot be certain of his generalizations in that sphere, but he has a strong impression that there, too, the can is mightier than the word of dietitians, doctors, and writers for the women's pages.

* * * * *

CANNED goods, like the Saturday Evening Post, are uniform in quality and everywhere easily available. Also, they will keep indefinitely. Both will be just as good two years from now as they are at present. The fact that they are less nourishing and quite tasteless by comparison with the fresher, harder-won varieties, is apparently unavailing even when it is known—which is perhaps not surprising in a country whose citizens elect Republicans regularly until a depression comes along and then can think of nothing better to do than elect Democrats.

* * * * *

WHY, as a people, we prefer canned goods to fresh is a question that interests the Drifter profoundly. He is convinced that it is not laziness. He is inclined to think it is a logical product of our national experience and traditions. The prospector in his mountain camp looked upon a canned vegetable as the immensely desirable thing it then was, just as anything in print that got as far as California seemed to him the word of truth. The Drifter as a child preferred canned vegetables to fresh, mainly, he thinks, because the can looked citified and exotic and impressive. The fresh peas in the kitchen garden seemed dull in comparison. Likewise he believed everything he saw in newspapers and he thought Harold Bell Wright was a great writer. It is only after continuous and omniverous reading that a child grows tired of his favorites and feels the need for something stronger. It is only when one cultivates a taste for food that one discovers the superiority of fresh vegetables. The average American reads only because the office is closed or the golf links is not open. He eats only to satisfy hunger.

* * * * *

THE Drifter does not presume to quarrel with this attitude toward books and food. He merely reflects that if it were otherwise he would find the average restaurant more to his liking. He would, it is true, also miss an occasional amusing experience. Recently in a restaurant in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, he asked the waitress if she had any fresh vegetables. She bit her pencil and thought deeply for a moment. "No," she said finally, "the vegetables today are potatoes and macaroni, and neither one of 'em is fresh."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Puritanism in Russia

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

There was a bad inaccuracy in the review of my book by your Russian correspondent, Louis Fischer. Mr. Fischer speaks of Aaron Soltz as representing the extreme puritanical views in sex behavior as against Madame Kollontay's preaching of greater freedom. But Soltz, a member of the Central Control Commission and a man whose opinions carry great weight in Russia, is actually very liberal. Mr. Fischer was confusing Soltz and Professor Zalkind, an error forgivable in a ten-day tourist but a little surprising in a resident correspondent. It would be like confusing John S. Sumner with Judge Ben Lindsey in America.

Your reviewer gave the erroneous impression that the author of "Red Virtue" was a "hasty" tourist who knew no Russian. This is unfortunate since the jacket remarks about "Red Virtue" happen to be true. Mr. Fischer thinks the title unfortunate. He may be unaware that Socrates used the word "virtue" to mean "intelligence" or "wisdom," and this is the sense in which it was used in the title of my book—a sense, I may remark, most reviewers have gratifyingly well understood.

I may add that I was a little mystified by your reviewer's remark that he approached my book with prejudice because he considered me ill-qualified to undertake the task of writing it. It was Louis Fischer who suggested I write this book on just this subject.

Carmel, Cal., June 20

ELLA WINTER

Loan to China Is Opposed

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

On June 4 the United States government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, lent to the Nanking Government in China $50,000,000, not in cash, but in wheat and cotton. The entire quantity is to be shipped in American ships; the wheat is to be floured here; and the principal of the loan is guaranteed by a lien on taxes.

It happens that the last harvest was the best in China in a generation, both in wheat and in rice. China does not need wheat, and the market price of wheat on the Chinese market is lower than the American market price. Furthermore, China could profit by milling its own wheat. Finally, if wheat had to be bought, it could be more cheaply bought in markets nearer home.

These facts immediately show that the United States, taking advantage of its control over the puppet government of Chiang Kai-shek, is dumping wheat on the Chinese market. Thus, it further disorganizes and pauperizes the Chinese wheat growers and peasants. When the peasants prepared for the sowing they borrowed money from the usurers for supplies, rent, etc., on the promise of the probable money yield of the crop. Now they are faced with a greatly reduced return—and hence their further impoverishment. This "loan" has added $50,000,000 to the burden of the peasants.

This loan, furthermore, has been made to the Nanking Government—one of several in China. Besides the Nanking Government, there is the Cantonese, and the large Soviet districts which have a constitution and democratically elected officials of their own. It is perfectly evident that this loan has been made without regard for any interests but those of the American imperialists. Not only will the loan disorganize the Chinese market, but it is the Chinese people who will in the long run have to pay in taxes the exorbitant price for the wheat. They are forced to buy their own poison! The United States is relieving itself of its overburdening surpluses to the further impoverishment of the Chinese people. The higher freight charges on the American boats, the higher cost of flouring the wheat—these will add to the cost.

And even so, after the Chinese people are forced to pay for their own poison, will the wheat ever reach them? Chiang Kai-shek and his Finance Minister, T. V. Soong, have no intention of turning it over to the Chinese people. The wheat and the cotton will be used to feed and clothe their own troops, so that these very troops may continue their attacks on all opposed to Chiang Kai-shek; and the opposition now includes, since the Japanese invasion of Shanghai, and particularly since the Japanese invasion of North China and Chiang Kai-shek's capitulation and betrayal, the larger section of the Chinese people, the Volunteers (partisan troops, ill-armed, ill-outfitted which continue the struggle against Japan), and the Chinese Soviet areas. Not only will this army collect the taxes to repay the $50,000,000 loan, but it will be used to maintain Chiang Kai-shek's control.

We look upon the whole transaction as robbery—robbery of its own people by the puppet Nanking Government. We protest against America's activities in China. We demand recognition of the right of the Chinese people to solve their own destiny without imperialist intervention. This, of course, means that we demand that all imperialist Powers, including the United States, withdraw their troops from China.

If any loan is to be made to China which will actually be helpful to the Chinese people, then we demand that it be agreed to and administered by people without any predatory interest in the exploitation and oppression of the Chinese people. Certainly it cannot be made through the Nanking Government, which the whole world recognizes as a mere puppet in the hands of American imperialism.

J. LOEB, Executive Secretary,
The Friends of the Chinese People

New York City, July 1

Teaching on Promises

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

For thirteen years I have taught school, and this war-created depression has reduced my salary until next year (with a master's degree) I shall get less money than I have received during any year except two of my thirteen. I have built my own house on two acres of land which I own here. I like the West and I like sparsely settled sections, but this very liking has been my undoing. Apache County, Arizona, has not been financially able to pay a warrant for over a year. You understand that teachers receive their pay in school warrants, while highway employees, section men, doctors, lawyers, and nearly all others are paid in something which can be converted into silver or gold (until the United States became the official gold hoarder and guardian of all yellow metal). These warrants are registered for 6 per cent until called. They will be called sometime and the 6 per cent will be paid, but in the meantime I cannot feed my family on mere promises.

I have borrowed money on my life-insurance policies and am paying for two years of The Nation with that money. It is with borrowed money that I am also buying the few groceries and other articles that we need.

Do you know of some person who might buy my school warrants now and next year? If you can put me in touch with such people, I shall be very grateful to you.

I like to read your paper and I believe that I get more good from it than from any other paper with which I have ever come in contact. I like to read what I believe is the truth—and my daily paper does not always tell me the truth.

Saunders, Ariz., July 6

ELLSWORTH M. SCHNEBL

Adventures in Ecuador

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have read two articles recently in The Nation about opportunities for students to make trips through Europe under the auspices of non-profit, educational organizations. To date I have heard very little of opportunities of this kind for the student interested in traveling through South America. To give a ray of hope to those who already have experienced Europe and are ready for the lands that lie beneath the Southern Cross, or to those who prefer to know the South American continent first, may I tell through your columns of my own experiences?

With a third-class steamer passage to Guayaquil, Ecuador, and $25 in my pockets, I left New York City on May 12, 1932. I have lived more than a year in Ecuador, enjoying myself thoroughly, seeing nearly all of the colorful Ecuadorian Andes.

In addition, I made probably the first North American student expedition through the upper Amazon valley, pushing far into the jungle and coming in contact with many tribes of Indians. This jungle trip, made with only an Indian as guide and cargo-bearer, lasted almost two months and cost me $6, including everything.

I came to Ecuador with absolutely no experience in foreign travel and with merely a superficial college "required-course" knowledge of Spanish grammar. I am twenty-six years old and have unusually good health. I was graduated from the University of Nevada in 1929, and have lived two years in New York City.

After spending considerable time traveling and visiting, I settled in Quito, doing odd bits of work, and finally got placed as English tutor in a wealthy Ecuadorian family. This detail is just to indicate to the young, healthy, and footloose would-be traveler that it takes no extraordinary amount of ability or money to do those things he may have dreamed about but thought beyond his reach.

Should any Nation readers be interested in making the trip through Ecuador I would be delighted to help in every possible way—estimating costs and telling about routes, train schedules, modes of travel, communication, living conditions, and the like. Write to me, P. O. Box 660, Quito, Ecuador.

Quito, Ecuador, June 12

ELMER KELLEY LYON

The fourth and last of a series of articles on Walter Lippmann by Amos Pinchot will appear next week.

FILMS

"THIS IS AMERICA"

The amazing story of our lifetime.

A courageous picturization of the American scene.

Produced by Frederic Ullman, Jr.

Written by Gilbert Seldes

Doors Open
9:30 A. M.

RIVOLI always

C. O. O. L.

UNITED ARTISTS

8 WAY at 49th St

Beginning Fri. July 21—First American Showing of AMKIND'S

BORN ANEW

The Cultural Revolution in Soviet Russia from the human side.

Acted by a CULTURAL SHOCK BRIGADE of the Cannery Workers Club in DAGHESTAN—ALL NATIVE CAST.

ACME THEATRE 14th ST. and UNION SQ. Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

DEATH OR A LIVING GRAVE?

Perjury Forged
this Chain

World Premiere
"THE
STRANGE CASE OF TOM MOONEY"

The Picture that will free Him

Starting Friday July 21st

RKO CAMEO

42nd St. & Broadway—9 A. M. to 1 P. M. 25c

Ignoble and Unhealthful

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Granville Hicks's intelligent review of my volume "This People" gives me a legitimate opening to make two observations which, at this moment in history and in Jewish history, are of crucial importance. Defending me against the idiotic charge of substituting propaganda for art, Mr. Hicks continues: "It happens that Lewisohn's assumptions are not shared by many people." Is that a fact? Is not the active negation of the fathers that begot and the mothers that bore one, and by consequence of the historic community from which one sprang, considered among all mankind an ignoble and unhealthful thing, which is not likely to lead either to sound action or to sound productivity? And have not the psychologists equated this self-negation with a lack of self-esteem as a fairly constant element in the neuroses? There were Americans at one period of our history who, ashamed of Iowa or Kansas, became, as they thought, French. One knows the kind of Frenchmen they became.

To symbolize this universal human problem by Jewish characters and situations is most legitimate, since the Diaspora has offered Jews the longest and grimmest temptation toward this error and this sin. Yet so powerful has been the fundamental stuff of which the Jewish soul is made that we are a more numerous people today than we have ever been. The content of the plea which not I alone but many who are wiser than I address to the Jewish people can again be stated in universally human terms as follows: human freedom consists in the affirmation of the inevitable, or, if one likes, in achieving by that process which the church calls grace and the synagogue teshuvah an identification of one's will with the will of God.

Paris, April 19

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Misery in the Coal Fields

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Leaky roofs and broken windows. Rooms almost bare of furniture. Beds without mattresses and only rags for covering. Families of father, mother, and from five to nine children. Hardly a crumb to eat in the house. These are not uncommon sights in many of the coal camps in the soft-coal areas. Much sickness due to unsanitary conditions and lack of proper food is found in these mining regions. The available government funds for feeding starving children must be supplemented.

The American Friends Service Committee (Quakers) not only is administering relief and establishing health units in various sections of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky as rapidly as funds permit, but with characteristic farsightedness has also launched significant reconstruction projects. Community gardening, canning, furniture-making, weaving, shoe-making, and farm placement play important roles in the reconstruction program. The introduction of these self-help industries into these deserted communities brings a touching response of life and hope among long-destitute people. But these projects cannot continue unless more support can be obtained.

Desperately needy communities throughout the soft-coal areas are crying aloud for such constructive aid. You can help by sending contributions to Olive Van Horn, treasurer, Coal Areas Relief, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York; and clothing to the American Friends Service Committee, 1515 Cherry Street, Philadelphia.

New York, July 15

JAMES MYERS,

Industrial Secretary, Federal Council of Churches

Books and Films

Iberian Coast

By GEORGE DILLON

The boats stray in. The sunset has released
Across the world its last torn banner of light:
Blood-red, and spectral green, and from the east
Noiselessly surging, the blue starry night.

In sunsets such ■ this, upon this shore,
The dark boys who in ancient times became Great mariners—watching the huge tricolor
Dragged slowly westward, watching the red flame

Glare on the wings of seabirds themselves lost
In darkness, and the long line of reddened foam
Where the black water broke on the black coast—
Grew restless. Leaving upon this shore, at home,

Nothing but the wild beauty that drove them forth,
Long since they have hauled their anchors and sailed away,
To perish without sons in the four corners of earth.
The dark boys lying in the doorways today

Are not of that breed. The archaic brightness dulls
As if forever, ■ if no more to dawn:
It catches in their eyes and on the gulls,
And from the world is gone.

Whittier

Quaker Militant: John Greenleaf Whittier. By Albert Mordell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

THE effort to write a "popular" biography of John Greenleaf Whittier must be a particularly difficult and disconcerting business. This was the task that Albert Mordell set himself, and obligingly he has unearthed a few unpublished poems and discovered ■ hidden love affair, a "dark lady" by the name of Mary Emerson Smith. Heartened by this find, Mr. Mordell evidently decided to go a number of steps farther, and having at hand an attractive portrait of Whittier as a young man—fiery eyes, crisp black hair, and square, straight shoulders—he made the most of his advantages. He concluded that Whittier, after being severely jilted by the mysterious Miss Smith, became ■ male flirt, coy, elusive, cold. Then he read the anti-slavery poems and felt that these revealed the real Whittier, a young, fighting Quaker in whose veins ran quick, hot blood—blood, by the way, that was considerably cooled by the misfortune of having boiled in vain for love of a young lady.

This, then, in brief, is Mr. Mordell's thesis, and since he admires the rolling thunder of Whittier's early Abolitionist poetry, he finds himself forced to regard his hero grown into middle and old age ■ ■ bedridden, mincing turncoat, the blood-red radical transformed into an anemic, lily-fingered Tory. I happen to think that Mr. Mordell's eyes were blinded by love letters, and that in reading them he has misread ■ large body of Whittier's poetry. Let us reexamine Mr. Mordell's patiently assembled facts and the internal evidence contained in Whittier's verse.

Whittier was of New England Quaker stock, and his earliest traceable ancestors came from England to Haverhill, Massachusetts, during the first half of the seventeenth century. It was there that the Whittier family remained in hard-earned Yankee soil until the poet grew to manhood. There was nothing in the poet's background that would breed radical or revolutionary activity beyond a fierce declaration of personal rights, including those of property and religious conviction. I am inclined to believe that from the very start of his career Whittier was a profoundly religious man, and that his religious fervor was readily translatable into ■ peculiarly New England love of liberty, the liberty that granted all property-owners the right to defend a point of view within the whitewashed walls of the meeting-house. This was an introverted love and quite consistent with the few conclusively known facts of Whittier's emotional life. His distrust of a Virginian aristocracy and his hatred of slave traffic were those of an intense nationalist who feared instinctively any code of living other than the economy practiced by ■ New England farmer. The very existence of the Southern States threatened his own privileges as a Protestant and his security as a Yankee. It seems preposterous to accuse him of turning his coat in the face of the Chicago anarchists; his war for human liberty was ■ holy war that had behind it no conscious economic motive. Mr. Mordell admits Whittier's vast ignorance of industrial economics, and his refusal to look beyond the limitations of a dying agricultural democracy. Whittier's use of Biblical reference in his anti-slavery poetry was apt and just, and for him emotionally true, for he saw America as the Plains of Abraham mystically recreated into ■ Massachusetts countryside.

With one exception I fail to share Mr. Mordell's admiration for Whittier's anti-slavery poems. Remembering Whittier's origin as ■ poet I believe it is best to select certain facts from the many that Mr. Mordell has rediscovered. Literary influences came to him from Burns, then Byron, then Milton; and we are sure that he valued his local celebrity as a newspaper poet no less than an ability to write with the speed and ease of an editor preparing daily copy. Of course he wrote far too much, and in the process of hasty writing failed to fuse Burns's simplicity and Milton's sonorous gravity with his own religious heat. The mixture was seldom effective, for his emotions, though obviously sincere, were generalized into histrionic gestures, and this unhappy union of Burns and Milton fell miles short of ■ poetic objective. When he wrote the bulk of his Abolitionist poetry, Whittier had little time or patience to solve his aesthetic problems; the poems were turned out at white heat, and though later he attempted to revise them into more acceptable examples of his solid craftsmanship he had lost the creative impulse (too often uncritical) that gave them an excuse for being. It was not until the Civil War was over and the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery was signed that Whittier's conversion to the cause of Abolition bore ripe fruit; and note that here, in his "Laus Deo," the religious emotion behind his convictions is at last freed of the histrionic cloak that shrouds his earlier work:

For the Lord
On the whirlwind is abroad;
In the earthquake He has spoken;
He has smitten with his thunder
The Iron walls asunder,
And the gates of brass are broken.

From his forty-ninth year to the writing of "Snow-Bound" twelve years later, we have, I think, the best of Whittier's poetry; and again I fail to agree with Mr. Mordell that such writing was innocuous or an unworthy right-about-face from his original attitude. I would flatly deny that such poems ■

"Snow-Bound" and "Laus Deo" or the inadequately titled "My Playmate" were other than the logical development of Whittier's emotional maturity and craftsmanship. He wished, like Burns, to be the poet of his people, and if one cannot find by implication the New England Abolitionist in "Snow-Bound," one might as well give up reading poetry for the rest of one's life. It had taken Whittier fifty years of experience to master his idiom, to fight shy of the borrowed generalizations and oratorical mouthings that marred his so-called propaganda poetry. To say that such poetry is bad is not to say that propaganda and poetry will not mix; it merely discloses the fact that Whittier's early work resounded dismally with the fog-horn eloquence of Webster and Clay. As for the male flirt that Mr. Mordell reveals so knowingly, I suspect that he was nothing more or less than a shrewd, handsome old Yankee gentleman who made safe investments and who adored flattery—provided that his bank account remained untouched by the fair, light hands of ladies who praised his verse.

HORACE GREGORY

Twelve Hundred Pages Long

Anthony Adverse. By Hervey Allen. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

WHEN an author writes a book twelve hundred pages long, when he spans the life of a man from his conception to his death, when he lays his scenes in France, Italy, Spain, England, the West Indies, Africa, a new America, and Mexico, when he includes not only the events in his hero's life but makes that life touch the more exalted historical events of the time, including certain of the operations of none other than Napoleon Bonaparte—when an author does these things he issues a challenge to his readers. He says in effect: "This is no ordinary novel; it is written to stand beside the great ones; it is written to last." And the reader is entitled to measure it by the most rigid standards, to place it beside the novels that many years and many readers have called great, to observe in comparison with them its stature.

I am sure that Mr. Allen would not object to this stern method of judgment, and his publishers, if one reads their observations on the jacket, positively yearn for it. They say: "The publishers believe this novel to be one of the greatest and most exciting works of literature ever produced in America." And one cannot fail to applaud this candor even while one disagrees heartily with the sentiment.

For "Anthony Adverse" is not a great novel, and it is not great for the reason that Mr. Allen is not a great writer. He has drawn a hero with all the winning qualities that a hero must possess. Anthony is handsome, tall, brave, strong, a success in love, war, and finance; his only weakness is concern over his soul, and that is a matter between himself and the reader—his contemporaries rarely are aware of it. He covers half the globe in search of excitement and peace, he engages in as daring and varied a series of exploits as the heart of a reader could demand. He meets every sort of saint, rascal, true friend, and fair lady, and incidentally charms them all, and these persons have a full-blooded and credible quality of their own. It is a large canvas, vividly painted. Half a dozen episodes have the genuine flavor of true romance and heart-filling adventure. But when the twelve hundred pages are done—and I am willing to lay a small bet that I am one of the few who will have read them all—these exploits, these colorful persons, this irresistible young man do not weld themselves into the compelling unity that a great novel demands. At the end the story falls to pieces with a great, empty clatter of falling trees, shattered images, and desperate desires for something. Europe is dead, the eighteenth century is dead, Anthony is dead. And what of it?

The novel has already been called chaotic, a melange of styles, a combination of Herman Melville and Dumas, with too many touches of Ethel M. Dell. But I believe what it mainly lacks is form. Its variety of styles might be all in its favor, its shift from the adventure novel to the intellectual novel and back again might be effective dramatic relief, if it moved compellingly forward to a conclusion, doom or otherwise, that not only held the reader's attention but provided clear and undeniable exaltation. The book has all the meaninglessness of life, which is unendurable in art. It abounds, moreover, in long stretches of highly dubious "philosophy," for example, the following: "In times of great change it is a question whether the restlessness of the human heart is due more to individual dissatisfaction with experience than to the drag and flux of the age." Its literary style is often heavy, pseudo-poetical, involved. Again, for example: "Yet the intense and quiet joy of the man and woman who were meant for each other,"—the third young lady meant for Anthony, by the way—"who reveled along together in an island of mutual consciousness amid the other feasters, was all the more poignant for their awareness of what was passing in the river of time." More than once Mr. Allen resorts to a note of rugged metaphor: "His sarcasm was a kind of spiritual pus that he wiped away privately with page after page of the notebook." And his love scenes are by Jurgen out of Elinor Glyn.

No, "Anthony Adverse" is not a great novel. It is not even a great adventure novel. But its successful romantic episodes would make it, with the elimination of about a third that is too dull, a highly successful and readable one. Only its extreme length and breadth, and the extravagant claims made for it make one's judgment severe. And by the yardstick of greatness it does not measure up.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Sections—or Classes?

The Significance of Sections in American History. By Frederick Jackson Turner. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

FREDERICK JACKSON TURNER was thirty-two years old in 1893 when he read his monograph, "The Significance of the Frontier in American History," before the American Historical Association. From that day, forty years ago, until now it may truly be said that he has so completely dominated American historical writing that hardly a single production in all that time has failed to show the marks of his influence. Not only were Turner's own seminar students legion (he taught altogether for some thirty-four years) but his personal followers in turn scattered over the land to indoctrinate other vast numbers of eager scholars, thereby increasing the Turner host by geometric proportions. All these disciples, whether of the first, second, or third degree, were historians as well as teachers; the result has been the accumulation of a vast pile of monographic studies and special investigations, all of them concerned with aspects of the settlement and institutional development of the American West. So intensively have all these persons labored, so closely have they covered the field of American history with the fine web of their researches, that one scarcely exaggerates in saying that the patient and obscure toiling of another long generation of American historical scholars will be required to destroy this influence: for Turner and his followers were the fabricators of a tradition which is not only fictitious but also to a very large extent positively harmful.

Turner's own contributions to American historical literature were modest. He wrote one volume for the American Nation Series called "The Rise of the New West" (a history of the United States from 1820 to 1830), which was published in 1906; he was engaged when he died in 1932 on another work that was to continue the story to 1850; and he was responsible for not more than some thirty learned essays and general articles. The more representative of these have been collected in two volumes: the first, entitled "The Frontier in American History," was published in 1920; the second is the subject of this review.

The Turner thesis, which is not proved so much as it is continually reiterated in the papers of the two volumes of collected essays, may be summed up as follows: American development was unique in historical annals in that it was constantly being conditioned by the series of frontier zones which succeeded each other until the year 1890; and what made the frontier an ever-present force in American history was the existence of vast reaches of free arable lands. Into these successions of Western areas poured waves of pioneering spirits to influence, subtly but pervasively, all forms of American living. Particularly, these were the outstanding effects of the frontier: out of the common experiences of the Western zones emerged a distinctly American people; under the cruel conditions of frontier pioneering, where only the hardy individual could survive, was born the doctrine of democracy; because the frontier areas were in effect creations of the American government and because the frontiersmen looked to Washington for comfort and relief, loyalty was to the nation and not to the individual States—hence the American nationalistic spirit; and finally, because the Westerners regarded their governments not as sovereign controllers but as agencies for the performance of delegated public functions, the frontier States were turned into so many social laboratories where experiments in the extension of public activities were continually going on. Such were the peculiar contributions made by the presence of the frontier to America's development and progress; these were to be the subjects for scholarly inquiry.

So much for American civilization during its dynamic phases when its history was the conquest of a series of wilderness environments. But what of subsequent periods? The United States would then become "a settled nation" and reach "a more stable equilibrium" in which the chief influence at work, again differentiating American civilization from all others, would be the existence of sections. In these sections, formed by "physiographic conditions, economic interests, and constituent stocks of settled societies," where denser populations would be pressing upon the means of subsistence, would spring up groups of peoples as unlike each other as the different nations of Europe. In 1925 Turner therefore wrote: "The significant fact is that sectional self-consciousness and sensitiveness is likely to be increased as time goes on and crystallized sections feel the full influence of their geographic peculiarities, their special interests, and their developed ideals, in a closed and static nation." And in the same paper he could coolly declare: "Economic interests are sectionalized."

The analogy between the United States as a "congeries of sections" and Europe as a collection of nations particularly fascinated Turner, for he returned to it again and again. The American "physical map may be regarded as a map of potential nations and empires," he said in 1904; and the American section "is the faint image of a European nation," he repeated as late as 1925. Indeed, Europe had much to learn from American experiences: if a United States of America could be erected, why not a United States of Europe, where, too, "by substituting discussion and concession and compromised legislation for force," there could also be achieved "international political parties, international legislative bodies, and international peace"? The histories, interests, ideals, cultural achievements of American sections, then, were to be the second great field for research.

In 1922, now assuming the role of prophet in place of the customary one of preceptor, Turner, by drawing upon both his frontier and sectional hypotheses, indicated what the future of the United States was to be:

However profound the economic changes, we shall not give up our American ideals and our hopes for men, which had their origin in our own pioneering experience, in favor of any mechanical solution offered by doctrinaires educated in Old World grievances. Rather, we shall find strength to build from our past a nobler structure, in which each section will find its place as a fit room in a worthy house.

A detailed examination of the amazing errors into which Turner fell in order to prove his two assumptions of the uniqueness of the frontier experience and the continuity of sectional differences is hardly necessary even if space permitted. Merely to mention these rather naive ideas as I have is enough to confute them. Nor am I particularly concerned with the many evidences of historical ignorance that Turner's papers in both volumes of collected miscellany on every hand display: his statement for example in an article in 1924 that American exports of foodstuffs to Europe were "directly influential upon Bismarck's policy of tariffs, state socialism, colonial empire, and sea power"; or his remark first made in 1904 and again repeated in 1925 that the Civil War's form and "its causes were fundamentally shaped by the dynamic factor of expanding sections, of a West to be won"; or his characterization in 1924 of American radical labor as being made up of "chiefly recent aliens, who interpret America in terms of Russia and adopt the policy of syndicalism."

What is of greater concern is the perverted reading Turner gave to American history in his insistence upon the uniqueness of American experience and his emphasis upon sectional development as a sort of flywheel to balance all political, social, and economic disparities. The unhappy results, for forty years, were the following: a turning inward of American historical activity at exactly the time when all trained eyes should have been on events going on beyond the country's physical borders; an accumulation of supposed evidences of the development of American institutions entirely in nativistic terms without an understanding of how closely American institutional growth paralleled the European; an almost complete disregard of the basic class antagonisms in American history; and a profound ignorance of the steps by which monopolistic capitalism and imperialism were being developed in the country. Granted that with the aid of the Turner hypotheses many interesting historical works were written: examinations of the shaping of the country's land policy, the Middle West's settlement by New England, the building of the railroads, the rise and fall of the cow country, the creation of Western farmers' organizations, and the like: can one doubt in the light of Turner's own definition of the function of historical research—"it is important to study the present and recent past, not only for themselves but also as the source of new hypotheses, new lines of inquiry, new criteria of the perspective of the remoter past"—that this extraordinary collection of learning is quite worthless?

Had Turner not so boldly cut himself loose from the currents of European thought which his teachers at Johns Hopkins were trying to emphasize through their talk of "the continuity of history" and the "inheritance of institutions," had he given more attention to the activities of some of his contemporaries instead of to the Wisconsin fur trade (the subject of his doctoral thesis)—for example, to H. D. Lloyd's "Wealth Against Commonwealth" which was published in 1890 and which gave a complete exposition of the steps by which monopolistic capitalism was being attained, or to A. T. Mahon's "The United States Looking Outward," also published in 1890, which on the basis of sound premises predicted an imperialistic career for the United States—then our own past, in the light of America's current needs, might not be the sealed book it is today.

Turner undoubtedly was right in pointing out the significance that free lands played in American development. The free lands of the West were not important, however, because they made possible the creation of a unique "American spirit"—that indefinable something that was to set the United States apart from European experiences for all time—but because their quick settlement and utilization for the extensive cultivation of food-stuffs furnished exactly those commodities with which the United States, as a debtor nation, could balance its international payments and borrow European capital in order to develop a native industrial enterprise. Thus, in the first place, agriculture, primarily the agriculture of those Western areas of which Turner made so much, was really a cat paw for industry; once having served its purpose, that is to say the capitalist development of the nation, it could be neglected politically and ultimately abandoned economically. In the second place, the presence of the frontier helps to explain the failure of American labor to preserve a continuous revolutionary tradition: class lines could not become fixed as long as the free lands existed to drain off the most spirited elements in the working and lower middle-class populations—not only as farmers, of course, but as small merchants and enterprisers, too—and to prevent the creation of a labor reserve for the purpose of thwarting the demands of organized workers.

The historical growth of the United States, in short, was not unique; merely in certain particulars and for a brief time, it was different from the European pattern largely because of the processes of settlement. With settlement achieved—that is to say, the historic function of extensive agriculture performed, class (not sectional!) lines solidified, competitive capitalism converted into monopolistic capitalism under the guidance of the money power, and imperialism the ultimate destiny of the nation—the United States once again was returning to the main stream of European institutional development. Only by a study of the origins and growth of American capitalism and imperialism can we obtain insight into the nature and complexity of the problems confronting us today. And I am prepared to submit that perhaps the chief reason for the absence of this proper understanding was the futile hunt for a unique "American spirit" which Frederick Jackson Turner began forty years ago and in which he involved most of America's historical scholars from that time until now.

LOUIS M. HACKER

Bundles of Fragments

The Best Short Stories, 1933. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $2.50.

Twentieth Century Short Stories. Selected by Sylvia Chatfield Bates. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $2.25.

IN the prefatory remarks which always precede the stories in his annual anthology, Mr. O'Brien is this year even more hopeful than usual about the prospects for the American short story. He finds as much difference between the better short stories published in 1913 and those published in 1932 as between the poetry of Pope and the poetry of Keats. After the long period during which the short story in this country suffered from a complication of ailments arising out of our too great devotion to the past, our writers, following the examples of Sherwood Anderson and Ernest Hemingway, are hard at work trying to establish a "usable present." This "usable present," as defined by Mr. O'Brien, means something much more than a body of contemporary materials or experience. "It is the sum of all the ordered living we achieve ourselves from day to day." It includes the idea of understanding, adaptation to society, and knowledge of what it is possible for us to become. It is presumably everything that Mr. O'Brien understands by good art and since he refers to the current short story in such lyrical terms we take it that he considers the better recent short stories typical of art of this kind. The magazine Story, for example, is described as "the most important milestone in American letters since 'The Education of Henry Adams'." After such an astonishing statement as this, one naturally turns with avidity to the pages that follow.

What one finds is a group of stories, taken from such different sources as the Saturday Evening Post and the Prairie Schooner, of an average level of quality that is neither very far above nor below that of any of Mr. O'Brien's anthologies of the past five or six years. It is especially disappointing to discover that the selections from Story, with the exception of Naomi Shumway's Ike and Us Moons, are among the least distinguished in the volume. Only three of the stories, those by Miss Shumway, Erskine Caldwell, and Katherine Anne Porter, are likely to impress the reader as being able to survive the twofold "test of substance and of form" which Mr. O'Brien lays down for his triple-asterisk group. In Miss Shumway's account of a pioneer family's effort to preserve itself after migration from the Blue Grass to the Yellowstone, the attempt to work into the American "tradition" for once successfully avoids the tendency to ignore adequate characterization and style. Indeed, the quality of the language in this story, which is poetic without straining our credulity, is chiefly responsible for its success. Mr. Caldwell's The First Autumn is so unlike his novels, both in substance and manner, that one does not easily identify it as being by his hand. It is the most objectively constructed story in the book and will therefore be liked and disliked for the same reason. The moment that its point is grasped the reader is divided between a feeling of irritation at the author's reluctance to state his meaning explicitly and a feeling of admiration at the skill with which he lets the action relate his meaning. It is Katherine Anne Porter's The Cracked Looking-Glass, however, which most nearly realizes Mr. O'Brien's contention that the past year was an exceptional one. Building on an epigram in the first episode of Joyce's "Ulysses," Miss Porter has written a study in the vicissitudes of an Irish Madame Bovary stranded in the Connecticut hills that is at once a fully developed portrait of an individual, a type, and a race. So expert is Miss Porter in her knowledge of the Celtic sensibility, so subtly attuned to the rhythms and idioms of Irish speech, that it is hard to believe she is not by right of birth an Irish writer, although she must hereafter be counted as one by right of sympathy and comprehension.

Of the twenty-nine stories in Mr. O'Brien's collection, thirteen are written either directly or indirectly from the point of view of a character whose intellectual level is obviously below that of the writer. It may be that of a small-town Rotarian (George Milburn's Apostate), a trolley-line employee (George Albee's Fame Takes the J Car), or a Tacoma mine-worker (Grant Leenhouts's The Facts in the Case). In no fewer than seven stories the point of view is that of a child. It is possible that this may be put down to coincidence or simply that more of our fiction writers are learning the advantages of a specially selected point of view. The playing on a child's half-conscious grasp of facts and events, as a recent review has suggested, may only be a vogue. But one is compelled to seek some better explanation for this wholesale abandonment of the traditional auctorial point of view in recent fiction. The growing tendency among certain writers to set down, in letter or personal narrative form, the exact speech of Rotarians, mine-workers, and children instead of addressing us in a vocabulary and style more closely resembling their own, is undoubtedly a consequence of the so-called "documentary" impulse in current literature. But the documentary impulse itself is open to a closer examination. It will usually be found that those writers who lavish on us a great many facts (sometimes referred to as "life") do so because they do not know what else to do with them. The curious contradiction is that while these facts do not have any meaning for the authors themselves they are expected to seem very important to their readers. And it is somehow made to follow that if the facts are presented from the point of view of someone not the author they are even more important. Besides, the author has the advantage of playing safe; he is relieved from the responsibility and increasing difficulty of making something out of them. Because such themes as love, death, and sorrow have become too complex for the mature intelligence, they can be saved only by being relegated to the stupid, sub-normal, or infantile mind. The short story is thus able to move on to new heights, if one believes Mr. O'Brien, by devoting itself to a kind of stenography of bewilderment.

This bewilderment and the profounder reasons behind it are more frankly revealed in such a story as Thomas Mann's Disorder and Early Sorrow, which Miss Bates has the good taste to include in her collection of thirty-one stories from six different countries. So perfectly does Mann communicate the sentiment of transition in this story that we are left with little wonder as to why the modern short story is the uncertain, evasive, fragmentary thing it is. Miss Bates's selection from the field is marked by thoroughness, intelligence, and more good taste than has been shown in a long time. One regrets, of course, the inclusion of certain entries at the expense of certain favorites of one's own—Joyce's Araby, Mary Butts's The Golden Bough, and Meridel Le Sueur's Persephone. But these changes would not alter the impression left by the collection as a whole, that of a "bundle of fragments," to use Yeats's phrase, or contribute in the least toward any effect of unity in its reflection of the contemporary world.

WILLIAM TROY

A Revolutionist's Field-Book

Memoirs of a Bolshevik. By O. Piatnitsky. International Publishers. $2.

ON the occasion of the periodic purgings of the Russian Communist Party, every member is required to submit a political biography giving a full account of his activities before and after he joined the party. These memoirs are an outgrowth of the political biography submitted by the author at the party purging of 1921, and since he was one of the charter members of the original Bolshevik wing, his career is synchronous with the history of the party. For some unrevealed reason the memoirs stop short with the February, 1917, revolution, which found him an exile in Siberia. The English translation is from a revised edition, which accounts perhaps for anti-Trotskyite asides, hardly conceivable in 1921 and rather forced coming from such a practical field worker as Piatnitsky, with neither the inclination nor the capacity for doctrinal disputation.

Piatnitsky is of the type who are the backbone of movements, the anonymous rocks of the church. Steadfast, self-effacing, incorruptible, he plied his revolutionary trade as industriously as a mechanic, and his love of an efficiently running political machine crops out in his unorthodox admiration for the German Social Democratic Party when he was in Germany in 1912. He records that Lenin used to twit him about "his friends the Social Democrats." "Many Russian comrades passing through Leipzig denounced the Social Democrats, but I thought at the time that they did so because they had never seen the S. D.'s at work." But Piatnitsky was not merely metaphorically a mechanic. While he was in Paris (after his escape from the Kiev prison) he studied and mastered engineering, because he was eager to return to Russia "in a way that would get me immediately in the midst of workers in the factories."

Since the Russian revolutionary parties were illegal the book is replete with interesting details of their methods of underground organization and agitation. For instance, "as those who were arrested used to be beaten at the police stations there was danger that they might involuntarily disclose their comrades." A special pamphlet was therefore published by the party entitled "How to Conduct Oneself Under Arrest." He adds that "those who deliberately gave away their comrades were dealt with unmercifully and summarily." In this regard it is worth while noting the wholesome respect which the police had for the Iskra organization, the group which disseminated in Russia the magazine which Lenin edited abroad. During one of Piatnitsky's numerous arrests an official suggested that a club be used to make him talk. To which the official examining him replied: "You are mistaken. He will not say a thing. He is a member of the Iskra organization."

Iskra was smuggled into Russia in various ingenious ways. The most common vehicle was a false-bottomed valise. There was also the "breastplate." "For men we manufactured a kind of waistcoat into which we could stuff two or three hundred copies of Iskra, for women we constructed special bodices and sewed literature into their skirts. This was called 'express transport' in our parlance."

Piatnitsky served several terms in prison, and for him as for many of the revolutionists his imprisonment was an opportunity to round out his Marxist education. The prisons seem to have been the Marx-Engels Institutes of Czarist Russia. The indulgence of the authorities on this score is a mystery. Piatnitsky records: "In 1905 many Marxist books were published and I devoured them eagerly. When I was at liberty I had hardly any time to read, for I was always engulfed in practical work."

In the preface to these memoirs by the Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute of Moscow the hope is expressed that the book will serve "as a textbook which would help our comrades abroad . . . to learn the methods of underground work." But the lessons of the book are largely restricted to those countries which are on a par, economically and politically, with Czarist Russia, where the government had no mass support but, like an alien garrison quartered upon the country, was distrusted by all classes of the population. Outside of China and India there are few such countries on the contemporary horizon. Underground work in such countries is simplified by the friendly neutrality of the bulk of the population. But in countries where the government has some measure of mass support, as in Fascist Germany and Italy, or in semi-Fascist Japan, Turkey, and Poland, or in highly developed capitalist countries with a mass bourgeoisie like the United States, Russian precedents are of limited value.

ALTER BRODY

Films

Documentary Films

THE most recent Soviet importation, "Twenty-six Commissars" (Acme), is a good example of the new type of documentary film to which the Russian cinema has turned since the reconstruction of the revolutionary period in the great works of Eisenstein and Pudovkin. Superior in every respect to Dovzhenko's "Ivan" viewed earlier in the season, it manages to give a pretty complete picture of a particular industry without subordinating everything else to the purpose. As in "Potemkin" the thesis resides in the situation rather than in the mouths of the characters. Shengelaya manages such a smooth synthesis of the elements separately developed by his predecessors that the result has the balanced perfection of a work created out of some settled tradition. It is probably this quality to which Dovzhenko refers when he says the film is "as austere as a Beethoven symphony." From Eisenstein undoubtedly derives the symbolic use of posture and grouping, so that in certain scenes the grime-covered workers in the Baku oil fields are made to take on the sinister immobility of black statuary. Shengelaya's own talent is to be discovered in an avoidance of monotony by a larger representation of types—which is, of course, considerably aided here by the mixed racial background of the setting—than has been common in recent Soviet productions. This is also largely responsible for reducing the sharpness of the formula. Based on the troubles surrounding the Mensheviks' invitation to the British to occupy Baku in 1918, the picture will have a certain timely interest in view of the current relations between Great Britain and the Soviet Republic. But the interest of its direction, photography, and acting is sufficient to make it worth the attention of anyone interested in the current cinema.

UNIVERSITY PUBLIC LIBRARY

"Samarang" might also be described as a documentary film, but in the tradition of "Nanook of the North," "Tabu," and other attempts to recreate the mores and living conditions of remote places on the earth's surface. The place here is an island in the Malay Straits; the men are pearl-divers, and the women weave floral garlands for their marriage feasts; but the result is unfortunately neither so quaint nor so instructive as is intended. Indeed, the dull photography, the crude scenario, and the embarrassing acting of the chief pearl-diver, who exhibits all the symptoms of a stock-company principal suffering from acute exhibitionism, are enough to discourage us with this type of picture for some time to come. No longer do a few sharks and a few old natives in front of a hut seem adequate material for a film of this length. Perhaps the real significance of "Samarang" is that it shows a marked weariness in the cinema's circumnavigation of the globe.

It is also discouraging to report that in his most recent Walt Disney cartoon, "Gala Premiere," Mickey Mouse betrays a most dangerous self-consciousness. People have been talking so loudly about how good he is, what a great artist he is, and the rest, that he has at last heard about it and responded with what is perhaps the only poor appearance he has yet made. Before he even shows his whiskers in his new picture we are required to sit through a succession of mediocre caricatures of Maurice Chevalier, Clark Gable, the Barrymores, and others of his admirers who assist at his grand opening. As a result his picture, when it is finally shown, seems like a letdown and much below his usual level. If Mickey Mouse is not very careful, he will soon find that he belongs with Lindbergh, Aimée Semple MacPherson, and the ages.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

STUART CHASE is the author of "A New Deal."

JUDSON KING is the director of the National Popular Government League.

ERON ERWIN KISCH, the Roving Reporter, is a well known writer on political and literary subjects. He was in Berlin when Hitler began the persecution of the Jews, was arrested, detained for eight days in the Nazi police headquarters, and then deported to Czechoslovakia.

IRWIN EDMAN, assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia University, is the author of "The Contemporary and His Soul."

GEORGE DILLON won the Pulitzer poetry award for his book of verse, "Flowering Stone."

HORACE GREGORY is an American poet whose most recent work is a volume of verse entitled "No Retreat."

DOROTHY VAN DOREN, formerly an associate editor of The Nation, is the author of "Brother and Brother" and other novels.

LOUIS M. HACKER, in collaboration with Benjamin B. Kendrick, is the author of "The United States Since 1865."

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

ALTER BRODY is the author of a book of folk plays entitled "Lamentations."

ROBERT HERRICK is the author of "The Common Pot," "Sometime," and other novels.

SUMMER

FOR RENT

ROCKY DALE BUNGALOW COLONY

Furnished, housekeeping, 3-4-5 room bungalows, hot and cold showers, modern plumbing, electricity, private lake, children's camp activities. $150. to $200. per season. Booklet. B. P. Scharp, Camp Rocky Dale, Green Lane, Pa., R. F. D. 1, Tel. Sellersville 9977.

RESERVATION FOR SALE

SUMMER season reservation at Colorado Dude Ranch; all paid up; owner unable to make trip; no reasonable cash offer refused for all or part season. Room 707, 45 W. 45th St., City.

LANGUAGES

Learn languages at home by World's Easiest, Quickest Method. Free Demonstration. LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE, 10 E. 43 St., N. Y.

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Ave. Harlem 7-8446.

POSITION WANTED

YOUNG LADY, 25, several years varied stenographic experience (also playground, teaching) wants position, temporary or permanent. Box 198, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

GOVERNESS for two small school boys. New York City. Must understand modern methods of child training. School teacher preferred. $60. monthly. Start Sept. 1. Write fully. Box 209. c/o The Nation.

RESORTS

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.

Garden Spot of Ulster County

Modern hotel amidst beautiful 200 acre fruit and grape farm. solariums, saddle horses, tennis courts, social activities, refinement, congeniality, American Jewish cuisine. Rates reduced to $16 and $18. JOSEPH ROSENTHAL Kingston 3430

NORTHWOOD'S LODGE INN

1,400 private estate, 2 lakes, near Lake George, 20 rooms, 8 baths, electricity. Hunting, fishing, golf nearby. Rates $20 to $28 weekly. Open all year.

"First Cousin to a Dude Ranch"

FREE SADDLE HORSES

EARL WOODWARD, Luzerne, N. Y.

LAKEVUE LODGE, Livingston Manor, N. Y. Intelligent atmosphere where people of taste and culture spend pleasant, yet informal vacations. Social, aquatic and athletic facilities. Jewish Cuisine.

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG

A delightful hide-away in the mountains inviting people of better taste. Wholesome food, delightful companionship, all outdoor sports. Reduced rates. Woodbourne, N. Y. Tel. Fallsburg 186-J

SPEND your vacations and weekends at the seashore. Good bracing walks, or complete rest. Very comfortable accommodations and the very best food tastefully prepared. Exceptionally low rates. Richers Cottage, Belle Harbor, L. I. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE

Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Dutchess Co.

An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Jewish. Rate $16 wkly.

LOVELY old stone farmhouse, 150 acres. Tennis, riding, swimming. Excellent food. Congenial atmosphere. $14 week; $5 weekend. Tel. New Milford 108-3 or write E. Adams, New Milford, Ct.

RESORTS

CAMP DAVIS, Budd Lake, N. J. For the vegetarian, nature lover, sports minded. Excellent food. Only 48 miles from N. Y. $15 a week. Ideal vacation or weekend. Write R. S. Davis, Stanhope, N. J., or call Longacre 5-8071 after 12 P. M.

TOPSTONE FARM

For a delightful vacation or week-end in the Connecticut hills, restful, secluded, in charming woodland country, now at special rates. Saddle-horses, the place, instruction. R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn. Phone 648.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake. Splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Contract lessons free. Guests met at Lake George. $18.00 and $20.00. R. I. Venton

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HILBERT HOUSE

Lake Mahopac New York
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 953

NEW HAMPSHIRE. Locality and estate charming, accessible, ideal for rest or recreation. Private, but a few adults can be accommodated at any season. Golf, etc. Hospitality without effusiveness. $15. weekly. Write Mrs. Stone, Box 37, North Newport, N. H., or phone Newport 398 M.

MOUNTAIN LODGE. Elevation 1500

Finest view in Vermont. Large Library. Study or rest. $15. week. Wells Brock, Middlesex, Vermont.

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn. on Lake Housatonic. 70 miles from New York. Beautiful surroundings. Tennis, boating, fishing. Excellent meals. Rates $3.50 per day. $19. week. Derby 639-2. R.R. Station Derby.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 2, 1933

No. 3552

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	113
EDITORIALS:
Gentlemen Prefer Profits	116
Silver as a Beggar	117
Dr. Fish	117
The Fetish of Economy	118
ISSUES AND MEN. THE DAMAGE TO AMERICA IN LONDON.
By Oswald Garrison Villard	119
ROOSEVELT TURNS LEFT. By Paul Y. Anderson	120
SIX MONTHS OF HITLERISM. By Harrison Brown	121
WHOOPIING UP MUSCLE SHOALS. By Stetson Clark	124
WALTER LIPPMANN. IV. ON DEMOCRACY. By Amos Pinchot	126
HERO BALBO. By George Seldes	131
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	131
CORRESPONDENCE	132
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Before the Storm. By C. Day Lewis	134
A Confession of Faith. By Joseph Wood Krutch	134
The Socrates of Plato. By Irwin Edman	135
Pastoral Fable, New Style. By Ferner Nuhn	135
Progress: The Bathtub Theory. By V. F. Calverton	136
Too Much of a Good Thing. By Ernest Boyd	136
The Generation That Made the War. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	137
Mildly French. By Haakon M. Chevalier	137
Shorter Notices	138
Films: Panorama. By William Troy	138
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	139

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S radio address of July 24 was less an outline of a new plan than a plea for support for a program already announced, especially the "blanket code" in industry. This code establishes a maximum of forty hours a week for clerical employees and minimum pay of from $12 to $15. For industrial workers it sets up a maximum week of thirty-five hours, with minimum pay of from thirty to forty cents an hour. Employers are asked to put the scheme into effect voluntarily from September to December, inclusive, or until special codes are promulgated for their industries. Mr. Roosevelt's talk on the radio was a continuation of his effort to establish a war psychology to meet the industrial emergency, and as such seems to us exceedingly effective. He exposed a gloved hand rather than a mailed fist, but he let just a glimpse of the latter appear beneath his coat sleeve, while George N. Peek, head of the Farm Adjustment Administration, speaking on the same day to a group of grain men, made no bones of the intention to resort to force if necessary. Critically examined, Mr. Roosevelt's program ignores certain traits of human nature and certain principles of economics which we discuss in our editorial in this issue on Gentlemen Prefer Profits. But the program will not be critically examined—by many. It depends for success considerably on sentimentalism and considerably on coercion, but in the World War we Americans developed an insatiable appetite for the former and uncomplaining docility under the latter. The program will appeal to many a better than a nation "half boom and half broke," to use Mr. Roosevelt's apt phrase, and it may work—at least for a while.

THE BREAK in stock prices did not unduly disturb the Roosevelt Administration. The break in grain prices did. This is not surprising. Speculators were the only direct losers in the sharp drop on the stock exchanges. Production and pay rolls could be affected only indirectly, and even then only if industry lost its head because of the panic and began curtailing its activity. The President, confident of the ultimate success of his recovery program, seems to have felt that business would not be adversely affected by the tempest in Wall Street so long as official Washington remained calm. He doubtless knew that any precipitate action on his part, such as a move to close the New York Stock Exchange, would simply increase the panic. It might have led the general public to suspect that the collapse was due not to a sudden deflation of a runaway speculative boom, which was the real cause, but to hidden defects in the current recovery or in the Roosevelt program, or to a lack of confidence on the part of the Administration. Instead the Administration took the position that the stock gamblers had overreached themselves and were paying the usual penalty. That this attitude involved a certain amount of risk is understood in Washington. The effect of the Roosevelt program on business has to date been mainly psychological. If a real panic were to develop and the present feeling of buoyant hopefulness were to be undermined, the recovery program would be endangered. By minimizing the importance of the break, Mr. Roosevelt has apparently succeeded, so far as we can tell at this writing, in localizing the panic.

THE DROP in grain prices presented a different problem. Farmers suffered real cash losses as a result of the drastic decline on the Chicago Board of Trade. When wheat fell more than twenty-five cents in two days, it meant that commission merchants were offering the farmers twenty-five cents less for their wheat delivered at the terminals. While the Administration could look with a certain amount of indifference upon the stock-gambling spree, it was deeply concerned by the probable reaction of the farmers to the panic on the Board of Trade. Some officials felt that the slump would help to convince the farmers of the necessity of supporting the crop-control plan, but a majority realized that sharp fluctuations in grain prices might have another effect, for many farmers have tended to identify the recent price rise with the successful operation of the Roosevelt program. Hence Secretary Wallace deemed it necessary to stem the panic by fixing a minimum level for grain prices. In this he received the cooperation of the Chicago Board of Trade, which was anxious to halt the slump because a number of its prominent members were carrying heavy commitments in wheat, which they would have had to dump on the market at any price in order to cover their margins. Secretary Wallace's action was not based on the authority of any law but simply on a mutual agreement between himself and the Board of Trade. The agreement also limits the extent to which grain prices may fluctuate in any one trading day. If this scheme fails to work, that is, if it fails to prevent another unwarranted inflation in grain values, there can be little doubt that the Administration will exercise its authority under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and license the whole grain trade, thus bringing the grain market directly under government control.

SECRETARY OF WAR DERN, following the lead of his colleague who is at the head of the Navy Department, has asked for $135,000,000 from the public-works fund of $3,300,000,000 for the purpose of "modernizing" the army. And, like Secretary of the Navy Swanson, he seeks to justify his request on the ground that the expenditure of this sum would give employment to thousands of workers. It is upon such occasions as these that we thank our stars that a man named Harold Ickes is responsible for the allocation and expenditure of the huge public-works fund. Secretary Ickes has flatly declared that the money intrusted to his care is "very precious" and will not be squandered or spent upon any public works except those that are "sane both from an engineering and a social standpoint." He has intimated that he is willing to give the War Department a reasonable sum for work that is absolutely necessary, but the sum will not be anywhere near $135,000,000. Since the President has already shown that he subscribes to the Swanson theory that naval expenditures are "socially justifiable" if they provide employment, Secretary Dern might win if he chose to carry his fight to the White House. If this happens, we must depend upon the proved fighting qualities of Secretaries Ickes and Perkins to block this latest effort to use the unemployment situation as an excuse for enlarging the military establishment of the country.

WE SINCERELY HOPE that Secretary Ickes will also take a determined stand against the new naval construction program before it is too late. This program was approved by the President before Mr. Ickes was named Public Works Administrator and the latter may well urge that every possible dollar be spent usefully. Until recently the Japanese militarists used the Manchurian situation as their excuse for increasing the military budget. Now they point to the Roosevelt-Swanson naval program. Moreover, in the new budget, the largest in Japan's history, naval construction for the first time in years takes precedence over the needs of the army. An expenditure of approximately $180,000,000 in addition to that which had already been approved, was hurriedly provided for soon after it was announced in Washington that the Roosevelt Administration planned to spend $238,000,000 on new ships. There can be no doubt that the United States and Japan are on the verge of a disastrous naval-armaments race. Here again the enlightened progressives in the Administration have a duty to perform. They can remain silent and let the militarist element follow its natural bent, or they can challenge it, carrying their cause to the people, who we feel sure will support them, and thus probably prevent the country from being plunged into an era of militarism which would lead us into new wars.

THE EARLY END of the "noble experiment" is assured. When the first truly Southern States, Alabama, Arkansas, and Tennessee, voted for repeal, the last hope of the prohibition forces vanished. With Oregon, which also has gone "wet," twenty States out of the necessary thirty-six have decreed the death of the Eighteenth Amendment. It now seems not unlikely, as Jouett Shouse predicts, that all forty-eight States will ratify, a unanimity desirable as a demonstration of the extent of rebellion against the domination of minority pressure groups. Various factors are contributing to this striking reversal which only a few years ago was generally declared impossible of achievement because of the small minorities which can block a constitutional amendment. There is the widespread conviction, after over a decade of observation and trial, that prohibition as a means of promoting temperance has proved a flat failure. There is the revolt against the unwise attempt to regulate personal habits by statute. There is the need and desire for increased sources of tax revenue. There is the repudiation of Republican rule and all its works which finds expression in enacting this measure sponsored by the Democrats. There is the good old band wagon, on which Americans love to climb. And, finally, there is the fermented juice of the grape, or its numerous dynamic equivalents, which since before Noah the human race has enjoyed quaffing.

FURTHER CONFIRMATION that criminality and thuggery are integral parts of the Nazi regime is furnished by the unveiling in Weimar of a memorial tablet to the murderers of Walther Rathenau. At the dedicatory ceremonies attended by high Nazi officials, Colonel Roehm, chief of staff of the Brown Army, eulogized the assassins. The bronze table commemorating the murdered statesman, as devoted a public servant as it was ever a people's fortune to place in high office, had previously been removed. On the same day, the body of Dr. Wilhelm Schaefer was found in a ditch on the outskirts of Frankfurt-on-the-Main, riddled with bullets. It was he who reported to the police in November, 1931, the notorious Bokheimer document outlining a plan for a terrorist coup d'état in Hesse which called for slaughter of Nazi opponents. Dr. Schaefer had survived one previous attack by brown-shirt gangsters. In Leipzig, Nazi storm troopers assaulted without provocation an American citizen of Jewish race, Philip Zuckerman. With his wife and two other relatives, he had been watching a parade. One of his relatives, as he himself told United States Consul Raymond H. Geist, who came to Zuckerman's hospital bedside to take his affidavit, had a long beard "making it easy to pick him out as a Jew." As the tail end of the procession passed, a number of storm troopers dropped out of the ranks, rushed back, and assaulted these spectators. Zuckerman cried out "I am an American," but he was set upon, beaten into unconsciousness, kicked in the head, and trampled upon.

AS IF these individual outrages were not sufficient, the Nazi regime has now officially decreed the punishment of death for any who "spread atrocity reports," for any who engage in "subversive activity," or for those who import "subversive" literature from outside of Germany. This means, of course, that the lives of any not in sympathy with the Nazi regime, already in grave peril from the unhindered assaults such as those on Dr. Schaefer and Mr. Zuckerman, will be legally forfeit on the basis of suspicion or of a frame-up such as, it is now pretty well known, characterized the "Communist" burning of the Reichstag. Death will also be the penalty, according to another decree, of any attempt, whether successful or not, on the life of any member of the Nazi army. It will suffice for an agent provocateur to fire a pistol from a window to jeopardize the life of any whom the Nazis wish to arrest as responsible therefor. With such mounting evidences of the character of Hitlerism, it is no wonder that the boycott against it assumes worldwide proportions. In London the National Joint Council of the labor movement has issued a manifesto appealing to "all who share with British workers horror and detestation of the destruction of human liberty, rights, and citizenship in Germany to refrain until further notice" from buying German goods and services. Meanwhile a great congress in Amsterdam representing the Jews of the world calls on all people, regardless of race, to do likewise. The boycott should hasten the Nazi day of reckoning which Philipp Scheidemann predicts.

THE SENSATIONAL DISCLOSURES in Pennsylvania of starvation wages and child labor and sweatshop conditions presented a challenge to the State which Governor Pinchot has met by appointing Charlotte E. Carr to the post of Secretary of Industry and Labor. Miss Carr is a strong exponent of social legislation. She will carry to the last ditch the fight against the sort of exploitation that has been exposed in the recent investigations. She is very close to Secretary Perkins, both personally and in her point of view, having worked for years in the Department of Labor in New York under Miss Perkins. The Governor made his choice in the face of a bitter attack upon Miss Carr by her predecessor, A. M. Northrup. Dr. Northrup resigned from office after charging Miss Carr, who as director of the Bureau of Inspection of the Department had been largely responsible for the investigation of labor conditions, with fomenting labor troubles and encouraging strikers. With Miss Carr in office we may expect the enforcement of labor laws and the speedy enactment of necessary new legislation in a State which has long been an industrial sore spot.

THAT PROFITS inevitably take precedence over principles in the industrial system under which we live was proved again in Pittsburgh recently when the newsboys struck against an effort of the daily newspapers to raise the wholesale price from $2 to $2.25 a hundred, reducing the boys' net proceeds at three cents a copy from $1 to seventy-five cents. Alarmed at the specter of advertising losses when distribution of the newspapers was halted, the city's three dailies joined in a cry of "Communist agitation" and went to extreme lengths in distorting the facts and making use of the police to break the movement. The supposedly liberal Scripps-Howard Press, which has supported minimum wages and the rights of employees to organize in unions of their own choosing under the National Industrial Recovery Act, united with Paul Block's Post-Gazette and Hearst's Sun-Telegraph against the newsboys. The Press, militant enemy of sweatshops, of bad conditions in mining towns, and of contractors who pay starvation wages on city jobs, labeled one strike orator, who campaigned for Roosevelt last autumn, a Communist. Some of the newsboys said that the Police Department refused a permit for a street meeting or parade and that no auditoriums were available because no hall owners would risk the ill-will of the newspapers. The police broke up a meeting in the headquarters of the Unemployed Citizens' League and arrested several youths on the ground that they were not newsboys and that no others could assist in a strike. Admittedly there was some violence. On the first day of the strike newspapers were seized from delivery trucks and torn into shreds, so that the streets were littered with debris to such an extent that it became a menace to traffic. Eventually the newspapers agreed to allow the newsboys a profit of ninety cents a hundred copies.

A TRIAL for extortion and blackmail is usually considered news, especially when the alleged victim is prominent. In the Court of General Sessions in New York City, on Tuesday, July 18, began the trial of a Mrs. Frances W. King, charged with seeking to extort $50,000 from Bruce Barton, author, publicist, and advertising executive. Testimony brought out that on a previous occasion Mr. Barton had paid $25,000 in consequence of a suit for alienation of affections brought by Mrs. King's husband. The Nation would welcome a press practice of not printing scandals involving the private lives of individuals. But, alas, this is not yet newspaper custom unless the complete suppression for a week on the part of certain New York dailies of all mention of this startling and dramatic court proceeding may inaugurate a new journalistic policy. As it is, the New York Times alone in the morning, and the Sun alone in the evening field, gave complete day-by-day accounts of the trial. The World-Telegram printed two brief items which told little. The tabloid Daily News likewise printed two items in uncharacteristically unsensational fashion. Mr. Hearst's American and Evening Journal and the Daily Mirror, to whom a sensation of this kind generally appeals, printed not a line. Neither did the respectable Herald Tribune and Evening Post. We should be inclined to congratulate these newspapers on their unprecedented reserve were it not for a lurking suspicion that this new-found reticence may bear some faint relation to the desire to keep the good-will of the great advertising agency of Batten, Barton, Durstine and Osborn.

NEW MEANS of transportation, it is often remarked, give new knowledge of geography even to those who do not travel. Ships were the first great revealers of the world to stay-at-homes, but the airplane has lately been making a contribution much more considerable than would have seemed possible in regard to the face of an earth nearly every wart and mole of which had become known before men began to use sky trails. So long as the airplane followed the routes of steamships and railroads, it gave us little new, but since it has taken to hugging the Arctic Circle in order to shorten distances and keep within close reach of land, it has made dozens of hitherto unknown places in Labrador, Greenland, and Siberia seem like suburbs of New York or Chicago. Novosibirsk, Khabarovsk, Irkutsk, Anadyr—all are now as familiar as Yonkers or Evanston. But the treat among them is the town of Flat, Alaska. Other towns have been said to be flat since the industrial depression but Alaska's Flat seems to be the authentically baptized municipality. The post-war territorial settlements brought into our ken the glamorous island of Yap, and now Wiley Post has added the incomparable town of Flat. A marvelous world we live in!

Gentlemen Prefer Profits

THE difficulties of building a planned economy on foundations of individualism, competition, and the acquisitive instincts are emerging day by day to create dismay in the hearts of the officials who have undertaken the herculean job. Gentlemen, it seems, prefer profits—even to general recovery. They were, it is true, promised profits, but the Administration expected these to follow, not precede, the reemployment of labor and the raising of purchasing power. Since inflation was destined to cut the buying power of the dollar and prices were certain to rise, it was considered arithmetically self-evident that people would have to be paid proportionately more dollars to enable them to buy even the little they had been buying—let alone increasing their purchases sufficiently to create prosperity. All this was told to the industrialists of the country by the President, and the National Recovery Act was passed for the single announced purpose of putting men and women to work at wages that would buy enough things to return—eventually—a profit to the concerns which made and distributed them. Most of the industrialists seemed to understand this simple equation. They said: “Sure, we want to employ more men and we know wages must go up and we’ll be tickled to death if President Roosevelt will make everybody obey the same rules—pay the same wages and work their help the same hours. And it’s a good idea for the government to spend $3,300,000,000 on public works, especially if the contracts go to private business.”

And so, swiftly and inevitably, confidence increased and bred widespread activity. The stock market started its spectacular climb. Production mounted. Each day produced a crop of optimistic news reports of men reemployed and factories reopened; wage increases were reported. And prices began to rise. From June 10 to July 8 wholesale commodity prices rose 5 per cent. In June they had increased $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, showing, for the first time since 1929, an increase over the corresponding month of the previous year. Dun’s index number for July 1, 1933, was 19.04 per cent above the level of July 1, 1932.

But meanwhile another by-product of optimism began to be evident. Industry, now convalescent, lost much of its former willingness to submit to the vigorous treatment prescribed and administered under government control. Several great industries submitted codes promptly, and one, the cotton-textile code, was accepted. But others hung back, meanwhile piling up production at existing low costs in expectation of orders at higher prices later on. Undoubtedly most of these industries counted upon the effects of the recovery act—the higher wages and wider employment—to provide those orders. But as individuals, again fairly rugged, they were determined to gain what advantage they could by delaying their own higher costs and cashing in as handsomely as possible on the increased purchasing power to be created by industry as a whole. This may seem reprehensible, but business is business. Let him who still hopes for the social regeneration of the capitalist system cast the first stone!

As a matter of fact it has already been cast. The crisis created by rising prices and increased production and the delay in submitting satisfactory codes has become so acute that every member of the Administration concerned with the recovery program has taken a shot at the offenders against the plan. President Roosevelt, Secretary Perkins, Recovery Administrator Johnson, Mr. McGrady, all have made statements attacking the saboteurs of recovery. Mr. Johnson described the present situation as “appalling” and asserted that he had seen advance wholesale quotations for retail restocking which showed price increases “from 60 to 130 per cent.” In a similar tone of warning, Frances Perkins referred to the dangers involved in the “speculative race to produce as much as possible before wages and hours are fixed by the industrial codes.” The result of this alarm was a blanket emergency code recently announced—an agreement to be entered into by individual employers and the President to bridge the gap between the perilous present and the ultimate acceptance of detailed codes in each industry. The “voluntary agreement” is to be put over by high-pressure publicity methods based upon a nationwide patriotic appeal.

So this is where we stand at the present moment. In order to induce American industry to preserve its existence and the system under which it operates, the Government of the United States must embark upon a national drive. Minute men must rush around from Rotary Club to Chamber of Commerce dinning into the ears of business men the patriotic duty of saving their own skins. And why is this preposterous nonsense necessary? Because the exuberance of a few months of increased activity, largely speculative, has induced so many industrialists to sabotage the recovery program that the program itself is in imminent danger of collapsing into ruins and carrying with it the gains of the last few weeks and the hope of future improvement.

We believe that Roosevelt, Perkins, Johnson, Ickes, Richberg, Wolman, indeed most of the leading figures in the recovery campaign, are honest in their desire not only to save but to stabilize industry. But each day gives to our rulers valuable if expensive lessons in social and economic realities. Business will not voluntarily cooperate; each industry, each concern will grab whatever advantage it can get without regard for the whole. Labor will receive the least industry can possibly pay no matter what this does to general “purchasing power.” Cooperation will work only if it is enforced by the government. A patriotic appeal may be effective as long as the emergency is acute and business is worried, but an industrial system cannot run on patriotism. Already we have seen a vast government machine created for the purpose of instructing, cajoling, and exhorting our capitalist economy to stay alive. Even a few weeks’ operation is enough to convince us that it will be able to succeed only through the exercise of force. That force is the beginning of fascism seems clear. The only possible alternative would be straight socialization. For the government to take over and operate for the benefit of the people the steel and coal and oil and other great industries would be almost as simple as to act as a combination of policeman and wet nurse. And we are convinced that it would provide the only road to an effective economic plan.

Silver as a Beggar

FEW commodities have had such persistent champions for their welfare in Congress as silver. The success of the efforts of these champions is all the more remarkable when one considers the comparatively few persons in the United States who are directly interested in the price of silver. Yet again and again the propagandists have compelled the United States Government to buy more silver—usually much above the market price—than it had any need for. The Sherman Silver Purchase Act of 1890 had a rise in the price of silver practically as its sole object. The Pittman Silver Purchase Act guaranteed $1 an ounce for silver, which immediately broke to 63 cents an ounce when the act expired in 1923. More recently, the silver interests through their representatives in Congress succeeded in getting the government to accept silver in payment of war debts at a price of 50 cents an ounce. As silver at the time was selling in the neighborhood of 30 cents an ounce, this was either a left-handed way of canceling part of the foreign debt to us, or a left-handed way of forcing the government to buy large and undetermined amounts of silver at a price far above the market.

For some reason Senator Pittman, the chief political representative of the silver interests, was appointed by the President as one of the American delegates to the World Economic Conference; and during his time there he devoted himself single-mindedly to one sole object—to “get something for silver.” He concentrated on two chief proposals. One of these was to retain the gold standard, but to use silver in place of gold for 25 per cent of the metallic reserves in the central banks. Assuming that currency would then be redeemed either in a fixed weight of gold, or in silver at the market price in terms of the currency, the effect of this plan would merely be to compel all the central banks to become speculators in 25 per cent of their reserves. If silver rose in price the banks would make a profit; if it fell in price they would suffer a loss. There is no reason why central banks should be subject to such uncertainties, and very good reasons why they should not. It is doubtful whether such a plan would really economize the use of gold. Moreover, if, as is generally expected, both the dollar and the “sterling bloc” of currencies are eventually to be devaluated—that is, if the dollar, pound, and other currencies are to be made redeemable in a smaller amount of gold than formerly—devaluation in itself seems likely to economize the use of gold sufficiently.

Senator Pittman's other chief proposal at the conference was that the gold nations agree to use a higher silver content than formerly in their subsidiary coinage; he ended by compromising on a resolution, which was accepted by the subcommittee to which the matter had been referred, to the effect that the various gold-standard countries should not “debase” their silver coinage more than they already had.

But what Senator Pittman gained from the conference as such was unimportant beside an agreement which he negotiated among the three leading silver-holding and the five chief silver-producing nations of the world in the course of his stay in London, according to which sales of the metal will be restricted for four years and its use will be increased. India agrees to limit its sales during the four-year period to 140,000,000 ounces and Spain to 20,000,000 ounces, while China will discontinue the sale of silver entirely. Meanwhile the leading silver-producing countries—the United States, Canada, Mexico, Peru, and Australia—agree to buy 140,000,000 ounces during the four-year period, of which amount the United States is expected to absorb about three-fourths, or some 24,000,000 ounces yearly. Of course, Congress may refuse to ratify the agreement, but such a refusal is unlikely. If the scheme is accepted, it means that at fifty cents an ounce—and it is predicted that the price will go higher—the United States Treasury will buy $12,000,000 worth of silver annually from American mines for four years.

The silver propagandists contend, of course, that an advance in the price of silver is imperative in the interests of general recovery. Their chief argument in this respect is that the fall in the price of silver from the 1929 level has correspondingly reduced the purchasing power of the Far East, particularly of China, and that only a restoration in the price of silver can restore this purchasing power. This argument, in so far as it is sincere, is fallacious. The purchasing power of the Far East consists not of silver but of its total exports. It is with silk, beans, eggs, tea, and a hundred other commodities that China pays for her imports, and only to a very negligible extent with silver. In fact in 1932 we exported to China nearly $9,000,000 worth of silver and received only $600,000 worth from there. The drop in silver has merely the effect on foreign trade that a depreciation in currency has elsewhere, except that Chinese internal prices adjust themselves more slowly than prices elsewhere. It is important, of course, to keep the price of silver as stable as possible, but this is something radically different from the adoption of artificial measures designed to make it as high as possible.

Dr. Fish

THE practical jokers in New York City who have long been accustomed to beguile their friends into calling the Battery on April Fool's Day in order to ask for a mythical Dr. Fish were righter than they knew, for during the weeks just past the keepers there have been besieged with citizens imploring to be allowed to dip their hands into a new sort of holy water sanctified by having been lived in by tropical fish. We hasten to add, however, that the movement is not religious and that it has nothing to do with the fact that the fish is the earliest Christian symbol. It is all because it was discovered, quite by accident, that one of the attendants at the Aquarium was mysteriously cured of a stubborn skin disease and that doctors were inclined to attribute the cure to the presence in fishy water of what biologists call bacteriophages.

It may even be that there is something in the whole fantastic story; stranger accidents have happened before in the history of medical science. Quinidine, which has a mysterious action in regularizing the heart, was discovered when a cardiac case was mysteriously improved after an attack of malaria had been cured by quinine. Doctors now regularly treat gangrenous wounds with maggots because it was found during the war that wounds so infested were generally almost free from gangrene; and the whole of the new fever treatment for tertiary syphilis grew out of the chance observation that paresis was strikingly rare in a certain region of the Near East where syphilis and malaria were both very common.

There is another interesting fact which the newspaper accounts of the incident have overlooked—namely, that amateur breeders of tropical fish have long believed that old aquarium water had some mysterious virtue. It is a common custom for them to preserve such water carefully and to transfer it from tank to tank in the belief that fishes put into "new" water were more likely to be the victims of disease. The more logical among them were inclined to treat the tradition as an old wives' tale but for once, at least, the old wives' tale very probably embodied a real truth. The ~~same~~ bacteriophages which cured the attendant at the New York Aquarium protected the fish from infection.

No one, of course, knows what a bacteriophage is. It is too small to be seen by the most powerful microscopes, and it passes freely through filters which catch even bacteria. It is, as a matter of fact, merely the name of something whose existence is assumed in order to account for an effect, but so, for that matter, are the atom and the electron. No one knows, even, whether a bacteriophage is living or non-living, for it seems to behave in some ways like a living organism and in some ways like one of those highly complex but non-living substances known as enzymes. Perhaps it is not really either. Perhaps, as some biologists have suggested, it is the link between the two. Perhaps then, Dr. Fish of April Fool's Day fame will help to answer the biggest question of biology, "What is life?"

The Fetish of Economy

THE NATION has received a number of letters in regard to its stand against the discharge of employees by the federal government in the interest of so-called economy. In what we have written we have tried to point out, first, that in a crisis when relief of unemployment is the biggest job facing the country it is folly for the Administration to discharge one worker in order to finance the employment of another and, second, that in effect the policy represents a destructive inroad upon the non-partisan civil service and the creation of jobs outside of it to be filled as political patronage. We have received no correspondence in disagreement with our second contention, and we believe that criticism of the first is due to certain misapprehensions about employment under the government as compared with work in what we miscall "private industry." One correspondent writes that our policy would "keep on the pay roll a lot of Republicans who are so many parasites." Another reader says:

I am much out of sympathy with your plea for retaining all workers in government service. Also, it seems reasonable to me to dismiss government employees and then to create work for them elsewhere. The present is the only possible moment for putting into effect the much needed reduction in the number of government jobs. Workers in temporary conservation camps or in receipt of a small maintenance allowance will be absorbed in other fields; workers in government offices are never absorbed in anything else.

A good many years ago when nearly all federal appointments were frankly party spoils, the government services were not unjustly held in amused contempt as shining examples of waste and inefficiency. That attitude has survived partly by tradition but also through selfish modern propaganda, in spite of the fact that today all but an insignificant number of the federal employees are enrolled in the non-partisan civil service. The exceptions are departmental executives at the top and a few hangers-on at the bottom. Although many persons now in the civil service owe their appointment in some degree to political favor, most of them have since been glad to refrain from party activities—according to the requirements of the civil-service law—and have become public servants in a true sense. By and large they are faithful and far from overpaid workers. It is notorious that in the many fine technical and scientific services of the government compensation is far inferior to that paid outside. Although there are, and doubtless always will be, instances of waste and folly in the federal services, we think that by and large they are filling an incontestably useful social function and that, unlike some municipal organizations, they are not overmanned. The propaganda to the contrary which has been insidiously circulated in recent years comes from a comparatively small group of privileged and large-property-holding persons who are opposing the socially desirable effort to increase taxes upon incomes, profits, and other wealth in the higher reaches.

Clamor against taxes should never be allowed to obscure the fact that the employees of so-called private industry are just as really supported by the public, indirectly, as are those in government service directly. At their worst we know of no government wastes so glaring as the excessive compensation paid by American business in recent years to banking and utility officials, insurance heads, and industrial executives—often for hoodwinking or swindling the public—not to speak of the incredible sums dissipated in selling, promotion, advertising, and "service."

We do not oppose reductions in the personnel of certain services of the government, provided the employees are transferred to other work, nor do we condemn the recent cut in pay of 15 per cent or compulsory furloughs to a reasonable extent. We do insist that the place to begin unemployment relief is at home, and that it is ridiculous for the Administration to open one window for hiring unemployed while at another it is discharging its own employees. We think that the fetish of economy has led to some befuddled policy in Washington. A period of acute unemployment enforces economy on most individuals, but demands liberal expenditures by the federal government, which has the power to finance itself by loans and taxation.

One of our readers, quoted above, makes what appears to be a point of some validity in the contention that workers in temporary services will eventually be absorbed in other fields but that those in government offices never will be. But that position assumes that the country is destined one day to resume the working hours of 1929. Our own belief is that shorter hours are, and ought to be, here to stay, and that in consequence the national government will have to follow its advice to other business to shorten the working week and increase the number of workers. In the near future, therefore, it will need more workers to do an equivalent amount of work than are required at present.

Issues and Men

The Damage to America in London

A CATASTROPHE amounting to a world tragedy"—this is what Franklin D. Roosevelt said the failure of the London Economic Conference would be. Ramsay MacDonald said: "The fate of generations may well depend upon the courage, sincerity, and width of view which we are to show during the next few weeks . . . We must not fail." And Cordell Hull declared: "If, which God forbid, any nation should obstruct and wreck this great conference with the shortsighted notion that some of its favored interests might temporarily profit while thus indefinitely delaying aid for the distressed in every country, that nation will merit the execration of mankind." Even the King declared in his opening address that he could not believe that human beings were unable to solve the problems before them. But the failure is there patent to all men. This effort to find solutions for the capitalist world's misery has failed so completely that Moscow must be overcome with amusement. The peoples who read the declarations that I have cited above are justified now in expecting the prophesied disasters to begin.

The responsibility for this rests primarily upon the United States. It is now perfectly plain that the alleged preparation for the conference in the preliminary conversations in Washington amounted to precisely nothing. There was none of the preliminary spade work essential to the success of a conference unless, as at the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armaments, one nation is ready to offer a concrete proposal for immediate action. In my judgment the fate of the conference was sealed when Cordell Hull not only muffed the opportunity offered to him by MacDonald to open the conference for business, but failed to produce concrete American proposals when he finally uttered the commonplace generalities that made up the bulk of his speech. If America had nothing definite to offer, who could have? I shall never understand why Franklin Roosevelt sent a delegation to London without a program, a policy, or definite instructions, a delegation headed by a low-tariff man whose associates were high-tariff men, apparently trusting to luck that they could do something and then changing his mind as to what he wanted them to do.

This has resulted in the final blow to American prestige in Europe. This is the real catastrophe for us, this and the fact that numerous superficial Americans are now saying, "Well we are glad we have fallen out with those damned, word-breaking welchers. We don't want to play with them and we don't care what they think of us—not in the least." Well, let me explain how rational and naturally pro-American Europeans, and especially Englishmen, feel about us. They are completely bewildered by our constant changes of front, reversals of opinion, and failure to live up to our agreements. They say: "With the best will in the world, dear Americans, we don't know how to do business with you. There was Norman Davis. He made a speech which was everywhere hailed as epoch-making. It seemed to us a complete reversal of your isolationist policy and a promise to stand with us in examining the question of guilt if another war should come and to throw your strength against the aggressor. No sooner was the ink dry upon our exclamations of joy than other interpretations of the speech were given which whittled it down to a point where it seemed to mean nothing. Then Mr. Roosevelt demanded that the World Economic Conference agree upon 'a fixed measure of exchange values . . . and we believe that these must be gold.' Soon after the conference met to carry out his behest he denounced it in vituperative language for seeking to do the very thing he asked of it! Then let us remind you that you took part in the making of the Treaty of Versailles; that you failed to ratify it and failed to enter the League of Nations which your own President created. How can we negotiate with you on any subject and feel that you mean what you say?"

I can only answer this by hanging my head. Of course, I explain that I didn't want the Treaty of Versailles ratified, and that I believe in Congressional control of the executive's acts, feeling that that alone has saved us from many a blunder and from having absolute dictators in the White House in foreign affairs. But this doesn't answer my European friends.

As for our American isolationists who rejoice that we made fools of ourselves and acted abroad like flighty, unreliable boors, I can only admit that their school is probably in the saddle now; that when Congress meets again we shall find ourselves in the midst of a terrific demand that we let Europe go to hell in its own stupid way, and much boasting that we can get on without the rest of the world. To which I reply, as I have many times before, that we can go it alone and bid the world go hang, but that if we do so we can never hope to recover even the normal prosperity of ante-World War days. Curious how some minds work! The other day I dined with a former American diplomat who, despite the failure in London, was surer than ever that we were on our way to an Anglo-American entente. He warmly defended our plan to build up the navy on the ground that sooner or later the united American and British fleets will impose peace upon the world. I pointed out to him that our announcement of this plan had already produced dispatches from Japan announcing great alarm there and a determined demand by their naval jingoes for a bigger program, and that the present distrust and loss of faith in us in England were being exploited by the big navy men there, and have put back prospects of an Anglo-American entente for many years.

All of which brings up the question anew whether capitalist society can possibly save itself from utter chaos. For the first time I have come back from Europe—my seventh trip since the war—to admit a sense of almost complete hopelessness. If some trick of nature itself does not get us out of our economic mess, how can our leaders possibly rescue us? Certainly the London Conference dealt a deadly blow to the world's progress and international cooperation.

Orval Garrison Kilgus

Roosevelt Turns Left

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, July 22

THE Roosevelt Administration is swinging toward the left. By this I mean primarily that the progressive elements represented by Secretaries Ickes, Perkins, and Wallace are steadily gaining influence at the White House at the expense of the reactionary and partisan elements personified by Budget Director Douglas and Postmaster-General "Genial Jim" Farley. That conclusion is supported by several events, foremost among them the President's choice of Secretary Ickes to administer the huge $3,300,000,000 public-works program. It had a double significance. Ickes had headed a faction which demanded that the entire program be launched with the least possible delay, while Douglas was spokesman for those who contended that prosperity was already returning, and that expenditure of the entire sum was unnecessary and wasteful. The view of Ickes prevailed. In the second place, the spending of such a sum obviously offered opportunities for graft, patronage, and favoritism on an enormous scale. It is reported that the agents of a dozen big Tammany contractors had been hanging around for weeks, with greedy eyes and watering mouths. They received their answer in Ickes's announcement that "there is no inside track to a contract." His thirty years' record as a foe of graft and spoils in Chicago is sufficient assurance that he means precisely what he says, even to those who do not know him. It is a terrible disappointment to the "deserving" ones. As if to dispel any doubt that his ideas were in complete accord with those of his administrator, Mr. Roosevelt made a point of telling reporters that, in considering applications for public-works loans, the Administration would be particularly disposed to finance the construction of municipally owned utilities, such as power plants and water works. Of the money advanced, 30 per cent will be outright gifts; the remaining 70 per cent will bear only 4 per cent interest, and may be repaid out of earnings. A sad, sad day for the power trust!

* * * * *

IF the National Recovery Administration maintains its present rate of speed, we may be living under a new economic order by August 1. The application of a blanket code, although euphemistically called a "voluntary agreement," not only will be undertaken with all the moral force of a Presidential command, but it will be supported by a campaign designed to arouse mass opinion to wartime fervor. All plans have been made for nationwide radio appeals, campaign posters, public speeches, and other devices employed in the Liberty Loan drives—not a few of which revive unpleasant memories. That the adventure is a perilous one is obvious, but this writer is convinced that there is no alternative except complete abandonment of the attempt to restore order and prosperity in industry. A continuation of the rising price curve, unaccompanied by any rise in purchasing power adequate to support it, could only end in a disastrous collapse of prices and a devastating curtailment of production. Indeed, it has already resulted in a minor collapse of stock and commodity prices. Furthermore, it will take months to work out codes for individual industries, and it is manifestly unfair to require some industries to conform to the codes approved for them while others indulge in an orgy of speculative production at depression wages and hours. Indeed, it is a question whether industry can survive half law-abiding and half anarchist. The Administration's problem has been intensely aggravated by the attitude of certain large industries, notably steel, which, having learned nothing from the depression, have seen in the invitation to submit codes merely a chance to seize new spoils and recover old ones. Only an industry dominated by the traditions of Frick, Gary, and Morgan would perceive in the present situation an opportunity to obtain government sanction for company unions, reinstatement of the outlawed "Pittsburgh plus" system, and a ban against devices reducing production costs. You can't reason with a hog.

* * * * *

MOST of the criticism of the Recovery Administration has impressed me as being incredibly petty and mean. The critics are somewhat in the position of saying: "Produce the millennium on this spot at two-thirty o'clock tomorrow afternoon, or off goes your head." I have never been accused of lacking a critical temperament, but when I see men and women of unimpeachable sincerity working eighteen to twenty hours a day in a desperate effort to save all our economic lives, I cannot stand off and snipe. It is a curious fact that much of this nagging has come from so-called liberals and "friends of labor," although liberals and labor are in the saddle at recovery headquarters to a degree that would have seemed impossible and even preposterous three months ago. I venture to say that I am as well informed concerning what goes on inside that administration as any observer on the ground, and I do not hesitate to declare that its policies up to the present have been overwhelmingly influenced by the views of Donald Richberg, Alexander Sachs, Edward McGrady, Leo Wolman, and Frances Perkins. If liberals and labor cannot trust them, who the devil can they trust? Something of the same sort might also be said of the criticisms of the Roosevelt Administration at large. Here, as if in answer to the liberals' prayer, we are confronted with a program which represents, in very large part, the hopes, aspirations, and labors of such men as Justice Brandeis; Senators Norris, Wagner, and La Follette; Joseph B. Eastman, Harold Ickes, Frances Perkins, and Henry Wallace—by an Administration which, when it was unable to obtain Felix Frankfurter's personal services, accepted his recommendations in filling nearly half a dozen of the most important legal posts in the government. And still some of the liberals aren't satisfied. What do they want?

* * * * *

I would be one of the last to assert that there is nothing to criticize in the Administration's policies. The situation produced by the "economy" movement, for example, is little short of a national disgrace. In the case of the Recovery Administration we have the government recruiting some of the finest brains in the country, and saying in effect to them: "The $100,000-a-year men who have been running the nation's industry have finally succeeded in running it into the ditch. We want you to get it out of the ditch, repaired and in running order within sixty days—and a grateful government will pay you $6,000 a year for doing it." If these men are sufficiently gifted to rescue American industry, they are entitled to decent rewards. To ask them to do it at great personal sacrifice is a painful travesty. Consider, moreover, the ludicrous position in which the Administration places itself when it urges employers of all kinds to raise wages and increase employment, while at the same time it sets the contrary example by cutting wages and dismissing workers! What could be more absurd than the miserly attempt to save a few paltry thousands a year by wrecking the staff of a great scientific institution, the Bureau of Standards, whose researches have saved millions a year for industry? The whole tragic farce is a hangover from the panicky days when Ogden Mills and a majority of the newspapers were clamoring for "a balanced budget"—as if a really balanced budget were possible in such times as these! What is needed is not so much a balanced budget as a balanced outlook.

SECRETARY WALLACE'S announcement that cotton planters had signed contracts to reduce production by 3,500,000 bales was a distinct surprise to those who had not appreciated the magnitude of the campaign waged by the Department of Agriculture—and who, perhaps, did not realize the extremes of desperation to which the cotton farmers had been driven. Reduced acreage, coupled with higher production costs in the cotton textile mills, is bound to be reflected in increased prices of finished products. But there are genuine reasons for believing that they have been too low—and if the general recovery program succeeds, we shall be better able to pay them. Limiting production may seem a strange way of increasing wealth, but the fact remains that no other immediate and practical method has been advanced for improving the condition of one of the most distressed classes of Americans. So long as that huge surplus hung over the market, the planter was compelled to take what he could get for his crop. It may be argued that a general leveling of tariffs and stabilization of currencies would provide a market for our export cotton, but recent events at London would seem to demonstrate that that is not a neat little chore to be completed by ten o'clock tomorrow, and even a cotton planter can wait only so long to eat.

Six Months of Hitlerism

By HARRISON BROWN

THE day following Hitler's accession to power a famous paper, the Commercial and Shipping Gazette of Gotenburg, struck a note which was soon to be echoed in the editorials of the civilized press throughout the world. "Such a regime cannot last indefinitely," said the Swedish paper, "but every day is a day too long. Hitler's appointment as chancellor of our great neighbor is an insult to Europe." This contemptuous reference was the first Nazi rebuff; Göring issued an official protest, and seemed naively bewildered that Europe should find such indignation comical on the part of a professional defamer of other nations. Six months have now passed and the temporary insult has become recognized as a permanent menace. At the end of June, Philipp Scheidemann, first Chancellor of the German Republic, wrote in the New York Times that "Hitler's Berlin is an incendiary torch with which criminals and a group of mentally deranged are playing around a powder keg." A week later the Nazi authorities, in order to cover themselves for the arrest of the popular former Bavarian Minister of the Interior, Dr. Fritz Schweyer, announced that Schweyer had been guilty of treason. The treason consisted in stating in a private letter to his late colleague, the former prime minister of Bavaria, that "no trace has been left of rights and justice, of law and order. Divine and human rights are being trodden under foot, and degenerates profess to be the moral regenerators of the German people, while in reality they have merely imposed their will on fellow humans by force, and, like wild animals, have satisfied their egotistical instincts." The Nazis undoubtedly owe most to their ruthless employment of force and terrorism, but ruse also played a part in the early days.

Adolf Hitler has set more than one precedent. The most remarkable of them must certainly be that he has persuaded a great people to vote away its freedom. The path of history is dotted with tyrannies, and seizures of power have been common in most periods, but never before has a nation enjoying full right of free speech thrown out its arms to a tyrant and voluntarily riveted the chains about its own neck. This in itself constitutes the most striking proof of the pathological condition of Germany today. It does more, of course; the elections of March 5 were at once a tribute to the superb technique of Hitler's demagogy and a reflection upon the political intelligence of the German people.

No single explanation of this phenomenon can suffice; the reasons for the success of the National Socialist movement are, like its origins, to be found in a medley of complex political, psychological, and economic factors. But Hitler's life itself provides one interesting sidelight. The most talked-about man in the world has come to Bismarck's chair weighed down with seven hundred leaden pages of autobiography. Rarely indeed can one aspiring to leadership so blatantly have dubbed himself an ignorant barbarian. There is scarcely a page in all that turgid mass of undigested history and personal self-revelation which cannot today be quoted against him with deadly effect, all the more in that the book is still advertised as the bible of the babies of the movement. One significant passage in the early part of the book seems curiously to have escaped attention, however. Hitler is in Vienna seeking work as a house-painter. There he has his first contact with Social Democracy, albeit "nicht sehr erfreulich." He would not, he says, have bothered with his colleagues had they not worried him to join their trade union. Solidarity with the proletariat? The idea shocked him. "My clothes were still decently in order, my speech distinguished, and my temperament—reserved." He refused indignantly and had to quit the job, hence the birth of his anti-Marxist complex. And hence also the chief secret of his later appeal, for what Hitler felt in Vienna before the war the whole German middle class was feeling after the inflation.

The situation was quite different from that superficial snobbishness which prevails among the Anglo-Saxon middle classes, whose proletarianization might conceivably break down the barriers between themselves and the working class. In Germany the middle classes still treasured the legacy of Frederick the Great. While they were servile to the traditional ruling class they had their own place in society and were jealous of it. The enormous body of civil servants, poor in cash but rich in caste, were paid for their devotion to the state in the coinage of social prestige. When Poincaré and the Rhineland industrialists, led by Hugo Stinnes and Alfred Hugenberg, robbed them of their few material possessions and drove hundreds through starvation to suicide, the ghastly process left a residue of stupid, narrow, fiercely patriotic but resentful people. A new poor in a new sense. It was in this pool of trouble that Hitler fished and from the sons of those petty bourgeois that he formed the bulk of his storm troops.

The ferocity of the new hates in Germany must be seen to be believed. Those who have seen it will find nothing astonishing in the fact that young men from relatively sheltered middle-class homes should have become such a menace to public order that Brüning dissolved their organizations and forbade them to wear uniforms. Their later development was even more shocking, but the fact that the storm troopers have earned a universal reputation for unmitigated blackguardism is due chiefly to the character of their leaders, who deliberately made the Terror an organic part of the system.

Knowing their hold on their following to be based upon emotion and ignorance, the Nazi leaders came eventually to forbid their men to attempt argument with the left. A typical incident which fell under my own observation is worth citing. Two Communists standing at a street corner in a south German city some time ago fell into conversation with a group of Nazis in uniform. A lively but quite peaceable discussion developed until a Nazi officer driving by stopped his car and ordered his men to disperse. They refused to do so, whereupon the officer drove to the nearest Schupo and informed him that an "illegal gathering" was taking place at the next street corner, and thus had the men moved on. The S. A. troops not only specialized in individual murder, they consistently avoided fighting when they were not themselves in a majority. It is a literal fact that in four years' close observation of the National Socialist movement I can recall no single incident when they accepted battle at even odds. Hitler's "age of heroism" is a yellow age; the Nazis are brave only under police protection, as in all their provocation parades through working-class districts. Whatever fascism may be politically, it is certainly no breeder of heroes; the fascist heroes are rapers of women, torturers of prisoners, and murderers of the unarmed. The Nazis actually gave a state funeral in a Berlin cathedral to a man named Maikowski who was proved a common murderer!

During one of last year's elections a poster flared from the walls of Germany which depicted a relief map of the country dotted with black crosses. Across it was written the succinct title, "Hitler's Dritte Reich." During the past six months the press of the entire world has borne witness to the terrible truth of that prophecy. Writing over three months ago, the Berlin correspondent of the London Times stated that "what has been happening recently amounts to a diluted St. Bartholomew's Night massacre." Crimes have been committed whose very magnitude stifle protest because the civilized mind is stunned into incredulity. It was weeks before the atrocities of the Brown Terror became known to the outside world, simply because the editors of responsible papers abroad could not believe that even their picked reporters were not being misinformed or carried away by their own emotions. It must be categorically stated that even today there is no conception of the barbarism which has prevailed and which still continues. Still more difficult is it to visualize what life is destined to be for the millions of Germans who are too civilized and too intelligent ever to adapt themselves to the madness of the National Socialist state. We have had admissions recently, by Nazi leaders, of excesses which they strenuously denied while they were instigating them. Some of the torture houses have been closed, notably the one in the Friedrichstrasse, Berlin, where even the Nazi neighbors complained of their night's rest being disturbed by the perpetual screams of the victims. The system of hostages is still freely used and the mouths of victims, of refugees, and others are sealed by the knowledge that if they give an account of their sufferings to the foreign press the same treatment will be meted out to their relatives. After the middle of March, orders went forth that beatings were not to be administered in public. The gangsters, now baptized "auxiliary police," were to "arrest" their victims and do their bloody work under cover. Thus the very exposure of their deeds was twisted by the Nazis into another weapon for the fomentation of anti-foreign sentiment.

In similar fashion the lines of people waiting to inform against personal enemies, or against those whose jobs were coveted, ceased to be conspicuous. Spying is now organized, and a secret police system has been established which caused a private correspondent to write recently that "Italy and Russia are free countries compared with Germany today." Nevertheless the censorship is so complete and the penalties for talking so severe that those not in contact with Jewish or left circles are today easily convinced that the "excesses" have ceased. The extent to which censorship and rumor combined can distort opinion is comically shown by a letter recently received in London from a lady in a small German town. After expressing her indignation at the "abominable atrocity lies," the writer went on seriously to write that "the French are said to have reoccupied Mainz and we hear that no German's life is safe in London"!

Some foreign observers imagine that "things will settle down" and that the Nazis will adopt the veneer of civilization. This opinion is not shared by those best acquainted with the mentality of the men in command. Two forms of their barbarism at least can admit of no change within their dogma, whatever smoke screen expediency may cause to be emitted. Neither anti-Semitism nor the persecution of the liberals can be relaxed. The former by no means comprises the whole story of Nazi atrocities but it most glaringly exposes the hollow emotionalism of the regime, since it is based on that meanest and most contemptible form of human weakness, racial prejudice.

Space does not permit of any exhaustive examination of the Jewish persecution but some idea of its extent may be gathered from extracts from the new anti-Jewish laws. The ruling which is to be applied in the "purging" of the entire Civil Service reads as follows:

1. A person shall be known as a non-Aryan who has non-Aryan, in particular Jewish, grandparents. It suffices if one parent or grandparent is a non-Aryan. This is especially to be taken for granted if one parent or grandparent has belonged to the Jewish religion.

2. In case of doubt as to Aryan origin a certificate must be procured from an expert in racial research at the Ministry of the Interior.

The Reich law appertaining to the disbarment or refusal of admission of non-Aryans to the legal profession reads:

1. Admission to the bar of lawyers who are of non-Aryan extraction according to the law for the purging of the Civil Service of April 7, 1933, can be rescinded until September 30, 1933.

2. Admission to the bar may be denied to persons who, according to the law of April 7, 1933, are of non-Aryan extraction even if there are no grounds for exclusion according to the code of disbarment.

3. The administrator of justice may issue a prohibition to plead against a lawyer, such prohibition to be effective until the decision has been made as to whether authorization for revocation according to paragraphs 1 or 3 will be issued.

If these laws were rescinded today the effect would be slight, for anti-Semitism has been deeply sown and furiously cultivated in the minds of millions, ineradicably no doubt in the minds of children. But there is no sign that they will be rescinded. On the contrary, as Nazi incompetence becomes more manifest and as their economic and other difficulties increase and cause dissension, it seems inevitable that the leaders will increase their efforts to divert the disappointment of their following into anti-Jewish channels.

The Brown Terror goes on at all times. Whole districts are terrorized and men and women speak only in frightened whispers of the victims in their midst. Hundreds have been killed, thousands more have been injured, many of them permanently, especially about the eyes and the genital organs, while the number of robberies accompanied by violence defy all computation. Neither women nor the sick nor old people are safe from the savages. In a village in Hessen some weeks ago a Jew who was ill in bed was made to get up and walk through the street calling "Heil, Hitler." He asked to be allowed to do it when he had recovered; he offered money, which was taken; but he was forced out then and there. At the end of the street he was beaten until he fainted. Later he was picked up by neighbors and taken home to die. An acquaintance of my own met an old friend just home after three weeks' "preventive arrest." Questions elicited nothing, but later, when quite alone with his friend, he opened his shirt and showed his body covered with deep scars. Another acquaintance was fetched from his bed in a Berlin suburb at night and pushed into a large sack, which was bound around with wire netting. He was beaten until he ceased to move and was then taken to a hospital and left there. The next day the gangsters called to take him away for further treatment, but the doctors nobly lied and declared he had died in the night.

The favorite weapon has been the "steel wand," a rubber ball on a spring at the end of a steel rod which is capable of inflicting terrible injuries without actually or immediately causing death. Recently the Austrian Allgemeine Zeitung published a protest against the continued brutality of the storm troops which is alleged to have been made to Hitler by the Nazi leader, Graf von Reventlow. "The typical procedure is for trade-union officials, including women, to be dragged to Nazi headquarters and there beaten and otherwise ill-treated, often in a way that cannot be described." The Count might have added that this is only the first part of the "typical procedure." After one or two such trips the victim is usually wrecked enough to be induced to sign a "confession." Only then is he turned over to the police and charged with some form of treason, and for the purpose of conviction the "confession" is admitted in court as a legal document. In such circumstances as these it is not surprising that even the reactionary Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, before it was taught obedience by a term of suppression, should have written that "in wide circles the panic terror has spread."

The whole truth will never be known, for no later summary can do justice to a system of terror extending over a whole country. Nor can anything excuse it. The Brown Terror is not only the worst of such outbreaks which have occurred in Europe, it is also the meanest. The Nazis have never been persecuted. On the contrary, the many criminals among them have been far too leniently dealt with. It is notorious that the scales of justice in Germany have for years been weighted in favor of nationalist reaction. There was no Communist or other "danger"—the suggestion has been laughed out of court by every qualified foreign observer in the country. The Terror has been inaugurated as a means of disposing of the opposition, as a substitute for constructive measures of which the party leaders are incapable, and because it fits the barbaric natures of those leaders. The appalling case of Frau Jankowski who was severely beaten has been widely reported. This woman had devoted her entire life to social service in a Berlin suburb. When questioned about the outrage, the Nazi envoy to Scandinavia, Herr Alexander Bogs, coolly remarked, "if ever a Socialist or Communist deserved such a hiding, then it was Frau Jankowski."

For the first time in history in time of peace a government has imprisoned numbers of its own nationals on no other grounds than that their opinions are objectionable. It does not seem to be generally recognized that at least 30,000 men are today doing forced labor in concentration camps. They range from ex-governors of provinces to workmen. Not a great deal is known about the administration of these camps, but that life in them is neither pleasant nor safe is indicated by the number of those reported "shot in flight." In most cases, of course, this is just a euphemism for the cold-blooded murder of a prisoner. The governor of one camp, when he was interviewed by an English newspaperman, cynically remarked that he was pestered by the wives and other relatives of the prisoners asking permission to see them, "permission which is of course always refused on principle." Those who naively imagine that Hitler's professions of desire for peace are to be taken seriously should consider the official statement issued at the end of April in regard to these camps. Not only is the radio, the press, and every organ affecting public opinion entirely devoted to chauvinistic and war propaganda but, according to this statement, those above all "who took a leading part in pacifist associations" are to be permanently incarcerated.

It is a horrifying fact that Germany is today ruled by men of a type such as have never before governed a great nation: drug addicts and murderers, thieves, forgers, and moral decadents. These are not mere random terms of abuse; they describe the commonly recognized character of most of the chief leaders of the movement. The academic life of the nation has been destroyed. The magnificent civil service, which has ever been the backbone of Germany, has been wrecked; today its offices are filled with men whose only qualification is that they are infatuated devotees of the Nazi cause. Small wonder that a distinguished German should have remarked recently, "If these criminals disappeared tonight, they would have been found to have done irreparable damage." And meantime letter after letter received from Germany bears the heart-broken words, "What will history say of our generation?"

It is the effect of the regime abroad, however, which seems likely to alter the course of Europe. With intensive fomentation of the war spirit being openly conducted among the youth, with "incidents" occurring on every frontier, and with the cardinal points of the recent conference of Nazi leaders before their eyes, it is obvious that Germany's neighbors will not indefinitely remain "patient." The second of the professed aims of the Third Reich, as discussed at the leaders' conference, was "the cutting of every international tie whatsoever." In that at least Hitler is succeeding even better than he knows. One can only hope that the very rapidity of his success in this field may yet destroy him and that, by the removal of this abortion of government, Germany may be saved from annihilation.

Whooping Up Muscle Shoals

By STETSON CLARK

KILOWATTS have been shamelessly going to waste over the spillways of the great Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals. But not word-power. The word plants are operating even if the nitrate plants are not. Indeed, now that Roosevelt's Tennessee Valley development and reclamation project is swinging into action, they are humming. The transmission lines are built, too, for disseminating the product. Every scrap of it is being utilized—to promote Muscle Shoals real estate.

The golden button that first started the Muscle Shoals word plants was touched in 1922 by Henry Ford, and Thomas Edison played a part in their dedication. When Ford was thinking of buying Muscle Shoals, he visited the development accompanied by Edison. Standing on the approach to the Wilson Dam, Ford and Edison are reported to have engaged in the following conversation:

"What do you see?" said Ford to Edison.

"I see more wealth than all the minted coins of the world. What do you see?" replied Edison.

"I see," replied Ford in turn, "a city seventy-five miles long. I will put a million men at work."

And what a vision that offered to the land-boom boys!

For this great metropolis that he envisaged Ford offered to Congress in 1922 a down payment of $5,000,000 in cash. This offer he withdrew in 1924. Moreover, he has in part disclaimed his quoted statements regarding the potential industrial possibilities of Muscle Shoals and has frowned upon their use in promotion literature. But not even Ford can stop a real-estate salesman from talking, once he is started. If anyone doubts it, let him get in touch with one of the organizations selling lots at Muscle Shoals. A horde of these came into existence like mushrooms after the Ford pronouncement, and a number still have headquarters in New York, Chicago, Detroit, and many other large cities. Each time Congress has considered utilizing the hydroelectric-power development they have exhibited renewed activity. The biggest boom came in 1925 and 1926. At that time streets were laid out—or, to be accurate, turf was scraped off between subdivision sidewalks—over an area surrounding the dam and nitrate plants sufficient to accommodate a population of 500,000. Then taxes lapsed; grass grew again between the subdivision sidewalks.

But on May 10 of this year the New York Sun printed a special dispatch from Muscle Shoals which began as follows: "The boom times that the Muscle Shoals area has long awaited are now definitely in process of development. . . ." Similar dispatches appeared in other papers. So the turf is again being scraped off between the sidewalks; the back taxes are being paid. Business in the phantom city of Muscle Shoals looks up. Real estate has already jumped 100 per cent in value, according to the dispatches. Would you like to know more about it? On Broadway in New York in a store window you will see a fascinating replica of Muscle Shoals—unless it has recently been removed—a great contour map of the area, with a model of the dam, the nitrate plants, and all the other developments; there is even a toy railroad train chugging round. Inside you will find a chap lecturing.

Nature, this lecturer informs you, in her wisdom and bounty assembled more valuable and useful materials in the Tennessee Valley than in any other region of like size on earth. His exact words are: "All minerals except copper, gold, and silver; all woods useful for building except mahogany and teak." And though you may have supposed that the greatest American deposits of bauxite, the ore from which aluminum is derived, were in Arkansas, this lecturer informs you that in fact the second largest deposits in the world are just west of the Wilson Dam. That is where Arkansas is, of course, but he doesn't expect his listeners to know enough geography to check up on him. His figures about coal and iron appear to include the Birmingham district, but he does not bother to mention that fact.

Would you like to see a real action picture, a motion picture, of Muscle Shoals? That is possible at the Muscle Shoals auditorium, just a few doors farther down the street. It is operated by the same organization. Here you can listen more comfortably sitting down. And while the movies show what a beehive of activity Muscle Shoals is—rock, asphalt operations, limestone quarries, coal mines, blast furnaces—leaving the audience to judge for itself of the nearness and importance of each to Muscle Shoals—the lecturer at the auditorium reinforces the general appeal of Muscle Shoals with a few statistics on the possible real-estate developments of the region.

Now, by the way, are you not beginning to think that you would like to ask a rather personal question? The lecturer suspects that you would. Let him phrase it for you. Isn't it this? "Where, how, and when do I fit in? How do I profit from this wonderful Muscle Shoals development?" As answer to your query let him draw a comparison between Muscle Shoals and Gary. One could buy land in Gary for $40 an acre before the United States Steel Corporation decided to locate its plant there. Now property in the business district is worth $3,000 a front foot. What brought about this change? Why, the United States Steel Corporation put 20,000 men to work there. Roosevelt is going to put 200,000 men to work in the Tennessee Valley. Does your question need any answer beyond that? The lecturer neglects to inform you that very few of the 200,000 men are likely to be employed at the Wilson Dam, where his subdivisions are laid out.

Would you like still more assurance how you are to profit from all this? The lecturer continues. The very power generated at Muscle Shoals implies the coming of a great industrial population. He quotes Ford to the effect that in industrial developments each unit of horse-power provides employment for a man. Already Muscle Shoals is equipped to generate 200,000 horse-power. Eventually it will develop 750,000 or 1,000,000. Every industrial worker supports four in addition to himself. Draw your own conclusions.

This is the ballyhoo. Part of it. To get results in sales of twenty-by-one-hundred-foot building lots at, say, from $450 to $7,000 apiece, it is of course necessary to have an audience of the right sort. The store demonstration is one means of securing such an audience. Salesmen at this open-to-the-public demonstration judiciously distribute tickets for the auditorium event—or, rather, take the names and addresses of those who would like them. The tickets are sent by mail. Another way in which audiences for Muscle Shoals lectures are secured in New York is through the distribution of postcards with detachable return tabs on them to passers-by in the more prosperous office-building districts, such as the region around the Grand Central terminal. On the return tab, above the place where one is supposed to fill in one's name and address, is printed: "I can save $10 or more per month and I am sufficiently interested in Muscle Shoals to ask you to send me complete information."

Both the return postcard and the store demonstration are drag-net methods of securing prospects, better designed for quantity than quality of haul. More selective in its results is the old and tested plan of circularizing mailing lists of people of assured income with no special knowledge of investment, such as dentists, school teachers, and physicians, or, better still, "sucker lists" of those who are known to have taken similar bait in the past. Another device for securing prospects, worthy, perhaps, of special mention, is known as the "bird-dog" method. According to the New York Better Business Bureau, which has had cause to take a special interest in the Muscle Shoals promotion, the bird-dog plan is especially effective in flushing the quarry in times like these. For the benefit of the reader unfamiliar with sporting technique it may be well to explain that a bird dog points, and the hunter performs the execution. The following incident will illustrate.

A man and his wife were listening to one of the more popular radio programs, and being slow to turn it off at its conclusion, heard and became interested in an unfamiliar program following on the same station. It was about Muscle Shoals. At its conclusion the broadcaster offered—what do you think?—a job! Part-time work, not selling, something that anyone of ordinary education and intelligence could do, connected with the great government project at Muscle Shoals. Those interested were instructed to report at a given address the following day at three in the afternoon. This man had been out of work for nearly a year. Decidedly he was interested. He reported. He was received at one of those Muscle Shoals lectures that have been described. For an hour and a half ninety-seven unemployed white-collar workers, mostly men but with a considerable sprinkling of women, listened to a dissertation on Muscle Shoals. They were not told the nature of the work, but they were given this clue as to how they might qualify for it. No undesirables of the know-it-all or smart-Alec type were wanted—only men and women of character and intelligence, capable of doing as they were told, need trouble to return. Such persons and only such were to report again at the same time on the following afternoon. Eighty of the ninety-seven did so. They listened to another lecture on the same subject, and were treated to a free motion picture. Still they were not told the nature of the work. But they were informed that by their presence they had demonstrated that they were the type of men and women desired. They were as good as hired, every one of them. They had demonstrated their good faith. On the following day they would be told the nature of the work. And they were.

All the eighty reported. The nature of the work for which they had been engaged was divulged. It was this: Each person was to interest every friend and relative who might be in a position to invest in Muscle Shoals real estate. All he had to do was to induce his friends and relatives to come to the lectures and free motion-picture exhibitions. As had been promised, no selling effort whatever would be called for; the organization's own selling force would attend to that part of it. For each friend or relative who bought a lot the—shall we say?—bird dog would receive twenty-five dollars.

Thus by one means or another the "investment" possibilities of Muscle Shoals are brought to the most likely hearthsides in the land. Golden words make it appear that the whole project is to be consummated in the midst of the sidewalk-crisscrossed subdivisions—"Highland Park," "Ford City," "Nitrate City," "Millionaire Lake," and "Eldorado"—that have been laid out in the vicinity of the Wilson Dam. The sober facts are that the Congress has appropriated $50,000,000 for the completion of the Cove Creek dam, for putting into experimental operation the nitrate plants, and for further utilization of the Wilson Dam hydroelectric development. It is expected that construction gangs will soon commence work at the site of the Cove Creek dam, which is upstream 180 miles. A lesser number of workmen will be required for constructing power lines, installing additional equipment, and overhauling the existing nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals. In 1926 United States Army engineers estimated that not more than 2,000 men would be employed if both of the government's nitrate plants were put into operation. To operate the dam and power house when all the proposed units are installed, about 100 men will be required. Dwelling-houses built by the government in the reservations surrounding the nitrate plants provide quarters for the skilled and executive personnel. According to present plans, practically all the power generated at Muscle Shoals in excess of that required for operating the nitrate plants will be transmitted to important and developed industrial centers nearby, such as Nashville, Chattanooga, Memphis, and Birmingham.

These are the essential facts of the Muscle Shoals development. The essential nature of the Muscle Shoals real-estate promotion, on the other hand, was indicated when in 1923 the New York Better Business Bureau haled one of the more enterprising promotion organizations into court. Court evidence revealed that the plaintiff in the case paid $6,000 in cash toward a total purchase price of $24,000 for an eighty-acre tract of bottom land near the government's nitrate plants; that $30,000 was expended in laying out sidewalks and grading streets; that promotion and selling expenses brought the entire investment to $150,000; and that the property, laid out in building lots, was for sale for $600,000. Most of it had in fact been sold—on an instalment basis. The contracts stipulated a 25 per cent down payment, 6 per cent interest on the unpaid balance, and a five-dollar-a-year charge for up-keep on each lot. Incidentally, the magistrate (since that time, as a result of the Seabury investigation, he has been deposed) found in favor of the defendant.

One item included in the $120,000 for promotion and other expenses was the cost of free excursions from New York provided for purchasers and prospective purchasers of lots. Similar excursions were sent out from Chicago, Detroit, and other points. But here was the catch. Unless the prospective purchaser—the majority on these excursions were in this class—bought a lot, he paid the cost of the junket himself—approximately $100 a person. If he did make a purchase, the promotion item of $120,000 took care of it. With the great government nitrate plants as exhibit number one, not to mention residential streets which sight-seeing buses might be routed through in the nearby thriving communities of Florence, Tuscumbia, and Sheffield, not many prospective purchasers on these excursions had to pay their own expenses. They merely paid for a building lot or two several times the cost of the excursion.

Walter Lippmann

IV. On Democracy

By AMOS PINCHOT

ON much that Mr. Lippmann has to say of American life, our limits of space forbid comment. Fairly or unfairly, I have chosen for discussion in this article passages from his writings which bear mainly upon inflation, foreign debts, Congressional investigations, and democratic government. Here, needless to say, one is not concerned with Mr. Lippmann as a stylist or literary personage. One is concerned with what he is telling his readers.

It is unjust, I think, to criticize Mr. Lippmann for what his former associates refer to as his swing to the right. I do not find that his books and articles confirm the existence of any real drift toward conservatism. On the contrary, whatever his youthful opinions may have been in the remote days when he founded the Harvard Socialist Club in company with John Reed, his writings show that, despite his employment of the vocabulary and certain clichés of liberalism, he has been a conservative on major questions for the last twenty years. It is true that now and then, on moonlight nights, and especially during general elections, his conservatism may philander a little with liberalism, possibly by way of showing that it is neither prudish nor narrow-minded. But it violates few of the proprieties, and invariably returns to its own chaste bed by midnight. And in any case, if Mr. Lippmann had frankly swung away from liberalism, that would be no one's business but his own.

In 1931, when Mr. Lippmann joined the staff of the conservative Herald Tribune, many feared that as a liberal he would find himself in a difficult position. One doubts that this has been the case. Indeed, one is inclined to believe that, but for occasional disagreements on the question of supporting candidates, Mr. Lippmann and Mr. Ogden Reid find few large issues which they cannot discuss harmoniously. On important policies, Mr. Lippmann is rarely ahead of his time. And as a good pragmatist, who avoids being right at the wrong moment, his opinion is generally the postscript of the least illiberal group in Wall Street.

Lately, Mr. Lippmann has been criticized for his reversals of opinion on inflation. On this score too I think he should be exonerated. For it is the duty of a publicist to abandon any position he has taken the moment he is convinced he is wrong, provided, however—and here I think is where Mr. Lippmann is at fault—he makes no pretenses, and lets his readers know exactly where he stands.

Obviously, the question of currency inflation is one that admits of sincere difference of opinion. It may be argued, for instance, that inflation is, in essence, repudiation of debt and a legalized means of robbing the creditor for the debtor's sake. On the other hand, it may be said that the tendency in modern industrial society is to concentrate wealth in the hands of a comparatively small class, and that when this concentration reaches a point where the purchasing power of the masses is seriously impaired, inflation must be resorted to as a means of moving wealth, i. e. purchasing power, back to the pockets of the people.

However that may be, it was on January 18, 1933, that, after stating that "the Huey Longs" and other Democrats were misrepresenting the attitude of the Roosevelt Administration by conveying the impression that it favored currency inflation, Mr. Lippmann wrote in his column, Today and Tomorrow:

... Mr. Roosevelt proposed in an orderly way to adjust those debts which required adjustment and maintain all obligations, public and private, which it is possible to maintain. The inflationists propose to strike at the currency itself, to debase it deliberately. ... The inflationist method would propose to relieve not only the farmer who has a mortgage but the public-utility company which has bonds outstanding, to reduce the value not only of money owing on real-estate mortgages, but all money—money in savings banks, money in insurance policies, money in governmental bonds, money owing for salaries, for wages, for every kind of fixed obligation.

Mr. Roosevelt ran and was elected after a campaign in which he made it entirely clear that he proposed to deal with the debt problem by detailed and specific adjustments. To suppose that he has secretly scrapped these pledges, and is now following Huey Long, is to believe that there is no honor left in our public life.

And this was not a new position for Mr. Lippmann. For he had been writing eloquently against currency inflation since the previous autumn. By March, 1933, however, we find a change in Mr. Lippmann's attitude. And though he does not swing clear over to the Huey Longs, he nevertheless edges toward them by stating in Today and Tomorrow that "the reopening of the banks will require a willingness to expand the currency adequately." (Italics mine). On the following day, March 8, he marks time, so to speak in his progress toward inflationism, by speaking kindly of "dilution" of the currency, provided, however, our government arrests the inflationary process, "before it gets out of hand."

On April 19, J. P. Morgan hallowed with his blessing the relinquishment of the gold standard. In the meantime, conditions had gone from bad to worse, and it was rumored that the big banks of New York and other debtor interests were fast coming to the conclusion that it was better to be paid in smaller dollars than to have the debtors go broke and not be paid at all. On April 25, after a series of wobblings in which he expressed his preference for inflation by open-market bond purchases and warned the country that, in any event, the government should assure "the banks and private investors that the integrity of the dollar is to be maintained," Mr. Lippmann becomes a currency inflationist by approving the section of the law that gives the President power "to fix the weight of the gold dollar." More than that, he states that the possession of such power is "an accepted part of central banking practice and monetary management."

In the interim, on April 24, Mr. Vincent Sheean, a newspaper correspondent, had written a letter to the Herald Tribune, in which he quoted from Mr. Lippmann's thoroughgoing denunciation of currency inflation of October, 1932. He charged Mr. Lippmann with inconsistency, and begged for an explanation of his change of mind. Mr. Lippmann's article, referred to by Mr. Sheean, reads in part as follows:

It is here that Senator Borah comes forward with a demand for an expansion of the currency, and it is here that he has fallen, I think, into a dangerous error. ... For these reasons it may truthfully be said that an inflation of the currency would make the burden of debtors, of farmers, and producers of all kinds, worse than it is today; that it would not assist, but would actually defeat, that effort to cause a rise in prices which Senator Borah and every other understanding person desires. It is no paradox but the simple truth to say that a serious attempt to inflate the currency would aggravate violently the deflation of prices.

On April 27, refusing to be taken in inconsistency, Mr. Lippmann annihilates Mr. Sheean in a letter to the Herald Tribune. He denies that he has either changed his mind or been inconsistent. He makes no claim to infallibility or immutability, yet it so happens, he says, that in this particular case he has been consistent as well as right.

The only difference between what I now advocate and what I have been advocating for more than a year is that it no longer seems to me possible to make the policy successful within the limits of the gold standard. Since last April I have had increasing doubts as to whether it was possible "to make good on a gold basis the existing capital structure" (April 29, 1932), but I have never felt that it was honorable to abandon the gold standard except under compulsion. That compulsion came at the end of February, when the banks were closed and specie payments had to be suspended.

In making this reply to Mr. Sheean I do not wish to pretend that in all matters, or even in all aspects of this one matter, my articles have been consistent and unchanging. I have often changed my opinions, sometimes because they appeared later to be wrong, sometimes because I have lived and learned, and sometimes, in the case of the gold standard, because events themselves had changed.

It is not important, but it just happens that I am not guilty of the particular inconsistency which Mr. Sheean mentions.

In other words, with a fatherly tolerance toward the dissenter, which might be hard to match in recent controversial exchanges, he gives Mr. Sheean to understand that it is not he, Mr. Lippmann, that has changed; it is the course of events. Clearly, Mr. Lippmann's views have remained unaltered, since they have retained a fixed position in relation to truth, history, and the universe in which Mr. Lippmann has his home. And somehow, the conclusion is conveyed that Mr. Sheean has been guilty of a rather shabby trick. However, irrespective of the merits of the case, which are plainly on Mr. Sheean's side, one's feeling is that Mr. Sheean deserves scant sympathy. He should have known in advance that an effort to corner Mr. Lippmann on any subject whatever is like trying to corner Jove himself. Evading the issue, our publicist wraps himself in a cloud, like an offended deity, and, having blasted Mr. Sheean with his lightning, vanishes in the sky.

Coming to Mr. Lippmann's attitude on the payment of war debts, we must admit that our inconstant nymph of journalism has shown a more than ordinary degree of consistency. Yet he avoids being uncomfortably consistent. For, as he told Mr. Sheean—Mr. Lippmann lives and learns. On November 16, 1932, he wrote in Today and Tomorrow:

The policy of cancelation can be dismissed quickly. The American nation will not offer it and some of the important debtors will ask for it. The fundamental objection to cancelation, now that the debt contracts exist, is that it would impair treaty obligations in a world which depends for its security and its prosperity upon treaties.

(Alas, poor world!) More than once, Mr. Lippmann assures us that he is not for cancelation; he is for revision. Yet, when we turn hopefully to his previous issue of July 15 for a definition of revision, our curiosity is not rewarded. For we find that, to all intents and purposes, revision is cancelation, since he urges wiping out—not canceling, be it known—the entire debt of the fifteen debtor nations, upon their payment to this country of a sum equal to 9 per cent of their total indebtedness. Nevertheless, on January 16, 1933, he replies indignantly to a correspondent who rates him as a cancelationist, that the statement that he is a cancelationist is “an astonishing misrepresentation” and “flatly untrue.”

Apparently, in Mr. Lippmann’s mind, cancelation of a mere 91 per cent of the debts has not only the virtue of not being cancelation, but the even greater one of preserving those solemn documents which sustain the world. One would like to ask just where, between a 91 and a 100 per cent revision, Mr. Lippmann finds the point where revision becomes cancelation and treaties tremble in their boots?

Plainly, cancelation, like inflation, is a debatable issue. But, irrespective of the spot where expediency and justice meet, it would seem incumbent on a responsible publicist to state his case candidly, and with some regard for his own government. Yet, at a time when the spokesmen and press of the debtor nations, plus a considerable part of our own newspapers, supported by an army of militant bankers, Anglophiles, Francophiles, and the sort of fashionables who are wont to curry favor with foreigners by running down their own country, were united in a frantic effort to make the United States appear a usurious Shylock, squeezing the last penny from friendly peoples, Mr. Lippmann was more French than the French, more English than the English. He not only made no attempt to check this nonsense, but led it, to the delight of the foreign press, which picked up his writings and spread them far and wide as proof that the great liberal journalist of America was ashamed of his country’s greed.

In Today and Tomorrow, Mr. Lippmann accused America of persuading France and England to go to Lausanne and cancel the German reparations in the innocent belief that America, through President Hoover, had pledged itself to reciprocate by postponing the interest payments. This despite the fact that Mr. Laval, to whom Mr. Hoover made whatever representations were made, was far too shrewd a politician not to know that Mr. Hoover had no power to bind Congress to any course whatever.

On most occasions Mr. Lippmann is a restrained writer. He wins his readers by the suave temperance of his style. But he arraigns the Americans who balk at cancelation in a big bow-wow style—something of which he is very rarely guilty—and with an intemperance which he reserves for no other group of malefactors. They are political terrorists, wavers of the bloody shirt, makers of discord. He writes as though they felt for the debtor nations an insane hatred, like that of the Northern irreconcilables for the South after the Civil War. After citing the generosity of England and France at Lausanne, and their changed attitude toward Germany, he writes in his column of July 15, 1932:

What they have learned we shall learn. The moment will come when men will say to themselves here that the war which began eighteen years ago must end, and that it is time to stop waving the bloody shirt, that it is time to deal as Lincoln would have dealt, with his kind and patient strength, and to retire into the obscurity which would be their worst and sufficient punishment all that brood who inherit the implacable hatred and evil genius of Thaddeus Stevens. We have had enough of the political terrorists who, appealing to all that is base in our natures, have brought the politicians to a point so abject they dare not call their souls their own. Let the exploiters of hatred and the makers of discord get out of our way. They have hurt and humiliated us long enough. We have other business to do. For this people will not forever allow its interests to be perverted, its policy to be distracted, its reputation to be lowered, its honor impugned, its magnanimity and greatness denied by the scratching and wailing of jingoes and ignoramuses.

But if Mr. Lippmann is impassioned on the question of cancelation, we find him hardly less so on the subject of democracy. But before examining him on democracy, let us cite briefly a few facts which seem germane to its discussion. The history of government may be regarded as the story of the conflict between two theories—the democratic theory and that opposing theory which upholds the massing of power in the hands of a comparatively small group. History abundantly proves that human beings are not fitted for the possession of great power, and that those whom the gods would make mad they first make powerful. It took thousands of years for civilized peoples to realize that concentration of power means abuse of power; and that, for all its drawbacks, democracy, in the long run and except in grave emergencies, is the most workable form of social control. This conclusion is perhaps the most important one that has been reached by any considerable portion of the human race.

Unfortunately, however, it is not an unassailable conclusion. And from time to time, especially in the crises which occur in the aftermath of war, democracy must endure a new and painful via crucis. Its reputed friends turn against it. Its enemies redouble their attack. Distrust of the people and exaltation of executive power are breathed with the air. And this has been so throughout history. In Greece, before the Peloponnesian war, democracy seemed established. It held the loyalty of the Athenian people, and stirred their imagination. “But a people ruling—” says a speaker in Herodotus, “first, the very name is beautiful—Isonomie (Equality in Law).” Yet, as Gilbert Murray recalls, it was but two decades later that an Athenian statesman voiced the opinion of a changed world. “Of course,” said he, “all sensible men know what democracy is. . . . There is nothing new to be said about acknowledged insanity.”

In “Public Opinion,” 1922, and “The Phantom Public,” 1925, Mr. Lippmann sets forth his views on democracy. While he does not tell us in so many words that democracy should be abandoned in favor of some sort of fascist regime, this is the unspoken conclusion. As usual, Mr. Lippmann airs his talent for not saying the thing he implies. But he lists innumerable and apparently unsurmountable objections to democracy, and makes it sufficiently plain that, if there are still those who have faith in the democratic theory, they should be warned; for they are kneeling at the shrine of a dying god. Thus, though Mr. Lippmann refuses to slay his democracy outright, his assault upon it is like the Chinese torture of a thousand cuts. While no single gash inflicted by our writer is fatal in itself, the sum total leaves democracy little more than a bleeding stump.

Democracy, argues Mr. Lippmann, presupposes an in-finitude of impossibilities. It presupposes either a "self-sufficient individual" or "an Oversoul regulating everything." It presupposes an informed public and an organized public opinion, whereas, Mr. Lippmann reminds us, such a public opinion is a figment of the imagination. It presupposes familiarity not merely with issues but with men, which is impossible in a country like the United States, on account of the vast numbers of the electorate.

Jeffersonian democracy, says Mr. Lippmann, predicates "an ideal environment and a selected class," and though this did not conflict with the political science of the Jeffersonian era, "it did conflict with the realities." Democracy presupposes an informed Congress, whereas, says Mr. Lippmann; "... a congress of representatives is essentially a group of blind men in a vast, unknown world." Elaborating his point that the plight of Congress is due to its ignorance, he writes:

So bad is the contact of legislators with necessary facts that they are forced to rely either on private tips or on that legalized atrocity, the Congressional investigation, where Congressmen, starved of their legitimate food for thought, go on a wild and feverish man-hunt, and do not stop at cannibalism.

Thus, as in his previous books, Mr. Lippmann pays his respects to Congressional investigations. And that he does so at this time is significant. For 1922, the year he wrote "Public Opinion" marked the beginning of a series of Congressional inquiries which were to bring out, more dramatically than ever, the character and practices of the big business administrators whom, in "Drift and Mastery," 1914, and "A Preface to Morals," 1929, Mr. Lippmann offers as the hope of the modern world. It was in 1922 that the Lockwood Committee made its investigation of the steel interests. It was in 1923 that Senator Robert M. La Follette published his report, showing that the Rockefeller group so dominated the oil industry through transportation differentials and unfair competition, that:

Standard Oil today fixes the price which the producer of crude oil receives at the well, the price which the refiner receives for his gasoline and kerosene, as well as the retail price paid by the consumer.

In 1924, Senator Walsh of Montana investigated the oil scandals, which wound up in the conviction of Secretary Fall, the escape of Attorney-General Daugherty by means of a hung jury, and the disclosure that four of the enlightened administrators of the Standard Oil companies had, with Harry Sinclair, conspired to defraud their stockholders of $8,000,000. It was in 1926 that the Senate Committee on Campaign Expenditures surprised Insull in an attempt to buy for $125,000 a seat in the Senate for his friend, Colonel Smith, the Chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission. On the whole, Mr. Lippmann could hardly have found a worse moment to denounce Congressional inquiries.

Coming now to "The Phantom Public," a sequel to "Public Opinion," we find in Mr. Lippmann's assaults on democracy a bolder tone. At this time, 1925, notwithstanding the efforts of the liberals in Congress, plutocracy seemed more firmly entrenched than ever, while big business stood at the gates of that paradise of privilege whose tranquillity was only to be shattered by the crash of 1929. As Mr. Lippmann himself points out in "Men of Destiny" the country had become bored with scandals, and Coolidge had managed public opinion so adroitly that for "every yawp" he could "match a yawn." Democracy was at a low ebb when Mr. Lippmann wrote "The Phantom Public." And this may account for the unwonted vigor with which our publicist presses his attack.

The problems of democracy, says Mr. Lippmann, change so quickly that familiarity with them at any given time becomes useless a few years later. "That is why the usual appeal to education as the remedy for the incompetence of democracy is so barren." Democracy "has never developed an education for the public. . . . It has, in fact, aimed not at making good citizens but at making a mass of amateur executives." It produces "a bewildered public and a mass of insufficiently trained officials."

The force of public opinion is partisan, spasmodic, simple-minded, and external. It needs for its direction, as I have tried to show in these chapters, a new intellectual method which shall provide it with its own usable canons of judgment.

But for a description of this method and these canons, the reader waits in vain. With the reticence of a college student guarding the mysteries of his senior society, Mr. Lippmann leaves the matter in darkness, and moves sternly on.

So much for a few of the many objections raised against democracy in "Public Opinion" and in the first two parts of "The Phantom Public." But it is in Part III of the latter book that, exchanging the role of critic for that of judge, he dons his robe and wig and arraigns democracy in the dock:

A false ideal of democracy can lead only to disillusionment and to meddling tyranny. If democracy cannot direct affairs, then a philosophy which expects it to direct them will encourage the people to attempt the impossible; they will fail, but that will interfere outrageously with the productive liberties of the individual. The public must be put in its place, so that it may exercise its own powers, but no less and perhaps even more, so that each of us may live free of the trampling and the roar of a bewildered herd.

Whatever may be said of the foregoing as a confession of a social philosophy, it at least has the merit of candor. Had Mr. Lippmann written nothing else, this paragraph alone should go far toward making him immortal in the literature of politics. That some of Mr. Lippmann's objections to democracy are valid objections, no one will deny. The difficulty with his discussion, if it can be called a discussion, is not merely that he exaggerates and states unfairly the objections to democracy, but that he cites none of its advantages—and incidentally, none of the disadvantages inherent in other systems. And this an objective writer, dealing with a subject of importance, would hardly fail to do. That autocracy, fascism, plutocracy, and dictatorships of various descriptions have proved themselves shortsighted, ignorant, and uneducative, and, what is more, extremely selfish and cruel, is a truism which a fairer critic would cite by way of evening the account. To quote briefly from Henry Noel Brailsford, who summarizes the case for democracy far better than I can:

We do not desire the rule of the majority because we cherish any illusion about the intelligence or the virtues of the masses. Like average men in all classes, they are content to have their thinking done for them by their leaders and their newspapers. We do not count brains in a modern state; we count interests. The ballot is a rough method of deciding the greatest good of the greatest number. If the greatest number is muddle-headed in perceiving its greatest good, it must learn its lesson by hard experience.

DO NOT CUT. TEAR OFF REFACE
BOOKS OR MAGAZINES.

And yet, Mr. Lippmann, whose writings, stripped of their stylistic excellence, often reveal surprising immaturity, repeats again and again what is so obviously untrue, to wit, that democracy presupposes that men are equal in character, intelligence, and wisdom, and, in "Men of Destiny," denies that democracy permits what he calls "an order of values among men."

Incredible as it may seem, for all Mr. Lippmann's awareness of the disparity between the bewildered herd and the unbewildered few, his writings carry little evidence that he is even dimly aware of the part privilege plays in accentuating the disparities of American life. And in particular he takes no account of the fact that the failures of democracy have not been due to defects inherent in democracy, but to our having permitted vast concentrations of wealth and power in the hands of a small privileged class, which in itself would go far toward wrecking any form of government conceived by the mind of man. Indeed, in his writings on the failure of democracy, he emphasizes almost everything but the one salient condition that is responsible for its impaired functioning.

Strangely enough, though Mr. Lippmann still classes himself as a liberal in his promotional pamphlet, he has had few kind words to say for the men who are fighting the battles of liberalism in Congress, that is, with the exception of Senator Borah. And yet it has been the devoted and, I think, on the whole intelligent efforts of such men as the older and younger La Follette, Norris, Costigan, La Guardia, Wheeler, Wagner, Cutting, Walsh, and Couzens, and of other liberals outside the federal government, that have saved American politics from surrender to a materialism as gross as any the modern world has known.

As anyone versed in politics knows, the liberals, irrespective of their political and economic tenets, are simply men who are too innately decent to sit by complacently while big business makes the government its silent partner in exploiting the inhabitants of the country. It is true that the liberals have not been able to unite upon a constructive program. But this should not stultify them in the eyes of Mr. Lippmann, who repeatedly boasts that he has no program himself.

I have no legislative program to offer, no new institutions to propose. There are, I believe, immense confusions in the current theory of democracy which frustrate and pervert its action. I have attacked certain of the confusions with no conviction except that a false philosophy tends to stereotype thought against the lessons of experience. I do not know what the lessons will be when we have learned to think of public opinion as it is, and not of the fictitious power we have assumed it to be. It is enough if with Bentham we know that "the perplexity of ambiguous discourse . . . distracts and eludes the apprehension, stimulates and inflames the passions."

In this sad reflection upon the futility of his thinking which constitutes the final paragraph of "The Phantom Public," Mr. Lippmann garners the belated fruit of two reasonably fat volumes. Indeed, Mr. Lippmann keeps so far away from the formulation of a program that, if one were to try to find a principle other than the further massing of power in the hands of plutocracy, upon which he relies for social or political improvement, one would have to adopt the method of the astronomer who, by analyzing the rays from distant stars, establishes their physical composition.

For his attack on the democratic theory, some of Mr. Lippmann's admirers urge in extenuation that, his point of view being generally cynical, he should not be expected to make an exception by believing in democracy. This argument does not bear examination. For when he discusses the benefits which are to accrue from the cancelation of war debts, or from big business under its enlightened administrators, he speaks with the simple faith of a Tennessee fundamentalist bishop. In justice to Mr. Lippmann, however, it must be noted that lately, indeed very lately, his attitude toward democracy has undergone an alteration. I refer in particular to his address on May 20, 1933, to the Associated Harvard Clubs at Cleveland. By this time, democracy, considering the variety of his attacks upon it, should, by every rule of nature, be as dead as Julius Caesar. Nevertheless, the Democratic Party having lately won an overwhelming victory, and the White House, together with the executive and legislative branches of the government, being filled to the eaves with an unprecedented horde of Jeffersonians, Mr. Lippmann, as a matter of courtesy to the new incumbents, saves democracy at the very brink of the grave.

We have heard quite enough of late about the glorious achievements of tyrannical governments and how freedom is an illusion and democracy a failure. The last word has not yet been said on the subject.

Admittedly Mr. Lippmann has done good things, things which others may cite in some discussion purporting, as this one does not, to catalogue his virtues. At times, the New York World's editorial page glowed with something more than literary style and intellectuality. But the glow was shortlived, and since then the bulk of his writings have been reactionary. Always the impulse to write humanly of men and affairs is quenched by an inveterate disbelief in the people. I imagine that Euripides's words,

The simple nameless herd of humanity
Hath deeds and faith that are truth enough for me!

would, in Mr. Lippmann's philosophy, seem crass sentimentalism. Yet they are nothing else than the poetic expression of the fact, proved by experience, that on questions of simple justice or broad policy, it is safer to trust the opinion of a ditch digger than that of a college president.

Mr. Lippmann has, I think, done an immense amount of harm. He has confused the thinking of his readers. He has confirmed them in unconscious Bourbonism. He has written persuasively against democracy, and persuasively for plutocracy, which, however, he has not described. He has soothed his readers to sleep where the public good required vigilance. He has advocated the leadership of big business as a wise, disinterested leadership. He has proclaimed his faith in monopoly. He has joined with plutocracy in its hue and cry against Congress and Congressional inquiries and has shared its distrust of the people. He has helped to put his country in a false position in the eyes of Europe. He has bemoaned the fact that there is in the United States "a dying down of the old popular fervor in attacking corruption."

Yet he has supported Tammany for political reasons, and has had no word to say about the Insull debacle, in which the corruption of the utility companies culminated in an unprecedented disaster for the investing public. He has ignored the fact of privilege and diverted attention from the struggle between privilege and justice. He has told his readers what they want to be told, offering complacency instead of truth.

And it is regrettable. For Walter Lippmann, with his active mind, his great talent, his industry, and his brilliant style, might have been a rain that would have helped freshen the streams of American thought.

Hero Balbo

By GEORGE SELDES

ITALO BALBO, hero, aviator, member of the cabinet, original member of the quadrumvirate which "captured" Rome, and former political boss of Ferrara, has arrived with his squadron. In Montreal, Chicago, and New York, extraordinary precautions were taken to safeguard his life. In London, Brazil, and New York, shouts of "assassin" greeted him. Why?

Despite ten years of censorship in which the entire history of the violence and bloodshed which marked political disputes in Italy has been either erased or altered to read more sweetly, a few persons outside of Italy still remember Signor Balbo's record. In his early twenties, he joined Benito Mussolini in Milan and became associated with a little group of household friends who were pledged to carry out the future Duce's secret orders. Two other intimate friends and workers were Amerigo Dumini, born in St. Louis, the son of Augustus and Jessie Williams Dumini, and Cesare Rossi, an ex-Socialist. These two, tried for murder in 1926, were later imprisoned for blackmailing the Duce.

In 1922 Mussolini appointed Balbo with three others to lead the "March on Rome" while he himself waited in his barricaded office. In 1923 Mussolini rewarded Balbo by appointing him at the ripe age of twenty-five commander-in-chief of the militia. Balbo was also "Ras" or boss of the Province of Ferrara. It was in the village of Argenta in Balbo's own province that a Catholic priest, the Abbe Minzoni, organized a Catholic Boy Scouts and other Catholic clubs which opposed the bloodshed and terrorism of contending rival political parties. At this time Mussolini, who had not yet begun negotiations with the Vatican, still publicly declared himself an anti-clerical and atheist. The "squadristi" or racketeers were still instructed to fight the Catholic organizations. Balbo organized a squadristi punitive expedition which invaded Argenta and sacked the clubs. In the fighting Father Minzoni was killed. So indignant was all Italy that a trial was held in November, 1925, as a result of which Mussolini removed Balbo from power. One of the pieces of evidence I have seen, a letter dated August 31, 1923, and signed "Balbo," ordered the beating and deportation from the province of witnesses and political enemies who had been found not guilty in another affair.

But shortly after the murder of Father Minzoni by Balbo's squadron the demoted militia leader discovered a plot among the Fascisti to replace Mussolini with a mon-archist leader. Mussolini rewarded Balbo by naming him under-secretary of national economy. Eventually, Balbo became minister of aviation. In 1926, preparatory to visiting Bologna, the Duce had 2,000 persons arrested there "preventatively." Nevertheless, someone in the line of parade fired a shot. Just behind Mussolini rode the official nobility. Buonaccorsi, one of the nobility in the front rank, slit the throat of the would-be assassin, another stabbed him several times, and as the quivering body was hanged Italo Balbo fired two shots into it. Rarely has history recorded a lynching in which the leading members of a government participated. This case caused tremendous excitement in Bologna, where the masses looked on while the nobility and the law-givers delivered summary justice, but censorship suppressed almost all the facts for years.

A number of similar incidents of violence may be found in the secret history of this great hero. While millions cheer, a few remember.

In the Driftway

THE old ships pass. In the welter of other events several famous steamships have vanished from the transatlantic lanes in the present year almost without notice. Americans, of course, are brought up to look with indifference upon obsolescence—to regard it as a part of progress and therefore almost a blessing. The scrap pile is not a sacred burying ground in the churchyard but a showy mausoleum in the market place, which stands as a proof of our advancing civilization. But even Americans are not oblivious to the tragedy of age and discard when they overtake humanity or that almost human creation, a ship. So there will be those to feel a touch of melancholy at the thought that four such illustrious transatlantic liners as the Leviathan, the France, the Baltic, and the Adriatic should disappear from the scene all in the space of a few months.

* * * * *

PROBABLY the withdrawal from service of the Leviathan will not be greatly mourned. She is an American ship in name only, having been built in Germany and acquired by the United States as one of our spoils of war. She was gloriously useful in rushing over troops and getting them back again, but a commercial passenger carrier in subsequent years the Leviathan was a failure. The France stands in a different position. For a number of years the France was the fastest ship on the North Atlantic with the exception of the Mauretania. Like the latter, the France had four funnels, or smokestacks, which gave her an appearance of tremendous power when under way. She was the last four-funnel steamship built by the French Line and is one of the few survivors of that distinguished type to live through to our day. No recently built ship can quite match those four-stackers in the impression which they make on the eye as majestic floating machines. They are demoded today because the change from coal to oil fuel makes one funnel enough for practical purposes, although two or three smokestacks are usually installed for the sake of appearances and miscellaneous ventilation. It is worth recalling of this great ship that her name was simply France. She was never "La France." The French Line had had a long string of ships before her named La Provence, La Touraine, La Bretagne, and the like, but with a sentiment delightfully Gallic it was agreed that there could be but one "La France"—the fatherland.

* * * * *

THE disappearance of the Adriatic and the Baltic from the transatlantic lanes marks the end of a special type of passenger vessel and a kind of traffic that is now gone probably never to reappear. The Baltic was sold to Japanese buyers lately for scrap. The Adriatic is still in use for cruises out of England but presumably will not survive long. Both ships belonged to the celebrated group of broad-beamed, high carrying-capacity craft in which the White Star Line began to specialize early in the century when it definitely gave up the pursuit of speed in favor of comfort and large-scale accommodation. The Baltic had a speed of seventeen knots an hour. She was under 24,000 tons gross, no great size in this day, but she was built to carry 2,744 passengers and had three quarters of a million cubic feet of cargo space besides. The recently launched United States liner Washington, with virtually the same tonnage as the Baltic, has passenger accommodations for only about 1,200 persons, and the mammoth Normandie, now under construction in France, is designed to carry no more than 3,490 passengers, although she is three times as large as the old White Star steamship. In the Normandie, intended to be the world's fastest transatlantic liner, passenger accommodation has had to be sacrificed, of course, to make space for engines, boilers, and fuel. Also it is to be remembered that ships like the Baltic and Adriatic thrived on the once enormous immigrant traffic and gave more space to third-class passengers—packed exceedingly close—than do vessels nowadays. It is a reasonable guess that liners like the Baltic and Adriatic had accommodations for more passengers by comparison with their size than any ships before them ever had or any craft after them are likely to have.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Tax-Free Cities Again

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your number of July 12, George W. Greene makes reference to my article on Tax-Free Cities and says: "The thesis so well set forth by Louis Bartlett in his article on Tax-Free Cities is unsound, it seems to me, and will hamper the future growth of municipal ownership."

He mistakenly assumes that because I have shown how cities can be made tax-free by using their profits from the operation of public utilities I am urging that they should do so. A rereading of the article will convince him that I am not urging this as a municipal policy.

In Ontario under the Hydro Commission, where there is no practical difficulty in finding new capital for additions and betterments to existing systems, it is possible to apply all of the profits from operation to a reduction of power rates. In the United States this is politically infeasible as the power companies during the last thirty years have made it extremely difficult for cities to obtain the necessary new capital except from the profits of their systems, and it is necessary to divide the savings under municipal ownership into at least two parts, one devoted to reduction in rates and the second to new capital investments in the plant. "Tax-free cities" have devoted a large part of all of these savings to a reduction in the tax rate. How these savings should be applied is a matter of policy which I think cannot be decided a priori. Many cities now find a reduction in the tax rate or a subsidy to the unemployed from power profits to be a life saver.

San Francisco, July 14

LOUIS BARTLETT

Revised Election Figures

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I wish to call your attention to the election statistics used by Mr. Hays in his article, La Guardia for Mayor of New York. These figures evidently were taken from the 1932 annual report of the Board of Elections in the City of New York. They are not the revised figures issued some time later, which are as follows:

John P. O'Brien, Democrat	1,054,323
Lewis H. Pounds, Republican	443,520
Morris Hillquit, Socialist	251,656
Joseph V. McKee	264,836

This includes 22,937 variations of McKee's name. Of the unrecorded votes there are approximately 206,000.

New York, July 20

DAVE LAZAR

Housing Is a Social Problem

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Some time ago in a review of current development in pre-fabricated housing, by Douglas Haskell, reference was made to the Allied Construction Industries Standardized House Conference (of which the writer is chairman) with the statement that "their research attempts to save the contractor's form of enterprise. Our organization aims to go beyond, not to save, antiquated building procedure in the most urgent social construction problem now before the nation. Your reviewer must have been erroneously informed."

Practically all mass-production housing schemes have been the products of individual architects or manufacturers of special materials. This accounts in the first case for certain clever space arrangements but serious failure to achieve structural and mechanical simplicity and economy. In the second case the irrational bias is easily discernible for metal, or wood, or brick, or enamel, or cotton, or glass which are utilized without reference to their essential characteristics.

Designs result which fail to permit variation of appearance, fire resistance, structural unity, and economy. These metal or wood or cotton houses will be discarded when it is remembered that the safe shelter of human beings is the object. The metal houses cannot stand a simple cost analysis. Aesthetically there are violent objections to an appearance resembling that of filling station toilets rather than houses. Virtually all neglect the fundamental fact that housing is already a social, not an individual problem and that construction must be applicable to large communal buildings as well as small houses.

The Allied Construction Industries House Conference is unique in that it has, for the first time, assembled all related professions in its work, including architecture, structural engineering, mechanical engineering, standardization and production engineering, city planning, financing and cooperative and governmental social organization.

Without prejudice toward materials, utilizing their maximum possibilities by advanced structural design, providing extensive variation of appearance in form, texture, and color, requiring relatively simple fabricating apparatus, all economically controlled and adaptable for community development, results have been achieved which are not marked by the individual weaknesses here pointed out. Only through such a comprehensive organization can the problem be met.

Moscow, June 1

ZARA WITKIN

My Country 'Tis of Thee

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

America is the land of motion and emotion. By popular demand both must be cheap.

Baltimore, July 16

W. H. LOGUE, JR.

Inflated Books

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I wish to protest against a common habit of modern publishers. I refer to the practice of padding a very slight book (slight in total words, not necessarily in literary value) until the book appears large in size and, therefore, worth a considerable price. Several recent books have impressed me most unfavorably for that reason—for example, Katharine Anthony's "Marie Antoinette" and Hamilton Basso's "Beauregard."

But the worst example of physical inflation that I have seen is James Truslow Adams's biography of Henry Adams, a book which I intended to buy. I found a large, somewhat imposing volume, when viewed from the outside. Turning the leaves, I discovered also that the book had evidently been printed for the blind; the type was very large, the margins excessive, and the leaded spaces between the lines something to marvel at. Between two chapters were three pages that contained one line of print—not one line for each page, but one line in all. Evidently the publishers had decided that the text must run about 200 pages, and by clever manipulation they forced a short text to appear long.

It may be that such cleverness is in some degree responsible for the present plight of the publishers. This is no time to waste money, and most of us desire that 200 pages shall represent exactly that, and not the equivalent of 100 or 150 pages. I know that I, for one, shall not buy "Henry Adams," though I should like to own it; I refuse to pay $2.50 for a book that should sell at the most for $1.50. Any person who sees new books can name others that have been padded and over-priced in similar fashion.

I, for one, am tired of it. Personally, I prefer small books, if they are decently printed, for the housing of books, in this day, is no small problem in itself. When I do buy a large book, I want that book to justify its size and price in reading matter as well as in literary worth. This practice of padding books strikes me as similar to the business tactics that many of our clever bankers pursued until very recently. For the reader, such a practice rouses suspicion and restrains buying; for the publisher, it is not only questionable ethics, it is bad business.

EDD WINFIELD PARKS

Nashville, Tennessee, June 15

The article, The Random Satire of George S. Kaufman by Joseph Wood Krutch, announced for this issue, will appear next week.

What Is Happening to the Professions?

The depression has laid a heavy toll on professional workers. For many of them the outlook is desperate. How have they met the onslaught of hard times?

In the next issue The Nation will publish the first of a series of striking articles on the white collar worker and the depression. This one by Talbot Faulkner Hamlin deals with THE PLIGHT OF THE ARCHITECTS.

What has happened to the doctors, trained nurses, teachers in school and college, artists, clergymen, engineers and musicians will be set forth in subsequent articles.

Is the Home Loan Act a Fraud?

Also in next week's Nation Henry Goldey makes the startling assertion that:

"Debenture bonds of the Home Owners Loan Corporation are ineligible under State laws for investment by supervised financial institutions."

Therefore, "no relief under the bill can be expected by the vast majority of home owners of the country."

Professional workers will want to know what is happening in their own and other professions.

$ I The Nation for $ I thirteen weeks

THE NATION 20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK

For the enclosed $1 please send The Nation for 13 weeks to Name

Street

City

Annual Subscription - - $5.00
Canadian - - - - 5.50
Foreign - - - - 6.00

8-2-33

Books and Films

Before the Storm

By C. DAY LEWIS

Now, in the hour of exhaustion,
When laburnums loll like tongues unslaked,
When mouths of prophets are dry and arable is cracked,
As though for the answer to the crucial question
Earth seems to wait:
The crisis of her heart betrayed
In the redder flush of tulips, ■ luster on all things laid.
We see our fate
Through her clairvoyant eyes,
And, as in crystal, near and dear,
Landmarks, old loves, features almost forgotten, appear.
But the air stirs with ■ faint surmise,
A hope of ease,
A sick man's sigh for water; and we know
Coming, is coming now
The flash, the thunder, the release.

Here, in the streets of desperation,
No beauty gives color to their hour of need;
Burnt out as an engine driven too hard, that seized,
Are the nerves of this nation:
Faces like dead ash fallen in,
Hearts their fires drawn,
Earth-fast eyes, cheated too often by false dawn.
Yet here, here shall storm begin,
And if he strikes your landmark, these will never miss it.
Already are beating faintly his drums
Below their hearts' horizon. Be sure, when he comes,
It is no flying visit:
Lightning is on his lips, power in his veins
That all who are wired to receive shall share;
They shall rise to find the air
Cleared, sunny with ■ fresh eloquence, ■■ after rains.

A Confession of Faith

All Men Are Enemies. By Richard Aldington. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

MR. ALDINGTON calls his new book "a romance," and so it is in the sense that its core is ■ love story, frankly lyrical and unabashed. He would, however, be the last to deny that it is also a confession of faith, and I fancy that many readers are going to judge it largely according to the extent of their sympathy with that explicit faith.

This, so it seems, is the extrovert's decade. At the moment our typical heroes turn outward upon the world, not inward upon themselves, and their concern is with society, which must be made different from what it is before any personal happiness is possible. But in this one sense at least Mr. Aldington's hero is not typical. He is a product of his time and acutely aware of its problems; but he is, primarily, an individualist, and his story is the story of a successful effort to achieve a meaningful life in the midst of a world whose whole spirit is antagonistic to the aims he pursues and the values he cherishes.

The form of the book is the familiar life story of a young man, Antony Clarendon. Like one of Mr. Wells's heroes, he is born into the quiet English countryside, grows up under various intellectual influences, meets young Socialists and young worldlings, goes to war, and then emerges into a world where everything has been tested and most things destroyed. He differs from the Wellsian hero, however, in that the problems of society furnish only the background, not the substance, of his life. Faith in human institutions he has lost and, along with it, faith in most men as they now are. But the good things of life—love, peace, art, and beauty—are still good if only one can be wise enough or fortunate enough to find them, and the chief business of life is still to be sure that one does. The times are out of joint. The comfortable creed of the Tory is ■ fraud, and the equally comfortable faith of the utopian liberal who sees freedom slowly broadening down and "progress" automatically proceeding from triumph to triumph is no less ■ sham. But the danger is that those who revolt against that sham may forget what life is really for, that they may establish or try to establish an orderly and equitable world from which, nevertheless, the possibility of any rich or humanly valuable life has departed.

Accordingly, therefore, Antony rejects the efforts of a Communist acquaintance to bring him into the movement. He is even for a few days drawn unwillingly into the arms of "volunteer workers" organized to carry on during the period of the general strike, and drawn in just as he was into the great war—not because he believed in its aims but because there was no possible public attitude to which he could give ■ genuine allegiance. The revolutionists are as alien to him as the solid commercial citizens, for the simple reason that they are equally crass in their materialism, equally incapable of building ■ really good world because equally incapable of conceiving what such a good world would be. He is a lost soul in the midst of a lost society, but, unlike most of the others, he is still, he believes, at least a living one. He turns defiantly from the society he cannot save to that self which, perhaps, he can, and if a justification for that act is necessary he would find it by asserting that the individual can do nothing more useful than to keep alive the sense that the meaning of life lies in the experiences possible to it, and that, ultimately, it can be good only if the individual finds it so.

Mr. Aldington prefaces this quite long but swift, passionate, and eloquent novel with an "author's note," and with ■ sort of prologue in which the gods of Olympus discuss the fate of his hero. Neither is quite necessary, for one of the best things which can be said of the novel is just that its argument is kept so well in solution that it hardly needs any explicit statement. But the whole spirit of the thing is nevertheless tinged with what, if the word had not been so cheapened by misuse, one would like to call a pagan attitude, rather than either a Christian or a "modern" one. Mr. Aldington is no aesthete and no pessimist. Neither do his individualism and his introversion imply anything remotely resembling the exquisite but attenuated and finicky super-refinement of a Proust. Vigor, health, and a proper appreciation of the senses is the foundation of his philosophy and, for him, doing counts at least as much as contemplating can. The triumph of his hero comes when he is at last reunited with the woman from whom he has been separated, and love, rooted in the instincts of the flesh, is not merely a part but the symbol of life's meaning. But these are not the only things which suggest the pagan attitude, for even more fundamental is the whole assumption that success in life is something which must be wrung from a world whose tendency is against human happiness. We are always trying to conceive a society in which the good life would be universal and all but automatic. We resent, especially, the whole idea of a capricious fortune which gives opportunity to one man and denies it to another. But the Greeks took Fate for granted. They saw no reason why a man should utterly reject its favors just because they were favors, and, in a sense, Mr. Aldington makes his hero—who recognizes that his life, hard as it is, is nevertheless a favored life—take somewhat the same attitude.

I have no doubt, as I suggested before, that some readers will resent the whole implied philosophy of "All Men Are Enemies." I do not see, however, how any can deny the unusual interest of the narrative or the eloquent fervor with which it is written. Like his hero, Mr. Aldington may be a lost soul but he is still a living one.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Socrates of Plato

Socrates. By A. E. Taylor. D. Appleton and Company. $2.
The Socratic Problem. By Arthur Kenyon Rogers. Yale University Press. $2.

SOCRATES is at once a historical fact and a historical legend, the legend itself being possibly one of the most influential facts in the course of Western civilization. For Socrates awakened Plato, and Plato as well as Jesus and Paul went into the making of Christianity. For most cultivated general readers, the picture of Socrates is that given by Plato in the "Dialogues," and there is good enough reason, as these two authors substantially agree, for accepting the Platonic portrait in essence and in many details as a likeness at once striking and authoritative. The portrait is, of course, "idealized," that is to say, it was drawn by a disciple who was a genius and by a philosopher who was a poet. Whatever ancillary detail may be contributed by other contemporaries, there is general agreement among such scholars in Greek philosophy as Taylor and Burnet that the Platonic Socrates is probably nearest the Socrates who lived and breathed, and questioned poets, generals, and statesmen in Athens. It is certainly the Socrates who has become the symbol of philosophical rectitude, humorous integrity, and intellectual martyrdom. The Socrates who is one of the saints of the world's spiritual history is not the cautious moralist whom Xenophon insisted upon and apologized for, nor the amalgam of playboy physicist and psychical researcher (a mixture of Eddington and Oliver Lodge) whom Aristophanes ridicules, nor yet the scandal-touched figure of the gossiping Diogenes Laertius. It is the ugly and hypnotic friend of youth, the skeptic mystical and ironic, the affectionate and just Socrates of Plato's pages. The scholars, including Taylor, in the volume before us, and Burnet, and Rogers who here reservedly follows their lead, agree on this point. If one were seriously to follow their conclusions, then, one ought to turn from the scholars themselves and read Plato himself in order to know Socrates de tout près.

None the less Professor A. E. Taylor, doubtless the dean of Platonic scholars, has written a useful little book. It will help to make clear to the unprofessional reader just what canons of credibility and insight are to be attached to the three chief sources, Xenophon, Plato, and Aristophanes. Relying chiefly on the "Dialogues," very skilfully but with corrective and amplifying material from cognate writers, it gives the main features of the "life of Socrates." It indicates the necessity for revision of certain notions widespread even among the supposedly well informed. Thus it is made clear that, despite the Alexandrian tradition that Socrates was a stonemason, there is very little evidence for the legend. Though it is intimated, and in no less a place than the "Theaetetus," that Socrates's mother was a midwife, she was not professionally such. Socrates came of a "good" family socially and economically. He was not a "proletarian"; until the reverses he suffered in the general crisis after a disastrous war, he was a man of income. Again, though it is common to repeat that Socrates brought philosophy from heaven to earth, Professor Taylor makes it quite clear that he was versed in the science of his time, and, despite his predominant moral interest, for a considerable time much concerned with it. The book reminds us of the almost strictly political significance of the trial. Space does not permit Professor Taylor's evidence to be cited here; his conclusions are arresting:

Socrates was feared by certain prominent politicians as the supposed instigator of Alcibiades and Critias, and these politicians desired to get him out of Athens. But there was no wish to take his life, and he can never have been the mark of general hostility. Nearly 45 per cent of his judges were for acquitting him. . . . Socrates owes his immortality of fame to the martyr of philosophy not to any melodramatic outburst of popular sentiment on the part of an emotional democracy, but to the Providence which gave him as a younger friend and follower—Plato.

"The Socratic Problem" for Professor Rogers is, briefly: Which, in Plato, is Socrates and which is Plato? With his perhaps unduly schematized treatment of Socrates the Moral-ist, Socrates the Mystic, and Socrates the Scientist few readers will quarrel. One has only to read Plato to see that his hero was all three. But the thesis Mr. Rogers maintains seems to this reader, for all the careful (and dull) argument invoked to sustain it, unconvincing. "It has been my purpose," writes Mr. Rogers after one hundred and sixty-two pages, "to show that only by rendering to Plato the things that are Plato's and to Socrates the things that are Socrates's are we likely to get a consistent picture of either Plato, the scientist and metaphysician, or Socrates, the moralist and mystic." Despite all the detailed discussion, in the course of which the author seems to have forgotten Plato and Socrates in favor of their commentators, the book seems to me signally to fail to maintain the thesis whose proof was its raison d'être. It is too long a matter to argue here, and argument seems scarcely to the purpose. If the author of the "Symposium" and the "Phaedrus" was not something of a mystic, and the author of the "Republic" and "Philebus" not a moralist, then Plato must have had a ghost writer, and Bacon must have written Shakespeare. If the "Dialogues" of Plato are the best source for the life of Socrates, they are certainly the best source for the mind and spirit of Plato.

IRWIN EDMAN

Pastoral Fable, New Style

Stranger's Return. By Phil Stong. Harcourt, Brace and Company $2.

WHEN "Turn to the Right" was touring Chautauqua boards, the idyl celebrating the well-known salubrity of rural life ticked itself off in scenes wherein immoral and life-weary New Yorkers rediscovered purity under sun-bonnets and wholesome love in gingham frocks; a gray-haired mother revived the ancient verities; gin fumes were washed away in air perfumed by climbing roses and browsing cows; the culture of chickens carried with it a life-giving elixir; and in return for these benefits, the grateful metropolitans did not fail to take care of the mortgage crisis when it came.

Phil Stong has varied the fable somewhat, to meet modern tastes. The rural salubrity is all there: Louise, the penitent New Yorker, watches the cider-pressing and "is enormously content," serves the threshing crew and feels "that she belonged to this robust and hearty life"; but in the new version, the sweet and Puritan virtues are not stressed. In fact, Stong's Iowa is pictured as combining all the wholesomeness of the farmyard with the amoral and even cultural possibilities of the penthouse. The hired man plays the role of a willing and lusty satyr; liaisons flourish in hay mow and oak grove. Corn whiskey and aged cider flow. A neighboring young farmer-hero, sculpted in lines of blonde liveness, writes scholarly monographs on agricultural science, quotes Whitman, and discusses Forbes-Robertson and Leiber's Hamlet. Grandpa Storr remarks nonchalantly on a "fine old-fashioned hangover," and announces his untrammelled philosophy in the assertion that people should "have the God-damned kindness to attend to their own lives" while he attends to his. Repartee at the threshing table and over a boundary fence is represented as having a subtlety superior to conversation in MacDougal Street.

But outside the new freedom and sophistication, Stong's rural fable does not differ much from "Turn to the Right." In a plot which creaks and groans, the New York girl with her shady past makes good according to rustic criterions; true love culminates; the farm is saved from scheming parasites; and the redoubtable Grandpa Storr, aged eighty-five, after being pictured sitting his saddle lithe as a young man, holding his own with the threshing crew, and consuming plates full of rich food at every meal, passes away overnight, happy in the knowledge that Storhaven will descend to the right hands.

Stong is not always happy in his details of Iowa life and idiom. "Damn your eyes!" is not very usual as an expletive from an Iowa patriarch, and the hired man has hardly yet picked up the wise-crack, "You old so-and-so." But such criticisms are not particularly relevant to a fiction for whose setting a bit of cardboard rural scenery labeled New Jersey, Maine, or Oregon would do equally well.

FERNER NUHN

Progress: the Bathtub Theory

A Century of Progress. Edited by Charles A. Beard. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THIS symposium, like the Chicago fair, only in less portentous form, is a composite of curious detail, ambitious design, and fake splendor. It constitutes little more than a flatulent paean of praise to American achievement, past, present and future. But the voices of the authors are too high-pitched to convince or inspire. Most of them suffer from the bathtub complex, an all too familiar American affliction, which makes them view progress as a sanitary instead of a spiritual reality. No doubt the America which moved about on foot and on horseback a century ago was a less progressive country than the one which today whirls about in motor cars and airplanes. The more important question, however, is who has reaped the benefits from that progress, and to what degree. To that question the present symposium contributes nothing but a parade of empty words about "the spirit of humanity which is building institutions of welfare and providing security for worthy dependency" and a declaration that "for the single goal of private greed is being substituted a social objective—mass production for the people under favorable conditions of labor, a wide distribution of wealth through increased wages, the general diffusion of the benefits of civilization with a view to its stability." What does such rhetoric mean to the millions of men who cannot get work in America today? Why, in a volume of this kind, in which there are chapters on Labor, Industry, and Agriculture, is there no mention of those millions at a time when their suffering is crucial? Is it, perhaps, because "the century of progress" was not really interested in them at all, but in the progress of machines at the expense of men?

"A Century of Progress" is composed of fifteen essays, two of which are written by the editor, Charles A. Beard. At least half of them are pathetically feeble. Henry Ford's essay on Industry (written in collaboration with Samuel Crowther) is typical. When it is not an elaboration of the obvious, it is a contribution to the absurd. "Industry now exists," states Mr. Ford through his ventriloquist, Mr. Crowther, "as a large public service and not as a private perquisite," and then adds that part of our great progress has come from "the knowledge we are gaining of how to use everything in the public interest while preserving the full advantage of individual initiative." (Italics mine.) Frank O. Lowden's article on Agriculture is a rehash of old stuff without even the semblance of a new conclusion. William Green's essay on Labor is a combination of bad history and weak-kneed apologetics which illustrates just why the American Federation of Labor has developed into a "safe and sane" company union. Grace Abbott, Charles H. Judd, Fiske Kimball, John Erskine, and Jane Addams succeed, as if by special strategy, in saying not a single thing that is new, important, or challenging in their respective essays on Women, Education, the Arts, Literature, and The Process of Social Transformation. The only essays of any value in the symposium are Waldemar Kaempffert's on Invention as a Social Manifestation, which is by far the best contribution to the book, Fielding H. Garrison's on Medicine, and Charles Beard's on Government and Law.

V. F. CALVERTON

Too Much of a Good Thing

Pull Devil, Pull Baker. By Stella Benson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

IT is one of the difficulties of this book, whether in praising or criticizing it, that its humor and effects rely chiefly on elaborate misspellings and mutilations of the English language which have to be seen to be understood. It is supposed to be a series of stories related in China to Miss Benson by an old humbug and adventurer, Count Nicolas de Toulouse Lautrec de Savine. The count writes and speaks a quaint English, of which this is a fair sample: "The most ones of our officers had sweethearts, but I was to yang and to inconstant to bound me with a gerl; prefair to flay from one to a other, as butterflay who flay from one flower to a other one." "Hyg," "sansation," "thogth," "smole and fin," "fecheneble," and "yahrs" are also favorites of his. When one reads a single chapter, the device is amusing; one does get a vivid, lifelike impression of a certain type of Russian English. But there is a large volume of it, and the effect becomes deadening.

Added to that drawback is the fact that the stories all harp on one string, the count's adventures with beautiful "gerls," "noty gerls," and the most fashionable society in every part of the world. Again, as in the device of the spelling, one's first impression is that Miss Benson has given an entertaining picture of a typical Russian fortune-hunter, gambler, and adventurer of the old regime. The stories of debts, usurers, drinking, hunting, love-making recur, however, so fatally, that it is hard to sustain one's interest beyond a chapter or two. Scattered in various periodicals, as they originally were, they concealed a defect which their collection between book covers only serves to emphasize.

There will, I suppose, always be differences of opinion as to the effectiveness in a lengthy work of freakish spelling and grammar, of excessive use of dialect. As one who has always admired Miss Benson's work, I find myself, in this instance, disagreeing with a number of her reviewers in this country. It may be a radical defect in my early education which always prevented me from enjoying Mr. Dooley or any of the earlier comic characters which had such an enormous vogue with the American public. A literary device, especially when humorous, has always seemed to me appropriate only to short, occasional pieces. It not only loses its effect by repetition, when serially employed, but can become a perfect bore when used throughout the length of an entire book. People who do not feel that way about it will undoubtedly like Miss Benson's effort. Her count, whether real or imaginary, should serve as a diversion and a warning to American heiresses, who have been known to be captivated by types no more authentic of Russian noblesse.

ERNEST BOYD

The Generation That Made the War

Beginning the Twentieth Century. By Joseph Ward Swain. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.75.

PROFESSOR SWAIN, we are told, spent ten years in preparing this "history of the generation that made the war." He has turned out a thorough, workmanlike job, one of the best of the many conventional studies of pre-war diplomacy and politics. It reveals an amazing amount of diligent and conscientious effort. It is painstakingly impartial, but its impartiality is never labored or obtrusive. In reading the book one does not feel, as is so often the case with the somewhat similar works of Gooch, Fay, Barnes, Schmitt, and other scholars, that the author is playing the role of special advocate. He comments, explains, and interprets, but rarely argues. Nor does Professor Swain place too much emphasis on the war-guilt question, though his work is essentially a study of that question. He seems to realize that the war-guilt controversy is today without practical importance except in so far as it enables students to measure and understand the significance of the present diplomatic struggle in Europe. Moreover, in the view of Professor Swain no single diplomat or set of diplomats was responsible for the war. A whole generation of men was guilty:

Inheritors of a great tradition, these men accomplished much that was fine and that will remain a possession forever. They realized the dreams of 1848 with greater splendor than the dreamers had dreamed of, and they did much besides. Perhaps their glory will grow with the passage of time. But for those of us who belong to the next generation this glory is always darkened by the tragedy which finally overwhelmed them. In the end they debauched everything that they had. They turned their boasted science to finding new methods of butchery. They used their marvelous economic system to maintain hosts for slaughter. They prostituted their noblest ideals as war propaganda. They made their sons cannon fodder. In the eyes of those of their children who escaped from this holocaust they must ever remain a generation which spoke eloquently and much of liberty and humanity and science and progress, and which drove millions of young men to their death in the most gigantic folly of all history.

Excellent as this work is from the technical point of view, it has a number of faults. The author has a strong dislike for the Marxian theory of economic determinism (though he does not openly say so), and apparently cannot even stomach such modern history-writing as that of Charles A. Beard. He labors under the absurd notion that men alone make history. This leads him into strange errors. It traps him when he seeks to reduce the activities of international bankers to a formula based on personal motives, and again when he attempts to define economie imperialism. On Page 66, for example, he asserts that the Welt-politik of pre-war Germany was adopted "because it was a sign of greatness." He declares that the German expansionists had to "invent" economic arguments for colonialism. But on Page 78 he confesses that Germany was under great pressure to find new markets: "Because of the sluggish state of the German markets, manufacturers were forced to 'dump' large quantities of goods abroad, especially in Russia, selling their products at little or no profit in whatever markets they could find." Again, one gathers the impression through the first part of Chapter VII that the Balkan question and especially the controversy between Austria and Serbia consisted mainly in a conflict of personalities. Then suddenly on Page 154 one learns that the greed of the Magyar landlords, the Serbian pig trade, and other economic factors played a large part in the Balkan quarrels. For instance:

The ensuing tariff war between the two countries [1906] was so severe that for several years almost nothing was imported into Austria from Serbia. Since pork was the chief Serbian export, this quarrel was called the "pig war." Serbia having no access to the sea, other markets were difficult to find, and Austria's action was a disaster for the farmers who made up most of the population of Serbia. The popular outcry against Austria was great.

Despite this and much similar evidence that the author himself presents, he feels it necessary to speak slightly of "newspaper hacks or ponderous professors" who, after the war, "endeavored to rewrite all history in terms of a struggle for economic advantage—which was a popular sport during those chaotic days." Professor Swain's inadequate understanding of economic imperialism and economic determinism has also led him to miss completely the import of the Russian revolution. His chapter on this subject is by far the weakest in the book. He has performed a worthy task in summing up clearly and intelligently the diplomatic history of the pre-war period. If he had taken as much pains with the economic aspects of that period, he might have produced an enduring masterpiece.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Mildly French

Madame Maillart. By Claude Aveline. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.35.

ANNOUNCED as "the story of a strange human drama of the day and night life of a great hospital," this turns out to be merely another of those innumerable fluttery novels of young love shadowed by a femme fatale of sinister maturity that have cluttered French bookstalls for more decades than anyone cares to remember. The woman who gives her name to the novel is the thirty-nine-year-old wife of a diplomat implicated in an international financial scandal. Mme. Maillart is lonely and neurotic, hungry for a lover and frantic at the realization that she is no longer young. When the nineteen-year-old Philippe, whom the author tries to make engagingly naive and sparkling but who succeeds in being merely callow, comes to the hospital, Mme. Maillart lays a snare for him and tries to seduce him. But he, all unaware of her passion, becomes instead by degrees enamored of her protégée, Madeleine de Charmes, a spineless and colorless jeune fille. Most of the novel is given over to the intolerable account of this calf-love, which meanders through endless chaste encounters, touchings of garments and hands, sighs, sleepless nights, exchanges of notes, sled-rides in moonlight, stratagems to circumvent the vigilance of nurses, and so on ad nauseam. A few episodes have a touch of reality and occasional observations have sharpness. But as a whole the book is full of missed opportunities—for the material is there. No depths are touched. One page of Colette's "Chéri" contains more perception and pathos and beauty in the evocation of a woman's autumn than this whole novel.

HAAKON M. CHEVALIER

Shorter Notices

History of Germany. By Hermann Pinnow. Translated from the German by Mabel Brailsford. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

A good short history of Germany would be valuable at this time. It is a pity to have a report that we cannot find it in this volume. Dr. Pinnow is only half-convinced of, or perhaps has only half mastered the materialistic interpretation of history. His treatment is a quite hopeless confusion of economics, mystical nationalism, and sentimental optimism.

The Geography of Strabo. Vol. VIII. Translated by H. L. Jones. Pausanias: Description of Greece. Vol. III. Translated by W. H. S. Jones. Cicero: De Natura Deorum; Academica. Translated by H. Rackham. Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50 per volume.

Of these new volumes in the Loeb Classical Library, the first brings Strabo to his conclusion with a most valuable index of three hundred pages; the second is a rendering of Books VI to VIII of Pausanias; and the third continues with Cicero's philosophical works, the two dialogues here given being translated by the same able hand which did the "De Finibus."

The Rash Act. By Ford Madox Ford. Ray Long and Richard Smith. $2.50.

A study in exchanged identities, "The Rash Act" recalls Pirandello in theme and Norman Douglas in its mood and locale. In the fantastic Nepenthe-land of southern France, two veterans of the war, an Englishman and an American, set out to commit suicide. Though love and money are the precipitating causes, they are actually motivated by a deeply rooted neurosis—a sense of weariness with this world and nostalgia for a better way of living. In spite of the seriousness of his theme, Mr. Ford's handling of it is sophisticated rather than profound, and consists of a clever manipulation of the externalities of the contemporary scene. His characters do not emerge as autonomous, three-dimensional figures, nor do they involve us emotionally in their psychic impasse. But in the series of flashbacks that precede their attempts at suicide Mr. Ford gives us sufficient documentation of their lives, and enough evidence of the times, to convince us—intellectually, at least—that we are witnessing a typical modern instance.

Films Panorama

IT is natural enough that the success of "Cavalcade" should inspire various Hollywood producers to attempt similar chronicles of American life and history during the same period. Certainly the larger historical developments have been as exciting here as in England, the drama of change, in manners, morals, and public taste, at least as rich and full of contrasts. The only question is whether such full scale attempts as the screen version of Frederick Allen Lewis's "Only Yesterday," for example, will be able to achieve quite the same effectiveness of theme and pattern. Behind the rapid movement of national events and individual circumstance in "Cavalcade," always present or at least suggested, was something fixed and immutable, a way of living and thinking to which was attached the authority and accumulated sentiment of ages—something that might be called the English spirit or, more simply, England. It was on the contrast between what was and what has happened that the emotion depended from beginning to end. Without this continuous reference to the past, the changes it recorded would have been without meaning or power to affect us. The emotion may have been reducible to a kind of sentimental nostalgia, the substance of the closing lines to a pretty futile rhetoric. But without the strong notion of tradition at its base there would have been neither emotion nor meaning, in other words, nothing to justify, artistically or otherwise, its excavations out of the recent past. Now it is a commonplace that in America we have so many traditions that it sometimes seems as if we have none at all. It is also safe to say that in general the American public is pretty apathetic to the appeals of tradition, so much so that probably our strongest tradition has always been a turning from the realized past to the less definite and usually more comforting appeals of the unrealized future. If one did not abuse the word too much, one might say that our only nostalgia has been for the future. And nostalgia for the future is, for dramatic purposes at least, a weaker emotion even than nostalgia for the past. It is for this reason that one has such grave misgivings about the American "Cavalcades" on the way, many of which have already been confirmed by the current "This Is America" (Rivoli), which is of course not to be judged in the same way as a work of art, since it consists of a compilation of newsreels rather than a preconceived arrangement of its subject. Its subject is the zigzag course of American social and economic development since 1917 as recorded by the newsreel camera from week to week during the period. Many of its scenes—those of Woodrow Wilson's last tour, the Lindbergh parade, Calvin Coolidge in Indian feathers—we remember having seen before and are glad to see again. It is also interesting to trace the bizarre logic of time in the manner that certain of them are related—the Lindbergh parade followed by the kidnapping of his child, and so on. In such a film much depends on the cutting, and for the first two-thirds it must be admitted that events pass before our eyes with the break-neck speed that such recent material requires, and that the transitions are sharp and pictorially well managed. Not until the last portion does the montage, like everything else, begin to suffer from the absence of anything like a consistent point of view or reference. At the end we are unsure what the picture has been aiming at or for; the speaker who explains and comments throughout has been "pulling his punches" as if for some great final blow or message, but all that we are left with is the reiterated assurance that this is America, with perhaps an insinuation of fascist liberalism which

Roget's International THESAURUS "Words grouped by Ideas"

Complete list of synonyms, antonyms, phrases, slang, etc., in fact everything to help find the right word. The one indispensable book for all writers. A necessary complement of the dictionary.

Now $3 Copy

from CROWELL'S

THOMAS Y. CROWELL CO.
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

may be taken or not as one wishes. Here again we are to forget the past in favor of a future in which a bright new light will shine over the White House. Hopefulness is substituted for nostalgia.

"The Strange Case of Tom Mooney" is also a collection of newsreels, still photographs, and documents. It is somewhat shorter than it should be for its purpose, which is to persuade the American public of the injustice surrounding Mooney's seventeen-year imprisonment. Unfortunately not very many pictures of the trial seem to have been available, and the warehouse shots of the Preparedness Day parade in San Francisco, the photographs of the judges and witnesses, communicate too little of the special drama involved in the case. Much the most moving thing in the film is Mooney's own direct address to the public, delivered from prison and with such obvious sincerity of tone and expression that it should be more effective than anything else with that section of the public which still doubts his innocence.

Although "Pilgrimage" (Gaiety) has opened to louder critical praise than any picture in months, it is hard to regard it as anything more important than a rather synthetic box-office attraction compounded of war, motherhood, and local color. Not only does it seem like a résumé of all the mother pictures from "Over the Hill" to "The Silver Cord," but it borrows heavily from "Sun Up" and "Tol'able David." It is true that the long prologue, dealing with the stern Arkansas farm woman who refuses to accept her son's fiancée or even his child after he is killed in France, has enough honesty in the acting and directing to set up hopes of something much better than what follows. The director, John Ford, has learned something about the use of light from the Russians, and appropriates the René Clair device of musically accompanied dialogue to advantage in several places. But the moment the main idea emerges, the acting, direction, and photography suffer alike from the rambling scenario. Hannah Jessop goes to Paris with the Gold Star mothers, has adventures on a bridge over the Seine, and ends up by begging her dead son's forgiveness over his grave on the battlefield. Some of the comedy and much of the pathos of the Gold Star expedition are brought out, but when one considers the possibilities of the subject one cannot but regret the obvious manner in which it is handled. Even Lucille LaVerne's lusty repetition of her pipe-smoking act from "Sun Up" does not save this part of the picture. Before it is over, Henrietta Crosman's superbly austere mountain woman becomes a doddering, melodramatic old sentimental whom one is glad to see the last of. What is most regrettable about "Pilgrimage" is the waste of so much good material and competent talent through a stupidly developed scenario.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HARRISON BROWN is a British journalist who recently left Germany after four years' residence there.

STETSON CLARK is a New York newspaperman.

AMOS PINCHOT is a New York lawyer and publicist.

GEORGE SELDES is the author of "The Truth Behind the News," "Can These Things Be!" and "World Panorama 1918-1933."

C. DAY LEWIS, an English poet, is the author of "The Magnetic Mountain."

IRWIN EDMAN, associate professor of philosophy at Columbia University, is the author of "The Contemporary and His Soul."

FERNER NUHN lives in Iowa and writes for various magazines.

V. F. CALVERTON, editor of the Modern Monthly, is the author of "The Liberation of American Literature."

ERNEST BOYD is an editor of the American Spectator.

HAakon M. CHEVALIER is the author of "The Ironic Temper: Anatole France and His Time."

RESORTS

SEA GATE—Accommodations available for several guests in quiet, refined boarding home. Home cooking, special dietetic attention to children. Private boat runs to Battery daily. Moderate rates. Mrs. Blum, 4120 Manhattan Ave. ESplanade 2-9612.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HIL-BERT HOUSE

Lake Mahopac New York
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 953

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG

A delightful hide-away in the mountains inviting people of better taste. Wholesome food, delightful companionship, all outdoor sports. Reduced rates. Woodbourne, N. Y. Tel. Fallsburg 186-J

CO-OPERATIVE RECREATIONAL RETREAT:
COLONIAL FARMHOUSE: BEAUTIFUL
HILL COUNTRY: CULTURAL PROGRAM:
GOOD COMPANIONS, FELLOWSHIP
CENTRE, MT. KISCO: PHONE 6081.

CAMP TOPSTONE

Reopening July 28, 1933, A.F.

(After Fire)

Special rates for opening week only
$3.50 per day $21.50 per week

R.R. Fare week end $2.70 round trip

Dietary laws observed.

SHAPIRO BROS.

BRANCHVILLE, CONN.

City phone: DRY. 4-5900

LANGUAGES

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Ave. HARlem 7-8446.

POSITIONS WANTED

GRADUATE of leading Eastern universities, B.A., LL.B. (member New York Bar), M.A. (in English), completing work for Ph.D., desires position with salary. Agreeable personality. Best references. Box 201, c/o The Nation.

EXPERT STENOGRAPHER, male, 30, ten years experience. Five in N. Y. C. covering commercial, publishing and amenuensis work, available October; in New York September 18-24. Box 203, c/o The Nation.

WOMAN, M.A., teacher, translator, research assistant, wants suitable employment exchange maintenance; N. Y. or vicinity. Box 204, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

TIRED OF BUNK AND HOOEY?

Then try a membership with CONTACTS, only correspondence club for the mentally marooned, which connects you with original thinkers the world over. Unusual books loaned. Send 3c stamp. CONTACTS, Box 91, Station D., N.Y.C.

ARTIST'S wife will take child, preferably boy, age 5-7, physically and mentally normal to board. Mother's care; careful diet. Simple country life on California coast; good beach. Two small girls in family. References exchanged. Box 202, c/o The Nation.

REAL ESTATE

APARTMENT TO SHARE

YOUNG WOMAN TO SHARE COMPLETELY FURNISHED 3 ROOM STUDIO APARTMENT. 2 PRIVATE ENTRANCES. FREE GAS AND ELECTRICITY. $27 MONTHLY. MISS BROWN, 240 E. 22nd STREET. CALL STUYVESANT 9-4861, 6:30 P. M.

APARTMENT TO SUBLET

AUG. OR SEPT. OR BOTH. Two rooms, kitchen, and bath. Completely furnished. $50 a month. Apt. 1-E, 61 W. 10th St.

RESULTS!

"I believe you would like to know that through a classified advertisement in THE NATION I rented my furnished apartment for the summer to most reliable people.

It is a great satisfaction to use a medium which eliminates a large class of undesirables and focuses the attention of the NATION-reader type." An Advertiser.

Minimum 3 lines, $1.86

Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents

THE NATION

20 VESEY ST.

CORtlandt 7-3330

□ RESORTS □ RESORTS □ RESORTS □

FOREST AND STREAM CLUB

An Ideal Adult Camp with Ideals
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.

Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.

RATES REDUCED TO $25 PER WEEK AND UP
Eleven Years of Highly Satisfactory Service

55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. Penn. 6-7964

SPEND YOUR VACATION

Where you get the best rates:—August $18 to $25
All Indoor and Outdoor Sports. Excellent Food. Write for Booklet.

TROUT LAKE CAMP

At Trout Lake in the Heart of the Adirondacks
LAKE GEORGE, N. Y. Tel. Bolton 96
N. Y. Office—11 W. 42 St., Tel. Penn. 6-6625-6477

Gay, Carefree Vacation Days

... at KENT, CONN.

In an earthly paradise, this charming adult camp offers every facility for a vacation which will be a joy to remember. You'll love those sport tournaments ... you'll roar at the entertainment ... you'll take delight in the cuisine ... and you'll enjoy the friendly informality.

REDUCED WEEKLY
RATES $25.00

Special R. R. Rates—N.Y., N.H. & H.
Write for Descriptive Booklet and Road Map

"MICKY" MICHAELS, Mgr.

CAMP MILFORD
1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C. PENNSYLVANIA 6-7842

Walden formerly SCOPUS
The GLORIOUS VACATIONLAND
in the Adirondacks
for your August vacation

an Adult Camp of Distinction, on beautiful Trout Lake ... every sport and social activity
... unexcelled accommodations and cuisine
... Special, low August rates. Write for illustrated booklet.

Camp Walden
P. O. LAKE GEORGE, NEW YORK
New York City Office:
11 WEST 42nd ST.
Penn 6-8569

Come to COIPA KIE
"THE ISLAND PARADISE"
CRARYVILLE, N. Y.

For Every Vacation Joy

GOLF—our own sporty 18 hole course ... tennis, handball, swimming, canoeing, fishing, riding ... every other sport ... comfortable bungalow accommodations ... every room with bath. A beautiful lake ... splendid cuisine ... unusual entertainment ... and the sort of guests you'll want as friends.

ATTRACTIVE REDUCED R.R.
RATES FARE

Booklet & Road Map on Request
N. Y. Office: 116 NASSAU ST.
BEekman 3-9620

3 hours from Grand Central

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp
for Adults

The Rare Charm
Of An Intimate
Congenial Group

Reduced Rate $27.50
Superior Cuisine
Golf

Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
Penn. 6-7663

TIMBERLAND in The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren Co.
ESTHER R. KESSLER, Dir.

Uncas Lodge

Nestling in the hills where the Indian Chief Uncas ruled over his ancient tribes ...
landmarks, virgin forests, private twin lakes ... all modern sports facilities ...
socials, comradeship ... an ideal retreat from daily cares.

Uncas Lodge

$20—1 week
$36—2 weeks

N. Y. Phone:
PResident 3-9824
Uncasville, Conn.

MOON HILL
On Schroon Lakes The Adirondacks

Low rates for July and August
Tennis, boating, swimming, golf, hand ball
Complete social staff
Dietary laws strictly observed

SARAH SOLOMON, Ownership-Management
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y. Office: 11 W. 42nd St. PE 6-1720

NORTHWOOD'S LODGE INN
1,400 acre private estate, 2 lakes, near Lake George, 20 rooms, 8 baths, electricity. Hunting, fishing, golf nearby. Rates $20 to $28 weekly. Open all year
"First Cousin to a Dude Ranch!"
FREE SADDIE HORSES
EARL WOODWARD, Luzerne, N. Y.

THE GROUP Has extended its social activities for
the summer to

of 150 W. 85 St. TIMBERLAND

For Information
and Booklet In The Adirondacks

Address: Timberland, 33 West 42 St., N. Y. C.
Telephone: PENnsylvania 6-7663

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake Splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Contract lessons free. Guests met at Lake George. $18.00 and $20.00. R. J. Venton.

CAMP ANNASQUAM

Charming UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn. on Lake
Housatonic. 70 miles from New York.
Beautiful surroundings. Tennis, boating, bathing, fishing. Excellent meals. Rates $3.50 per day.
$18. week. Derby 639-2. R.R. Station Derby.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB

A631

811-311

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 9, 1933

No. 3553

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	141
EDITORIALS:
Labor Gets the Leavings	144
Our Lawless Judges	145
How the Movies Educate	145
Still Starving	146
ISSUES AND MEN. SHALL THE REAL LIBERALS COALESCE? By Oswald Garrison Villard	147
THE HOME-LOAN ACT—A FRAUD? By Henry Goldey	148
THE ARCHITECT AND THE DEPRESSION. By Talbot Faulkner Hamlin	152
RUSSIA'S LAST HARD YEAR. By Louis Fischer	154
THE RANDOM SATIRE OF GEORGE S. KAUFMAN. By Joseph Wood Krutch	156
REFUGEES FROM OPPRESSION. By Rosika Schwimmer	158
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	159
FINANCE: TAKING THE ROCK ISLAND INVESTORS FOR A RIDE. By Peter Helmoop Noyes	160
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	161
BOOKS:
Prelude. By Conrad Aiken	162
On American Literature. By Joseph Wood Krutch	162
War-Mad World. By Oswald Garrison Villard	162
Brother to Dr. Munthe. By Horace Gregory	163
Joseph Chamberlain. By S. K. Ratcliffe	163
Love Life of a Revolutionist. By Isidor Schneider	164
Mr. O'Flaherty's Development. By William Troy	165
America's Forced Labor. By Abram L. Harris	165
The Philosophy of Henry George. By Broadus Mitchell	166
Shorter Notices	167

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

BUTTRESSED by a wealth of facts supplied by her department and by her own observations in the mills, Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, challenged the steel code at its first hearing. She attacked the forty-hour and the seven-day week; she asked for a higher wage scale with two instead of twenty-one wage zones; she asked for the calculation of wages on a weekly basis, and for wages for Negroes high enough to enable them to raise their standard of living; she demanded the abolition of labor spies; she urged the building up of employment reserves out of income and a complete abolition of child labor in place of the unenforceable promise not "knowingly" to employ children; she asked for the inclusion in the code of white-collar workers. She said nothing about unions, presumably because just prior to her address the Board of Directors of the Steel Institute had on General Johnson's advice withdrawn the company-union provisions in the original code. Having made these specific and penetrating criticisms, she summed up their objective as "a new and lasting prosperity," based on friendly relations between government, management, and labor, achieved through "even production, steady wages, and steady purchasing power." The spectacle of the first woman Cabinet member quietly launching this verbal thunderbolt at the very citadel of our industrial empire leads one to hope that Donald Richberg may be right in his assertion that a "revolution . . . not of violence . . . but of the pen and voice" has begun.

A STRUGGLE for control of the Treasury is going on behind the scenes in Washington. Ordinarily the Secretary of the Treasury is a thoroughgoing conservative who can be depended upon to defend the soundness of the currency at all costs. When Mr. Roosevelt selected William H. Woodin for the post, it was universally considered that the Administration would keep the dollar sound and stable. But when the country went off gold and the President began playing with the idea of a compensated or commodity dollar, Secretary Woodin was compelled to retire. Of course, he has not yet formally resigned, and Treasury operations are still undertaken in his name; but actually he no longer has anything to do with the shaping of Treasury policy and, indeed, he has been ill and absent from Washington for almost two months. At the moment, the White House and the "soft-money" experts brought in to advise the Administration on currency matters are guiding Treasury policy. But their control is being vigorously opposed by the few "hard-money" men in the Administration, who are led by Lewis H. Douglas, Director of the Budget, and are said to have the united support of the financial community in New York. The immediate goal is the secretaryship. If this goes to a conservative, it is certain that the dollar will soon be stabilized and restored to a gold basis. If the post goes to an inconsequential politician, as seems more likely, we shall doubtless be in for an extended period of currency experimentation.

BUSINESS REPORTS for July have proved more disturbing to the Administration than any published since it came into office. It is not because business activity has been falling off, but rather because factory output has mounted so rapidly. Preliminary estimates for July show factory production at 92 per cent of normal, the accepted normal being the average output for the years 1923-25. At the same time factory employment has gone up only to 67 per cent of normal and pay rolls no further than to 49 per cent. When we look at the unemployment figures, the contrast is even more striking. In April, according to the index of the American Federation of Labor, there were thirteen million unemployed. Since then hardly more than two million men and women have been put back to work. So here we have industry operating almost at normal and approximately eleven million workers still without jobs. True, many of these jobless are not factory mechanics, but that does not alter the fact that despite the industrial boom the unemployment problem is still grave. Current business reports show the amazing extent to which labor-saving machinery has been introduced and factory operations overhauled and rationalized during the depression. The reports likewise indicate that the thirty-five-hour week advocated by the National Recovery Administration will not suffice to give employment to all who are now without jobs. Computed roughly, it seems more likely that the working week will have to be cut down to twenty-seven or twenty-eight hours if the available work is to be equitably distributed among the available workers.

WHAT is the State Department doing about the atrocities in Germany which affect American citizens? Two weeks ago in Leipzig one of them watching a parade of Nazis was set upon and, despite his declaration of American citizenship, was beaten and kicked into unconsciousness. Colonel Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, reported that while he was in Berlin recently two Americans of Jewish birth were subjected to Nazi cruelties and that the United States consul-general was awaiting a response to his vigorous protests. Were we dealing with a civilized regime, brutalities of the above kind would be followed by a prompt public apology, indemnity for the victim, and punishment for the assailants. But we face a government which exalts thuggery, which condones bestiality, which glorifies murder. And while Washington should act with far greater vigor than it has hitherto, the proper course is for Americans to stay away from Germany and not expose themselves to the indignities to which they are liable at the hands of the Nazis. That this practice is already being widely followed, not merely by Americans, but also by travelers from other countries, is evidenced in the sharp decline of the German tourist traffic.

BEYOND THAT, the disaffection in the outside world toward Germany and the boycott movement are making themselves strongly felt. This has severely hurt the Hamburg-American's business and is continuing to hurt it and German shipping generally. The volume of business is constantly falling back." Thus spoke Dr. Max von Schinkel, chairman of the board since 1910, at a stockholders' meeting of the Hamburg-American Line on July 26 at which Marius Boeger, the managing director and the entire board of managers resigned in order that the company might be "coordinated with" the Nazi regime. Dr. Schinkel said he did not wish to resign, but that he could not do otherwise. His going was softened by the fact that as chairman he had "not even been able to find out what the reorganization of the company aims at." Besides the chairman, seventeen other members of the board, including all the Jewish members, among them Max Warburg and Bernhard Demburg, were dropped, so that the line is now 100 per cent Aryan—except that it still has Jewish stockholders and a steamer named after a Jew. How much longer will the Swastika wave over the Albert Ballin? The next day the North German Lloyd meeting was similarly doleful. The anti-Nazi boycott is telling here, too. Not even the Bremen and the Europa are doing as well as formerly despite all sorts of concessions, including free tickets to Norway and Sweden. Even more significant is the New York Times's report that if the public agitation against German-made dry goods is subsiding, "the boycott on such goods is more effective now than it was a month or six weeks ago. Some retailers have stopped buying German goods entirely while others are restricting purchases to the lowest possible minimum. In one store buyers decline even to view German products." The report that German goods are being sent in without labels fixing their origin has roused the customs officials to extra vigilance. And this is only the beginning of the price Germany will yet pay for Hitlerism.

REJECTING THE RECOMMENDATION of the faculty that military training be made optional, the trustees of Cornell University have decreed its continuation as a prescribed course "because of the present unsettled economic and social conditions of the country and of the world." What really should be made compulsory is a course in recent world history and economics for the financiers and business men who compose Cornell's trustees and, until his recent resignation, included Martin J. Insull, formerly of Chicago, now of somewhere in Canada. The "present unsettled economic and social conditions of the country and of the world" are due chiefly to the militarism which precipitated the World War. The Cornell trustees state further that "the abolition of compulsory drill would be misinterpreted, wrongly appraised, and accorded a significance and construction that would be harmful to the interests of the university and the country." The theory underlying this tender regard for an alleged public opinion would appear to be that because the military mind has taken possession of other countries, Mussolini's Italy, Japan, and now Hitler's Germany, we must likewise teach our young to rattle the saber. The fact is that over Americans and their homes hang the domestic perils of destitution and foreclosure—not the threat of a foreign enemy. This question has been before Cornell for over two years. The trustees' decision, rendered in vacation time when effective protest is impossible, represents the sentiment of neither the majority of the faculty nor of the student body. It represents the views of men whose hardened mentality and hardening arteries have played so large a part in bringing the world to its present pass. Unfortunately it is not an isolated case. In Wisconsin, the legislature has just voted to repeal the optional military training law at the State University, enacted in 1922 under the enlightened La Follette leadership, and to make "instruction and discipline in military tactics" mandatory for all first- and second-year men. Governor Schmedeman could veto this measure. It remains to be seen whether he too will line up with the forces that wish to transform our country into a fascist state.

THE LAST of thirteen persons convicted because of a so-called riot in Tampa, Florida, in 1931 have been released, and thus a case which the American Civil Liberties Union calls "unjustified from the start" has been closed. As told in The Nation of December 7, 1932, by Anita Brenner, Tampa cigar workers were holding an overflow meeting outside the Labor Temple. An attempt to disperse it resulted in a melee in which two policemen were injured. Of the thirteen prisoners taken some were in the hall at the time the trouble started, others were merely known to be members of the cigar-makers' union, and one was a traveling salesman who happened to be passing and protested against the treatment of a woman by a policeman. Of the thirteen persons convicted, three were deported. Six served terms of a year in prison, including a grandmother and a mother of an infant—both members of the Flores Magón family, illustrious in Mexican labor history. After much delay the conviction of the four other prisoners, serving longer terms, was set aside by the Florida Supreme Court on May 22, last, on the ground that under State law there could be no crime of riot unless the riot act had first been read, which was not the case. Even after the decision of the Supreme Court, the trial judge, W. R. Petteway, refused to release the four victims until habeas corpus proceedings were brought, and three of the men were later rearrested and held for a time for "investigation." The whole prosecution grew out of a bitter offensive in the business community to crush organization and attempts at betterment among the cigar workers, largely Spaniards or Latin Americans. Special thanks are due to E. L. Bryan, attorney for the defense, who in pushing the case not only risked a law practice but violence at the hands of vigilantes who plastered the court doors with posters warning lawyers to "Beware of Defending Reds."

TRAMPS are an old phenomenon in the United States—indeed practically an institution—but hitherto they have been of masculine gender. No longer, it seems. The Women's Bureau in Washington, in summarizing a survey recently made in nearly 800 cities of the forty-eight States, by various social agencies, found 9,769 women moving from one place to another, unattached, jobless, and homeless. These women hoboes averaged much younger than men in similar circumstances. In the South and Southwest, regions especially favored by wanderers, almost a fourth of the women were under twenty-one years of age. Lone women past thirty were rarely encountered. On the night of the survey 1,956 women were found sleeping in hobo camps. While the number of lodgings given to homeless men in New York City decreased by 15 per cent in June as compared with May, those given to women increased by 12 per cent. The increase since June of last year was 91 per cent. The Women's Bureau estimates too that the 10,000 women tramps who were counted represent probably not more than a fifth or sixth of the total. Is the woman hobo a new manifestation of feminine rights or an evidence of old human wrongs? In any event, her advent after the revelation last winter of another new social group—homeless, jobless, wandering boys—is something to set beside the optimistic reports about industrial recovery and the passing of the depression.

IN SENDING detachments of the National Guard to Fayette County, Pennsylvania, and putting the region under modified martial law, Governor Pinchot was so clear in his instructions that we are confident the country is to have the novel and refreshing spectacle of State troops used to insure fair play in an industrial dispute. Workers in the soft-coal mines of Fayette County are on strike for recognition of the union and are opposed especially by the powerful H. C. Frick Coke Company, a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation. Previous to the dispatch of State troops there had been serious clashes, in which Governor Pinchot felt the Sheriff of Fayette County had sided unduly with the mine owners. The Governor finally accused the Sheriff of "deliberately provoking strife and disorder" and demanded that he withdraw his deputies. The Sheriff's refusal to comply led to calling out the National Guard. Governor Pinchot informed the commander of the State troops that the mine owners had a legal right to operate their plants and should be protected in doing so, but he made it equally plain that the strikers were to be protected in their right to organize, picket, and hold public meetings.

AT LEAST there has been one compensation for the economic crisis; it has tended to drive out frivolous interests and to turn men's minds as never before to a reexamination of the economic system under which we live. The interest in economics is now intense. So, at least, we have been told by many professional feelers of the public pulse. It is interesting to turn for confirmation of this to the list of best-selling non-fiction books as compiled from the bookstores of seventy American cities by the Publisher's Weekly. Twenty such books in all are listed, and we set them down in the order of their sales: (1) Zweig's "Marie Antoinette"; (2) Waln's "The House of Exile"; (3) Pitkin's "Life Begins at Forty"; (4) Lockhart's "British Agent"; (5) Roosevelt's "Looking Forward"; (6) Kallet and Schlink's "100,000,000 Guinea Pigs"; (7) Alexander's "Always a Grand Duke"; (8) Culbertson's "Summary of 1933"; (9) James's "Andrew Jackson"; (10) Adams's "The March of Democracy," volume two; (11) "Julia Newberry's Diary"; (12) "Van Loon's Geography"; (13) Moats's "No Nice Girl Swears"; (14) Downes's "Contract Bridge Self-Teacher"; (15) "Tschiffely's Ride"; (16) Hill's "The American Scene"; (17) Tugwell's "Industrial Discipline"; (18) "Culbertson's Blue Book"; (19) Powys's "Philosophy of Solitude"; (20) Sutherland's "The Arches of the Years." We have put Mr. Tugwell's book, ranking seventeenth, in italics because it has the honor to be the only strictly economic book in the list. We should not like to think that even that position has been achieved largely because Mr. Tugwell is a member of the President's brain trust, and that business men are reading it because they are trying to learn not what economic arrangements would be wise but what the government expects to do to them.

THE INDUSTRIALIST and the worker, the employer and the employee—they are the prospective beneficiaries of the Administration's far-reaching program. Both capital and labor are already beginning to feel some quickening of industrial and commercial activity. But what about the professional man and woman? For them there is no newly established shorter week and minimum wage. Yet no Americans have been hit harder by the depression than they. Thousands have been reduced to penury, others forced to abandon the vocations for which they have painstakingly fitted themselves and to seek, often vainly, any kind of employment to keep body and soul together. And though the great public-works program brings a prospect of relief to workers in at least two professions—the architects and the engineers—the outlook is none too hopeful. The former—the architects—are the subject of the first article in a series beginning in this issue of The Nation. The teachers' dilemma, which will be discussed in the next two issues, is steadily becoming aggravated. Throughout the country municipalities, under the goad of various business organizations, are systematically curtailing school appropriations. In the universities the really drastic reduction in personnel and salaries is due in the coming academic year. Professional workers constitute a most valuable element in our civilization. The havoc the depression has wrought among them is reflected throughout our society, which is permanently injured as their function is impaired. The plight of the professions requires our active solicitude, and should come next on the Administration's agenda for reconstruction.

Labor Gets the Leavings

A POLITE fiction dominates the words and acts of the heads of the National Recovery Administration. They appear to believe that there is no such thing as the class struggle. They hate to admit the existence of even a conflict of interest. This attitude is understandable. It is the military attitude. Military similes are popular with the Recovery Administration. The depression is a "common enemy" to be conquered by a national army—a volunteer army, if possible; a drafted one, if necessary. Eagles, patriotic appeals, sharp commands become the economic methods of the day. Capital and labor?—unpatriotic nonsense; officers and privates, perhaps, but members of the same army. General Johnson (we think perhaps we had better refer to him by his military title) has summed up his position in words so simple and logical as to be utterly meaningless in the face of industrial realities:

It has been repeatedly said by the Administration that it is not the function of the National Recovery Act to organize either industry or labor. To obtain the benefits of this act, it is not necessary for workers to join either company unions or any particular labor union. Employers may bargain individually with their men. They cannot, however, refuse to bargain with the representatives chosen by labor.

But what does this appearance of bland impartiality really mean? It means that the collective bargaining clause in the National Recovery Act was an empty gesture. Labor in only a few industries is sufficiently organized, after nearly four years of unemployment and underpayment, to state its case or back its demands with any real power. Whatever the law may say, labor as a whole cannot bargain collectively. This fact must be known and deplored by such persons in the Administration as Secretary Perkins and Leo Wolman. But what can they do about it? Miss Perkins's fine statement at the hearing on the steel code may force certain modifications in that reactionary document, but the realities are against any effort to give labor an effective share in the organization of the New Deal. First, we have the patriotic appeal. "Is this the time, then," asks the New York Herald Tribune dramatically, "for a labor offensive conducted by gentlemen [the writer refers to those arch-revolutionists, Mr. Green and his associates] whose policy too frequently has been to lambast the employer?" Second, we have the unabashed opposition of employers' associations and the great industries. Third, we have the presence on the huge staff of the Recovery Administration of known opponents of organized labor, such as General Johnson's chief lieutenant, T. S. Hammond; and the number of these is growing. Fourth, we have the logic of events in the operation of an attempt to control industry under capitalism.

Grant that the Administration wants to increase pay rolls and restore purchasing power. That may be assumed; the Recovery Act means nothing if it doesn't mean that. Grant so much and then consider the question, What more does the Administration want? Does it want labor to have a say in the creation of the codes which so vitally affect its welfare? Not particularly. Let the labor representatives present their ideas if they have any; but the Administration will settle the matter of hours and wages on the basis of codes submitted by the industry itself. Is labor to be encouraged to raise wages above the minimum by means of its power to bargain or to strike? Hardly. General Johnson has said: "There is no place in this program, either, for labor to act selfishly or locally. This is no time for strikes because of isolated difficulties."

In the light of this clear and revealing statement it is worth setting down a few items picked out of the newspapers and press services during the last few days which reveal graphically what is actually going on. Here is one worth pondering from the Federated Press:

Cotton-mill owners are flagrantly violating the letter of the act and the terms of the approved code for the industry in North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, Thomas F. McMahon, president of the United Textile Workers of America, told the Federated Press. Men who join the union are dismissed; men who have tended eight or twelve looms are made to tend forty in defiance of the clause in the code which forbids increase of the stretch-out. Minimum wage rates are not being paid in all cases where they are legally required. Men suspected of union activity are driven from the mill villages. . . . Armed with these facts . . . McMahon walks the corridors unable to reach Johnson or his subordinates. . . . Johnson has shelved the report and is off to Detroit. Hammond is inaccessible. It is found that Johnson has ordered that all complaints be referred to "the industry."

Leo Wolman has announced that he has definite evidence that workers in various industries have been dismissed for joining unions. In commenting upon this, General Johnson promised that he would withdraw the protection of the code from any employer who "so violates the labor section of the code after a code is applied to his industry." But, says the Federated Press, "Johnson offers no comfort to workers who are dismissed now." In several recent cases reported in the newspapers, strikes have been called off in response to the demands of members of the Administration. Prompt settlement has been ordered in other strikes. Every effort is being made to prevent or hush up or quickly end labor disputes despite General Johnson's announcement that strikes were not his affair.

The final indictment of the labor policy emerging from the Recovery Act appears in the codes themselves. The codes so far reported set wages at so low a level—so little above the lowest generally paid—that it seems likely that they will defeat even their single end of enlarging purchasing power. The blanket code leaves wages above the minimum to be determined by the employer, merely forbidding cuts and urging "equitable readjustments." In the face of swiftly increasing prices this may actually result in widespread reductions in real wages. Employers can raise prices without conference; labor cannot raise wages at all. The Administration fixes minimum wage rates in conference with employers except where a strong union exists and presents its demands. The Administration discourages strikes. It is not interested in whether unions are formed or not.

This is industrial planning under the profit system. In spite of the presence in the Administration of men and women of good intentions and liberal views, this apparently is the way the program must work. We feared as much and voiced our fears when the Recovery Act was first drafted. Those fears have been justified much sooner than we had expected.

Our Lawless Judges

NORMAN THOMAS has written a letter to the Association of the Bar of the City of New York asking it to use its influence to limit by law the power of "tyrannical and irremediable vengeance" exercised by judges in regard to contempt of court. Mr. Thomas bases his plea especially on the recent action against Louis Waldman, lawyer and chairman of the Socialist Party of New York State, who was held guilty of contempt of court while arguing for delay in a labor-union case. The Nation knows nothing of the facts regarding Mr. Waldman. Indeed nobody not present at the time can know anything of them, for as Mr. Thomas points out no stenographic record exists and Mr. Waldman was not later granted a hearing or any opportunity to present a defense on the issue of fact. He was condemned on the "unsupported word" of Justice T. W. Churchill acting as "plaintiff, judge, and jury."

That is the usual process, and in protesting against it Mr. Thomas is not calling attention to a new injustice but challenging a long-intrenched tyranny the more inexcusable because it is a survival of an age of despotism which otherwise we have left far behind. To some extent the contempt process exercised by American judges is based upon law, but in a large measure it is founded upon what judges call their "inherent power" to maintain the authority of the courts. When judges talk about "inherent power" they usually mean what the rest of us call usurped power. Probably the whole contempt process is to a large degree unconstitutional, but as the judges are the interpreters of the Constitution they naturally have construed it in their favor. Contempt proceedings are a heritage of medievalism—of the era of "divine right." Americans repudiated the divine right of kings years ago but we still have with us the divine right of judges.

Without question the courts should be able to protect their procedure and enforce their orders, but offenders should not be subject to the passion of the outraged judge. They should be prosecuted under established law, with the protection of a regularly conducted trial presided over by some judge other than the complaining one. The existing practice whereby a magistrate acts as prosecutor, judge, and jury in regard to his own accusations, and fixes the penalty according to his own sweet will, has no place in even a semi-civilized country. In one respect punishment for contempt of court ought to be completely abolished, that is for a criticism made out of court of a judge or a judgment. There is no reason why judges should not be subject to precisely the same criticism as is leveled against legislative or administrative officials. The latter have the protection of laws against libel and slander, and that is all that judges should have.

Much of our submissiveness in regard to existing contempt proceedings grows out of the carefully inculcated theory of the "majesty of the law." The theory is poppycock. There is no majesty in the law, and judges are not sacred cows, although they may sometimes be egregious asses. The law is a painfully inadequate and often erroneous effort to express the public will, and judges are only a fallible and sometimes prejudiced agency in carrying it out. All the absurd liturgy and pomp of our judicial structure—our insistence upon the "dignity of the court"—are largely a defensive effort to cover up otherwise glaring insufficiencies and injustices. American judges are especially vulnerable in regard both to their intelligence and their integrity because of our naive habit of filling positions on the bench by popular election or political appointment. In France, for instance, where one prepares for the bench as a career by special training, and advances according to ability and length of service, it is hard for men to conceive how we tolerate a system in which any shyster lawyer or peanut politician may attain to the "judicial ermine." By chance rather than because we deserve it, the United States has been and still is blessed with a great many able and upright judges, especially on the federal bench. But against them must be set some crooks, a good many ignoramuses, and not a few pompous old fuddy-duddies chiefly occupied with maintaining their "dignity" and parading their "authority." One of the latter once thundered at a lawyer before him: "Counselor, are you trying to express your contempt of this court?" "No, your honor," was the reply, "I am trying to conceal it."

Judges cannot lessen contempt of court by exhibiting their spleen or exercising despotic powers. They can create respect for themselves and the bench by deserving it.

How the Movies Educate

A FEW weeks ago we commented upon the touching statement of Will H. Hays, czar of the movies, who has declared his intention to rule the celluloid empire not in the interest of those who have millions of dollars invested in the industry but in the interests of the fathers and mothers of America "who have millions of children invested in them." At the same time he professed to have toward "that virgin thing, the mind of a child," the same tender attitude which we expect on the part of "the best clergyman" or "the most inspired teacher of youth."

From this one might easily conclude that there was some danger of our raising up a race of young prigs, innocent of the world and handicapped by minds too long sheltered from any knowledge of the seamier side of life. We hasten, however, to assure our readers that Mr. Hays is actually rather more liberal than his words would lead one to expect. This happens to be the season when the loyal members of his empire are announcing the titles of the works with which they propose to educate the youth during the next few months, and an examination of the titles tends to dispel very effectively any fear that the producers are sticking too close to the tradition of Oliver Optic or the author of the Rollo books. Mr. Hays seems, indeed, to have rather odd ideas concerning what is appropriate to "that virgin thing, the mind of a child."

The curriculum for the summer is so varied that it is hard to make a choice. "My Lips Betray" is promising and so, in a slightly different way, is "Moonlight and Pretzels." Then there is "Pilgrimage," described as a study in "flaming young love unafraid," and there is also "My Weakness," with Lillian Harvey and "a host of Hollywood's hand-picked beauties," to say nothing of "The Woman I Stole," "Gold Diggers of 1933," and "Storm at Daybreak"—which last is compactly described thus: "A young wife; a young man; and an old husband. Love caught them in a cyclone of emotion!" We think, however, that if we had a virgin mind which we were anxious to educate, we could classify all these as elective courses from which a choice might be made in order to round out the necessary number of hours, and that we should make compulsory only the two following works, whose titles we quote (with full catalogue description) from advertisements appearing in that well-known educational journal, Variety:

"The Worst Woman in Paris?" A beautiful butterfly hiding her heart and inviting the caresses of the world's best-dressed man and best-known lover.

"He Knew His Women." A full-blooded story of the wide-open Bowery in the Gay Nineties when ladies laced tight and men cut loose! Today's young folks may think they're pretty wild, but they never saw the match of the hell-raising "good old days."

This last item seems to us to be educational in the best sense. It shows how the movies tend to combat that ignorance of the past which has so often been charged against our young people, and how they show that our ancestors, too often thought of as merely old fogies, have much to teach us. Here is a salutary reaction against the spirit of the debunker, a return to that sound practice which holds up the heroes of the past as models for imitation. Young folks today may think they are pretty wild. But what does even the average college graduate really know about the days "when ladies laced tight and men cut loose"?

Still Starving

FOLLOWING the cue from Washington, the press of the country is engaged in a united effort to ballyhoo the country back to prosperity. By making a great to-do over slight gains in employment and increases in wages—by applying the mind cure to economic ills—an effort is being made to lift us out of the industrial depression by assurances that it no longer exists. The method may have some success in allaying groundless fear or dissipating imaginary difficulties, but it requires high powers of hypnotism to convince a man with an empty stomach that he isn't hungry or to persuade a family that has just been put into the street that prosperity has returned. And there is the danger that by lulling Americans into the belief that their troubles are over, or soon will be, the solvent majority will neglect the unfortunate minority. That, in fact, seems to be what is happening all over the country. A slight upturn in industrial conditions—and still more the advantage of summer weather and seasonal employment—is blinding people to the fact that millions of persons are in acute distress.

Meanwhile efforts toward relief were never so demoralized. Attempts to raise funds by voluntary contributions are petering out. City governments are passing the responsibility to the States and the States are shifting it to Washington. The latter replies that it will help only on a contributory basis and where local units are doing their utmost. A less friendly spirit seems to be developing between relief agencies and their unfortunate dependents. Gradually the unemployed have been organizing and are rightly protesting against oppressive and inadequate methods of relief. Hunger marches have given way to strikes among the so-called beneficiaries of charity, and relief agencies seem to be meeting the situation with an increasing resort to force, not to say illegality. Men working on Buffalo Bayou in Texas for relief wages have protested against mosquitoes, poison ivy, and terrific heat, but have been told that unless they take what they are offered, all help will be cut off. In Prairie Township, Ohio, when men working at eighteen cents an hour on the roads struck for forty cents an hour, the State minimum, three of them were arrested for vagrancy and "riotous attempt." The Federated Press reports that at High Point, North Carolina, two women—former students at Brookwood Labor College—and one man were arrested lately, charged with inciting to riot and vagrancy because they induced workers to protest against eighty cents a day for relief work. Vagrancy laws, it appears, are increasingly invoked against the unemployed to club them into submission.

In New York, the nation's wealthiest city, relief for the needy has been on a reduced scale lately, and is in a most precarious and hand-to-mouth situation because the municipality can neither borrow more money nor devise acceptable taxes. The State legislature has been assembled in extra session and the city has been attempting to shift its burden to the whole commonwealth, but this has rightly been blocked by the Republican legislators and the Democratic governor in a common demand that New York solve its difficulties with its own immense resources. The collapse of New York's credit, and the prospect that it may follow Chicago on the road to bankruptcy, is commonly attributed to "Tammany corruption," but is a deeper ill than that suggests. What has happened in New York is the now familiar American spectacle of a plutocracy superimposed upon the old forms of democracy. For years a crew of political go-betweens, in return for a high commission, has kept the masses in line with bread and circuses while to the classes it has afforded privileges and immunities to accumulate incredible profits. In times of prosperity the system worked in its own crude fashion, but since the industrial depression it has been increasingly impossible to give the masses their usual ration of bread although, wise politicians that the Tammany leaders are, they have continued the circuses on a not greatly reduced scale. As to the classes, they are horrified that any substantial share of their wealth should be extracted in the form of taxes. When the city government proposed lately to lay a tax on automobiles using the city streets a roar went up from the down-trodden owners of those machines which compelled an immediate abandonment of the plan. It looks, therefore, as if the political racketeers would have to turn upon the more numerous but less powerful masses as a source of revenue, seeking new money by sales taxes and other levies falling most heavily upon the poor, not to speak of a possible increase in the fares of the underground railroads upon which the populace depends for transportation.

Issues and Men

Shall the Real Liberals Coalesce?

FROM a Texas reader of this weekly commentary come these questions: "Do you think the 'New Day' has finally dawned at Washington, and is the Administration, judging by its accomplishments since March 4, really sincere and honest in its purposes? Above all else, do you think there is reason to believe that leadership and courage have finally come to Washington after so long an absence?" Let me reply at once that the President, in my judgment, has demonstrated both leadership and courage, and that his Administration is really sincere and honest in its purposes. I do not see how anyone can question this, however much one may regret Mr. Roosevelt's errors, the worst of which is yielding without warrant of Congress to the jingo demand that we build our fleet up to the treaty limits—under the excuse of giving jobs to shipyards and their employees.

But to pass a final opinion on the Roosevelt Administration, or to prophesy that it has achieved the miracle of conquering the depression and putting all the unemployed back to work, is impossible now. No one can tell, not even Mr. Roosevelt. We only know that in contrast to the Hoover Administration there is not only great leadership, but tremendous courage; that the whole psychology of the people has been changed for the better; that there are remarkable evidences of industrial revival as most strikingly shown by the second-quarter reports of General Motors and United States Steel. This does not yet prove, however, that the changes under way are all wise and of genuine therapeutic value. Some may yet prove to be almost worse than the disease. The very haste with which these remedies have been compounded would seem to necessitate revision in due course. Too many men have drafted laws about matters with which they were not familiar through actual experience, and the multitude of enactments is so stupendous that a certain amount of redigestion seems absolutely essential.

Granting Mr. Roosevelt's courage, boldness, originality of attack, and the daring and comprehensiveness of his nationwide appeal to employers, big and little, voluntarily to submit themselves to the new doctrine of shorter hours, high wages, and decent business practices, I am still not yet convinced that the Democratic Party has been transformed by the President into the ideal liberal-progressive party for which so many of us have been sighing so long. He drove through Congress a host of measures which the bulk of the Democrats who voted for them had either not read or not understood, for which he had received no party authorization whatever. This procedure, I found in England, has especially amazed foreign observers. They cannot understand how a President elected on a platform written in July, 1932, could in March, 1933, inaugurate so radical a policy, differing so much from the spirit and letter of that platform, without even calling a party convention or a council of leaders to obtain their approval and consent. When Congress reconvenes in January the Democrats may or may not approve of what the President has done. If we are on a full flood-tide of economic resurgence there will be little caviling. But that does not mean that his party will have become a radical reform party, just as nothing that the President has yet done has proved that he is understandingly interested in transferring the economic power from the hands of the privileged few to those of the masses. He is tinkering with the old economic system; he appears really bent, with certain changes, on restoring the old order. There is not even proof yet that he knows how far to the left he has gone, or realizes the significance of all that has been done. Certainly we have as yet no comprehensive, far-reaching program for the next three and one-half years, or seven and one-half years, no promise that the basic industries, through which the Wall Street powers maintain their stranglehold upon us all, shall be nationalized—not even the railroads or the banks. He has not laid a finger upon the great monopolies, nor upon the greatest stronghold of privilege of all—the tariff. And he has backed, body and soul, the big-navy vested interests and touched not at all the sinister army and navy lobbies.

So I find myself in hearty accord with the proposal to call a convention in Chicago at the beginning of September which is being sponsored by the League for Independent Political Action for the purpose of taking stock of the situation and seeing whether it is possible to consolidate the various farm and labor movements into a liberal-radical party. I am well aware that if the Congressional elections were to be held this fall, the Democrats would poll an amazingly large percentage of the votes; that there is much propaganda to the effect that it is unpatriotic now to say a word against, or express a doubt about, the Roosevelt program and policies; that we are very close to the war-time psychology of labeling traitorous anyone who dissents or questions.

Again, as long as the Republican Party is the only opposition the need for a fusion of liberal elements is obvious. And there is still another reason for establishing a clearing-house of liberal opinion. Let us not underestimate the drift toward fascism. One of the most striking figures in the Wilson Administration recently said very earnestly to me that if Roosevelt should fail there would come a coalition government probably headed by Al Smith, and after that fascism. Perhaps distinctly more serious is the danger of our drifting into the new form of state by the slower, less obvious process of being regimented and regulated, and dangerously restricted in our liberty of action. Unawares, we could go far in this direction, for if the Roosevelt measures should prove illusory people will care even less what is done or how it is done, if only relief is achieved somehow. Chains are very easily put on, as Germany shows; they are put off with extraordinary difficulty. A clearing-house of liberal, and radical, and Socialist opinion might prove to be a lighthouse and a warning-tower of great importance in letting the country know whither we are drifting and how fast.

August Garrison Villard

The Home-Loan Act—a Fraud?

By HENRY GOLDEY

THE Home Owners' Loan Act, which became a law on June 13, is designed to aid home owners who are in danger of losing their property. It applies to property "upon which there is located a dwelling for not more than four families used by the owner as a home, or held by him as a homestead, and having a value not exceeding $20,000." The act provides for the creation of a new corporation to be known as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The capital stock of the corporation shall be subscribed by the government in such amounts from time to time as the Board of Directors (who, under the act, are the same as the Federal Home Loan Bank Board) may determine, but not to exceed in the aggregate $200,000,000.

In addition, the corporation is authorized to issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds maturing within eighteen years, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 4 per cent. The interest but not the principal is guaranteed by the government. While the corporation is authorized both to sell these bonds or exchange them, Chairman Steagall of the House Banking Committee, during the debate on the bill, stated that the exchange and not the sale of the bonds was contemplated. With this financial structure, the corporation is authorized to deal in three different kinds of home mortgages, which for convenience may be designated as 80 per cent, 50 per cent, and 40 per cent mortgages.

Under the 80 per cent plan, the corporation will re-finance a mortgage indebtedness existing at the time of the passage of the act by exchanging its bonds for the mortgage; and will, in addition, advance cash to pay taxes and assessments and to provide for necessary maintenance and repairs, provided that the aggregate amount of bonds and cash does not exceed 80 per cent of the present value of the property, and does not exceed $14,000.

The 50 per cent plan applies to the fortunate home owner who has no mortgage whatever on his property. In his case, the corporation will advance in cash not in excess of 50 per cent of the value of the property, but only for the purpose of paying taxes and assessments and providing for necessary maintenance and repairs.

Under the 40 per cent plan the corporation will advance in cash up to 40 per cent of the value of the property to liquidate an existing mortgage indebtedness, where the mortgagee refuses to exchange his mortgage for the bonds, and to pay taxes and assessments and provide for necessary maintenance and repairs.

In each case, the obligation of the home owner to the corporation shall be for the face amount of the bonds given in exchange for the mortgage, plus the cash advance, if any, and shall be secured by a first mortgage on the property, bearing interest of not more than 5 per cent for the 80 per cent and 50 per cent mortgages, and not exceeding 6 per cent for the 40 per cent mortgages. The principal of the mortgage is to be amortized within fifteen years; the owner, however, need not make any payments on account of principal during the period of three years from the effective date of the act, provided that he complies with all the other provisions of the mortgage. In addition, "the corporation may at any time grant an extension of time to any home owner for the payment of any instalment of principal or interest—if in the judgment of the corporation, the circumstances of the owner and the condition of the security justify such extension."

I wish to emphasize at this point that the original bill introduced in the House by Chairman Steagall contained no provision whatsoever for the refinancing of home mortgages on a cash basis. This provision found its way into the act through later amendments.

In the authorized statement explaining the act, William F. Stevenson, Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board, said:

But no large volume of mortgages can be liquidated in cash under this [40 per cent] clause; because most homes are mortgaged for more than 40 per cent, and also because sufficient funds are not available to take over any large percentage of home mortgages in the country.

While this statement referred to the 40 per cent mortgages, it must have been intended to apply with equal force to the 50 per cent mortgages as well, because for these also cash advances were provided. It is therefore clear that the primary purpose of the bill concerns the 80 per cent mortgages in which the mortgage holder exchanges his mortgage for the bonds of the corporation.

It seems to me that any distressed home owner with a large mortgage on his property, with taxes unpaid, and with a house in need of repairs, upon reading about this bill must have felt very grateful toward Uncle Sam, who was ready, able, and willing, through this corporation, to lend him up to 80 per cent of the present value of his property, and to give him fifteen to eighteen years in which to repay it.

Unfortunately, however, there seems to be a slight hitch in the 80 per cent plan. Suppose, for example, that the mortgagee refuses to exchange his mortgage for the bonds. What then? Is it possible that these bonds might not prove sufficiently attractive to mortgagees to warrant an exchange? Is it possible that some mortgagees would not be legally permitted to make the exchange? The facts, which I intend to prove, are (1) that the vast majority of mortgagees would not be legally permitted to exchange their mortgages for these bonds; (2) that Congress knew this to be the case; (3) that independent of legal restrictions, the bonds are of little worth and therefore unattractive, and that Congress knew this also.

The bonds which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is authorized to issue in exchange for mortgages are what are ordinarily known as debentures, that is, they are the mere promises of the corporation to pay, unsecured by the pledge of any specific assets. Under the laws of the several States, life insurance companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, title companies, and executors and trustees of estates are prohibited from making investments except in specific securities, such as government bonds, State bonds, certain municipal and county bonds; first mortgage bonds of specified railroads and in some cases, of utilities; first mortgages on real estate not in excess (in most cases) of 60 per cent of the value of the property. They are not permitted to invest in the unsecured bonds of any corporation.

The debenture bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are therefore ineligible under State laws for investment by such supervised financial institutions. Since approximately 80 per cent of home mortgages are held by these financial institutions and an unknown, but undoubtedly substantial percentage of the remainder are held by executors and trustees, it is clear that no relief under the bill can be expected by the vast majority of the home owners in the country.

Of course, it could have been possible that Congress overlooked this legal barrier to the workability of the law, considering the tremendous amount of important legislation enacted by it, but the Congressional Record proves that it was not an oversight. On April 27, during the first day of debate on the bill in the House of Representatives, the following colloquy took place:

MR. COCHRAN (Dem., Mo.): Is this bill going to be another fraud like the one enacted at the last session of Congress?

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH (Dem., Md.): It is not a fraud.

MR. COCHRAN: Are we then going to be honest and tell the people that this bill is not a set-up through which the government will take over their mortgages?

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH: Only people coming within the privileges of this bill can get relief.

MR. COCHRAN: It depends on whether the mortgagee will accept bonds. Insurance companies and building and loan associations cannot accept bonds under State laws.

MR. BRENNER (Dem., Ill.): Of course, if the mortgagee doesn't want to do refinancing, he cannot be compelled to.

On the day following Mr. Cochran again obtained the floor.

Is there a man in this House [he asked] who will deny that the laws of the various States do not prohibit building and loan associations, savings banks, and insurance companies from purchasing securities of the character described in this bill? I pause for a reply. No one seems to contradict this statement, and if it be true, who is going to take the bonds and where is the relief coming to the home owners?

Mr. Steagall, chairman of the House committee, who sponsored this bill, was present at both sessions of Congress during this debate, yet during the entire two sessions, no one answered the criticism of the gentleman from Missouri. In other words, Congress, according to its own official record, passed a law offering to trade bonds for mortgages when Congress knew that the vast majority of the mortgagees would not legally be permitted to make the exchange.

Can the situation be rectified? It can, in two ways, neither of which is likely to receive serious attention. The bonds could be made eligible for exchange if the principal as well as the interest was guaranteed by the government. This question was repeatedly raised during the debate on the bill in both houses but the suggestion was rejected by sponsors of the bill as inviting a Presidential veto. It was indicated that if the government undertook to refinance home mortgages by an exchange of bonds of which both principal and interest were guaranteed by the government, every mortgagee would call in his mortgage and force an exchange of the mortgage for the bonds, in which case the two billion dollars provided by the bill would be wholly inadequate. Turning to the Congressional Record we find two statements from Representative Steagall:

It would be a serious thing to undertake to guarantee principal and interest on bonds of home owners aggregating over $21,000,000,000. There is an end to what can prudently be done.

Nobody contends that we should open up the Treasury of the United States for adequate relief for all home owners.

Somewhat later Representative Reilly (Democrat, Wisconsin), spoke as follows:

Where are you going to get the money from? If we should issue twenty billion dollars worth of bonds to take care of our city mortgages, we would be entering upon the most stupendous inflation this country has ever known, an inflation that would destroy and wreck the industrial life of our country. We all have sympathy with the home owner, but there is a limit beyond which the government cannot go.

The second way out is the passage of enabling acts by the several States to permit insurance companies, savings banks, and other agencies to invest in the debentures, of which only the interest is guaranteed by the government. But to let down the bars of safety, which for generations have guarded the investments of these financial institutions, would constitute a great legislative crime. I doubt whether any of these financial institutions, considering the trust and confidence reposed in them, would for a moment consider the exchange. It would certainly be a breach of faith toward every purchaser of a building and loan certificate, every savings bank depositor, and every life insurance policy holder who has heretofore felt secure in the knowledge that the investments of these institutions are rigidly restricted by law, if these organizations were permitted to invest in the unsecured bonds of a politically managed corporation dealing in 80 per cent mortgages.

Assuming that enabling acts were passed, what about the desirability of the bonds as an investment. If a private corporation were to attempt under the stress of emergency to start a nationwide business of investing in mortgages, a tremendous amount of administrative waste would of necessity result. When such work is performed by a politically organized corporation, even assuming 100 per cent honesty all along the line, the waste would be staggering in comparison.

The announcements of the Federal Home Loan Bank indicate that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be organized with branches in each State and representatives in each county. There are 3,000 counties in the United States. According to an announcement in the New York Times of July 9, about 500 new jobs will be created in New York State alone to carry out the purposes of the act. Since there are 62 counties in New York State, this would mean an average of over 8 employees per county. If this average is maintained throughout the country, approximately 25,000 worthy, hungry job-holders would be employed in the administration of the act. At an average salary of, say, $50 ■ week, the total annual administrative expense for salaries therefore would be $62,500,000, exclusive of all other expenses. The total annual expense would probably reach $75,000,000.

Nor is it likely that this annual expense would be limited to the first few years of the corporation's existence. If it ever begins to function it will necessarily be in the mortgage and real estate business for at least eighteen years and probably many times eighteen years. While the law provides that the making of these loans shall be limited to the first three years of the corporation's existence, the corporation will have to carry on until the last mortgage has been completely amortized and the last bond paid.

Going into the matter a little further, what would the corporation's income be? Let us assume that the corporation functions to its fullest extent and owns $2,000,000,000 worth of home mortgages for which it has issued an equal amount of bonds. Let us also assume that each home owner pays his interest promptly and in full. The income of the corporation at an interest rate of 5 per cent would therefore be $100,000,000.

If the administrative expenses are $75,000,000 and the corporation's income is $100,000,000, only $25,000,000 would be left with which to pay the interest of 4 per cent on the outstanding bonds of the corporation, representing a deficit of $55,000,000 which the government has guaranteed and which it will have to make good. This estimate, it must be remembered, is based on the assumption that all the distressed home owners throughout the country are going to pay their interest promptly and in full. Does anybody really believe that this will be the case?

If the distress of the home owners is as keen as it is claimed to be, refinancing their obligations will not put them in any better position. And since the corporation has the right under the law to extend the time of payment of any instalment of principal or interest, it can readily be seen that this politically sponsored institution, itself feeding at the public trough, will have little serious objection to sharing it with others. It is much more likely that instead of an income from interest of $100,000,000 ■ year, the corporation will realize closer to $20,000,000 or perhaps ■ maximum of $40,000,000 on the $2,000,000,000 outstanding. If so, income from interest will not even equal administrative expense. Even with the greatest economy in administration, the best that might be hoped for is that the income and expense will be equal. In that case, the annual deficit which the government would have to make good would be the total interest charge on the bonds, or $80,000,000, entailing ■ burden on the general American public of something like $1,500,000,000 during the eighteen-year period.

Let us now try to envisage the final liquidation of the corporation's business, assuming for the sake of the argument that it ends in eighteen years. Does anyone think that 100 per cent will be realized on the assets of the corporation? Once an owner's equity in the property is a mere 20 per cent, there is little incentive to continue to increase that equity, especially when the money is owed to good old Uncle Sam. Considering the rapid depreciation of this type of property, generally estimated at 4 per cent per year, it seems clear that when a final reckoning is made, the government will be fortunate if it realizes more than 25 cents on the dollar.

Let us be more optimistic, however, and assume that 50 cents on the dollar will be finally realized. What then? Will the holders of the bonds get the 50 cents on the dollar and in the meantime the 4 per cent interest paid by the government? No, because the interest guaranty has a catch in it too. While the act says that the interest on the bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed by the government, and that "such guarantee shall be expressed on the face thereof," the further provision is made that any monies advanced by the government to make good the interest on these bonds "shall become an obligation to the United States of the corporation, and shall bear interest at the same rate as that borne by the bonds."

If, for example, the government will have had to make good the entire annual interest charge during the eighteen-year period of $80,000,000 per annum, the amount owing by the corporation to the government at the end of that time with interest will be close to $2,000,000,000; the total indebtedness of the corporation at that time, therefore, will be $2,000,000,000 in outstanding bonds and $2,000,000,000 to the government—a total of $4,000,000,000. If the corporation should then liquidate and realize 50 per cent on its assets, it will have $1,000,000,000 in cash with which to satisfy $4,000,000,000 in claims; the bondholders would receive a mere 25 per cent of the principal, and the government would lose $1,500,000,000 on the transaction.

That Congress thoroughly understood the worthlessness of the bonds and nevertheless passed the bill is evident from the following excerpts from the Congressional Record:

MR. MCFADDEN (Rep., Pa.): I say to you that the government will get all the inferior mortgages of the country—those which the public want to unload.

MR. MCGUGIN (Rep., Kan.): We all know that these bonds are not going to be good as to principal 100 cents on the dollar, because the security back of them is bound to be mortgages which are in distress at the very time these are exchanged for the bonds.

MR. GLOVER (Dem., Ark.): I do not know, but I believe there is not a man on this floor who would pay hard cash to buy the bonds provided in this bill. If there is a man, let him stand up. I would not do it, and you would not do it.

MR. MARTIN (Dem., Ore.): I do not understand that it is good business venture to loan on property up to 80 per cent when it is notorious that appraisers overappraise in reference to government loans.

MR. CELLER (Dem., N.Y.): Suppose a man . . . cannot pay his interest or amortization. Will the corporation foreclose? What is he going to do? He is going to his Congressman . . . and tell his troubles. What will the Congressman do? He'll endeavor to get an extension. If the foreclosure is in process, will this corporation eject the owner? I am sure that you are not going to get any ejection . . . The prospective investors know what they will have. They will have just pieces of paper for security, empty rights with no worthwhile privileges to foreclose due to political pressure.

SENATOR GORE (Dem., Okla.): What is the difference [between a three-year and five-year moratorium]? Will not the moratorium be made perpetual? Senators . . . discuss the imaginary difference between 5 per cent and 8 per cent interest under this scheme. What is the difference? Neither will be paid.

Mr. Wheeler, Senator from Montana, stated another truth when he said that he would feel much safer if his loan were placed with the federal government rather than a private lending concern. He said he did not believe the federal government would foreclose the mortgage. Certainly it will not. Suppose we make loans to 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 farmers and they demand that extensions, reductions, cancelations be made. . . . What answer will the Senators make? . . . Mr. Wheeler says "Cancel," an echo answers "Cancel," a chorus answers "Cancel." There is no other course.

A peculiar feature of the act remains to be mentioned. At the beginning of this article, I gave a résumé of the provisions of the act with respect to the kinds of mortgages the corporation is permitted to deal in. A second part of the act covers the organization of new building and loan associations in sections of the country where such associations do not exist. The act provides that the government shall contribute capital, dollar for dollar, up to a certain amount, to such new building and loan associations, and also specifies the kind of securities such building and loan associations are permitted to invest in. The bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are not included.

The passage by Congress of the Home Owners' Loan Act when it knew that the measure could bring relief only to a small percentage of home owners, and in those cases only when individual mortgagees might not be able to make a thorough analysis of the value of the bond, was a deliberate fraud. The act should be repealed.

It happens that an effective substitute is available. I refer to the possibility of State action similar to the emergency rent legislation in New York of a few years ago, which was sustained by the United States Supreme Court as a proper exercise of the police power of the State. It will be recalled that during the hectic days of 1920 and 1921, when rents in New York City and other urban centers skyrocketed to dizzy heights, legislation was passed prohibiting landlords from dispossessing tenants during the emergency, the court in the meantime being given the right to fix the reasonable rental value of the premises.

According to an Associated Press dispatch of July 7 last, the Minnesota State Supreme Court in a 6 to 1 decision upheld as constitutional the two-year emergency foreclosure relief act passed by the 1933 legislature. This act, among other things, provides that during the two-year stay the owner must pay the rental value of the property. The court in that case, said:

There can be no doubt that in some degree our act impairs the obligations of the mortgage contract, and hence runs counter to Section X, Article 1 of the federal Constitution. But our conclusion is that the legislature, under the police power of the State, has authority to enact laws to relieve a public emergency even though such laws temporarily impair obligations of contract, provided the impairment is no more than reasonably necessary. To that extent, the police power is supreme.

If such legislation were enacted in all States, the Home Owners' Loan Act, with its 25,000 political jobs entailing a colossal loss to the American taxpayers, would be quite unnecessary. And if Congress were in a generous mood, it could in addition devote the $200,000,000 intended to be wasted in political patronage under the Home Owners' Loan Act to the relief of those who cannot even pay the reasonable rental value of the premises during the stay of the foreclosure action.

The Administration's Answer

Mr. Goldey's article was submitted by The Nation to William F. Stevenson, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. His comments follow:

The article submitted by you is based upon a misconception of the scope and purpose of the Home Owners' Act of 1933.

The total of all the home mortgages of the country is in excess of $20,000,000,000, over half of which are in default of one or more of their terms. Congress did not believe that it would be wise for the government to endeavor to take over so vast a portfolio of mortgages, and drive all private capital out of the mortgage lending field. But it did believe that some measure of relief should be offered, by taking off the market mortgages of distressed home owners, to the limits of the act, in the hope that by so doing it would tend to stabilize realty and mortgage values.

It is true that in some States, under the provisions of their laws, some types of mortgagees may not be permitted to exchange their mortgages for bonds of the corporation without the aid of enabling legislation. But it is also a fact that there is a total amount of mortgages available for exchange far in excess of the authorized amount of bonds that the corporation may issue.

The bonds are backed by the authorized capital of the corporation, which is $200,000,000, and by the mortgages given to secure the primary obligations of home owners who have refinanced their indebtedness to the corporation. These mortgages will be carefully placed, upon adequate appraisal, examination of title, and inquiry as to the ability of the home owner to meet the obligation he incurs with the corporation. It is unthinkable to assume, as has been assumed by your writer, that any large number of American citizens owning their own homes will deliberately refrain from paying their mortgage indebtedness for the sole reason that a governmental instrumentality is the holder of the mortgage.

The figures quoted as to the expense of the operation of the corporation are so fantastic that they have the appearance of being deliberately exaggerated. The corporation will operate through a State manager with a small force of assistants, who are being paid a remuneration that is most reasonable for the services rendered; the county appraisers, as well as the attorneys in the respective counties, are to be paid upon a piece basis for the work they actually do, which fee will be paid by the borrower; and the large numbers of citizens who will act as advisory committees in the respective counties and States of the country are acting without compensation of any kind, undertaking their duty as a patriotic one for the good of the country as a whole.

In my opinion, the article is most unfair and does not truly represent either the purpose or the scope of the act nor the possible good that the corporation may do. In thirty days the board will be able to give definite figures as to the annual expense, which will largely cease at the end of three years, while the income will continue.

WILLIAM F. STEVENSON

The Architect and the Depression

By TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN, A.I.A.

IT is common knowledge that architecture has been hard hit during the last three years, but it is doubtful if there is any general realization of the terrific intensity of the blow it has received. Figures collected by the Dodge Corporation Reports for the thirty-seven States east of the Rockies (published in the Architectural Record for July, 1933) show that in 1932 architects had less than one-seventh the work they had in 1928. The figures for contracts let under architects' supervision in round numbers are as follows: 1928, $3,600,000,000; 1932, $500,000,000. The Pacific States were less drastically affected, but even there the falling off in business was severe. In other words, if architects were producing the same amount per capita in 1932 as in 1928, out of seven architects and draftsmen at work in 1928 only one would be busy today. Of course this is not the case; production per capita, and consequently income, has fallen off as the total of construction has diminished; thousands of architects and architectural firms still ostensibly in active practice are leading a precarious half-life, striving manfully to collect enough from the crumbs of work that fall their way to meet the office rent and some of the overhead expense.

The Dodge Corporation figures reveal another interesting fact. In 1928 the $3,600,000,000 of work was shared by 9,000 offices; in 1932 the $500,000,000 of work went to only 5,300—a falling off of roughly 4,000 offices or individuals. But this does not tell the whole story, for the figures for the four years from 1928 to 1932 show a total of 9,700 new architects; including these, the number who have given up the ghost since 1928 is another 13,000 and the number continuing in practice only 3,800.

In this tremendous shift it is noteworthy that the smaller offices have frequently fared better than the larger ones. The large office with its extravagant overhead is badly hit when income slumps or ceases; the smaller office, with lower charges, can continue to carry on. Moreover the large office is not likely to seek the small work on which the small office can still continue to make a meager living, for the training and experience necessary for designing, organizing, and superintending a large commercial building do not necessarily produce an efficient architect for a small house or for alterations in a tenement or shop.

During the depression, then, the small architectural office of one or two men has gained a new importance. And this fact may be more significant for future developments than it now appears. It is likely that in the years immediately ahead there will be little of that type of enormous work which alone justifies and makes necessary the "plan-factory" type of architectural office that was so characteristic of the boom years. Decentralization of industry is proceeding in many localities. May it not be that a similar decentralization of architectural practice will take place?

Even though the percentage rate of architects' fees on smaller work is greater than that on commercial and investment buildings, the total income from architectural practice in 1932 was at best less than a fifth of the income in 1928.

Behind these figures lie the poverty and the smashed hopes of a great part of the architectural profession. The drastic slash in income has had various effects. The architectural work of the country is largely done in offices employing from two to one hundred draftsmen, in addition to the necessary clerical and accounting force. The stenographers and clerks thrown out of work are merely added to the general mass of unemployed white-collar workers; some can, and do, find places in other fields. But the draftsmen—the "pencil pushers" who make by far the greater number of the actual working drawings and details of a modern building, the specification writers, and the superintendents of construction—face a hopeless and a cruel situation. They are highly trained specialists, most of them; they have given their lives to the profession. They have been accustomed to a high standard of living, to a weekly wage that varied from $35 for a junior just out of architectural school to $150 or even more for the more brilliant and experienced designer and executive. Six out of seven of them have lost their jobs.

Right here, perhaps, lies one explanation of the 9,700 new architects who appear on the Dodge Reports list for the depression years. The clever draftsman—the man with initiative and perhaps with connections—realized when he was fired that there was no more employment to be had in his field. But there were unimportant architectural jobs still—store alterations, little houses, modernizations, and so on, often too small to interest a large or prominent architectural firm. These he sought out, and sometimes obtained; and thus a new architect was added to the already overcrowded field.

Other draftsmen, disgusted with the result of a lifetime of effort in a chosen profession, have turned to other fields. Some have turned artists or interior decorators. One makes decorative maps. One, with a musical avocation, plays the piano for a radio circuit. Another is a taxi driver. And many have gone into commission selling—that last chaotic field which modern finance and industry have developed to absorb those technologically and otherwise unemployed—and hawk over the country everything from pencils to life insurance. Yet there remain countless more who have been unable to make these adjustments—men specially trained, sometimes brilliant, too long attached to the drafting board to fare easily or successfully in other fields. For them the outlook is desperate.

To this condition the architectural profession as a whole has been commendably alert. For, whatever their shilly-shallyings in other matters, architects have always been truly professional in cooperating for their common good. Always ready to help each other in normal times, in this emergency of unemployment, perhaps the worst that has ever overtaken a similar body of men, architects have done everything possible to ease the situation for unfortunate fellow-craftsmen.

Little material help could be expected from the American Institute of Architects, the central professional organization. It was always poor, and much of its limited capital was tied up for special purposes. Moreover, the emergency itself still further impoverished it through non-payment of dues. Financial aid had to be organized locally; the best the institute could hope to do was to assist cooperation between groups in various localities, act as a clearing house for information as to what was being done, and be on the watch in Washington to see that architects received their just share of any federal building program.

Various localities have done different things. A Boston group was the earliest to be organized; a New York group was formed in November, 1930. The New York organization is typical; other local organizations have often followed its example. It is called the Architects' Emergency Committee for the Region of New York, which includes, roughly, the region within a radius of fifty miles and was originally made up of one member from each of the architectural societies in the area and two representing the architectural press. The Architectural League gave it free office space, and it has one salaried employee, its executive secretary. All other clerical and office work is done by unemployed architects and paid for at the regular relief rates of $5 a day. Its money has come from personal and organization gifts; and much of it from a busy and imaginative Women's Auxiliary, which has raised substantial sums through fairs, expeditions to famous private houses, exhibitions, teas, and so on. Altogether some $100,000 has been raised.

The office expense has been low. The money has been mainly spent in the following ways: Prizes for monthly competitions open only to the unemployed; direct relief—only in the most urgent cases, and for small sums of from $25 to $100; emergency salaries—the usual $5 a day, three days a week, for men employed on "made work." Altogether, the committee has registered about 3,000 unemployed. It has found private employment for 522, in many cases of a non-architectural nature—chauffeur, tutoring, taking care of boys, and so on; it has cooperated closely with the Emergency Work Bureau (the Gibson Committee) and placed 663 men on their pay roll; and it has itself employed some 655. The "made work" done by these 1,300-odd men has been varied, often interesting, and much of it extremely valuable. They have worked on housing and traffic surveys for the State Housing Board. They have helped in the Columbia University Energy Survey of the United States. They have done research work and made drawings for articles in the architectural press. Some are making models of historic American buildings for museum use; and a staff is at work preparing measured drawings for a standard work on famous colonial houses, the proceeds of which will go to the committee. Some have even been employed in city departments, notably the Manhattan Bureau of Buildings and the Board of Standards and Appeals, to assist in repairing, rearranging, and checking valuable records.

All this is work of genuine public usefulness, and the committee deserves great credit for choosing its projects so wisely and for avoiding the real danger of having its men, who are paid at best a pittance, used for private gain. Yet, important as the work is, it has been possible to find employment only for slightly more than half of those registered. There are, moreover, in the committee's very achievements, necessary as they are, the seeds of future danger—the danger of the $5 wage, and of a kind of pauperizing of such social bodies as the boards of trade, colleges and universities, and housing boards, which have obtained this labor for nothing.

For three years this free labor has been available; the committee is only too glad to find places where it may "legitimately" be used. And three years is long enough to establish a habit. Even in private work the knowledge is getting about that trained draftsmen are being paid—by the architects' committee itself—$5 a day and $15 a week. A wealthy woman who wished some alterations in her house and applied to the committee was surprised and enraged to learn that she would have to pay more; that the $5 wage applied to emergency work only. And when architects become busy again, will they be able to forget that draftsmen existed on $15 a week? For the draftsman will be in no position to bargain for a long time to come, and the spirit of many is already broken.

Another interesting phase is worth consideration—the effect of the depression on architectural style and on professional standing. About the first it is difficult to generalize, but "playing safe" in design seems increasingly a phenomenon of the depression—witness the greater part of government work, especially in Washington. And where the work is consciously an innovation, as in the World's Fair buildings in Chicago, the style becomes often merely eccentric, extravagant, so entirely divorced from the great architectural problems of plan, material, use, and proportion as to be almost without architectural meaning. Now both of these developments—the joyless conservatism of, say, the Department of Commerce Building in Washington, and the mad and almost planless extravaganza of Chicago—are symptoms, at heart, of exhaustion and despair. They are both escape phenomena, flights from the realities of today. Out of neither can a living style develop. Is it far-fetched to find in the chaos of the depression, in the haunting and all-pervasive sense of insecurity and doubt, in the actual terror of destitution which these last three years have brought to the architects especially, at least a partial reason for this search for escape? Virginia Woolf, in "A Room of One's Own," was right—precious little great art has grown out of poverty and fear.

The other great effect of the depression on architects contains the only bright element in the situation. The depression has made many architects think with a new seriousness about their professional position and its relation to the whole sociological and economic present. During boom years, architects, particularly in the larger offices, became imbued with the psychology of their clients. All the Hooverian dogmas of individualism, salesmanship, profit-making, were swallowed unquestioningly. Architectural magazines were full of articles on the money-making side of the profession; the architect was often a promoter and a business man rather than a designer. As he became immersed in financial schemes and details, his professional position was weakened; the architect was merely one of several cogs in the machine of corporate and individual profit chasing. Then came the falling off in investment building between 1928 and 1929 and the stock-market crash; and one after another the great hotels and office buildings paraded into bankruptcy and foreclosure. The profit chasers sought other fields; the architect was forgotten. He learned bitterly of the gratitude of wealth, and all his grandiose promotion schemes vanished. Out of it all he found he had won only small pay, worry, and a loss of professional prestige.

In the enforced leisure of the depression, the architect has begun to think of the value of his training to society as a whole; he has begun to apply his creative talent to housing, to city planning, to the problems of social recreation. A vision is growing of the high destiny of the architectural profession; and after the fever of his plunge into high finance, the architect finds that vision healthy and sane. In many cases the architect is beginning to examine with a new interest and a new point of view the whole economic basis of life; he is beginning to realize how deeply the great dilemmas of poverty and wealth are implicated in his work. If, when he finds work again, he remembers the thoughts of these lean years, we may look forward to a profession of great influence, high standards, greater professional dignity, and a more noble purpose.

[This is the first of a series of articles on the effects of the depression in the various professions. In the next issue, Eunice Langdon will deal with the school teacher, and in the issue thereafter W. B. Thomas will discuss the plight of the university and college instructor. The Nation will be glad to receive letters from professional people or their families telling how they have met the depression thus far, and what they consider the prospects for the coming winter.]

Russia's Last Hard Year

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, July 12

WHEN all the world was struggling in the throes of capitalism's worst depression, the Soviet Union was experiencing the construction boom of the first Five-Year Plan. That was its period of inflation. Now the Western nations are flirting with inflation. Russia, in contradiction, is entering upon her deflationist stage. This means that new building projects are fewer, money is scarcer, prices are lower, goods are more plentiful, and individual prosperity is "just around the corner." 1933, according to the official version, will be the U. S. S. R.'s "last difficult year." I hope so.

The first half of 1933 was very difficult indeed. Many people simply did not have sufficient nourishment. The 1932 harvest was bad, and to make matters worse, thousands of tons of grain rotted in the fields because the peasants refused to reap what they knew the government would confiscate under the polite guise of "collections." These circumstances and the necessity of maintaining a large military reserve for any eventuality in the Far East reduced food reserves to an uncomfortable minimum. Human resistance to disease is consequently very low. Passportization, designed to relieve woeful congestion in the cities, achieved some results but served chiefly to add mental anguish to material distress.

It is an interesting commentary on Russian psychology and a tremendous tribute to the Communist Party's talents for organization that these trying conditions were not permitted to ruin the spring sowing. The Bolsheviks, thanks to their vast energy, strict discipline, and centralized control, accomplished the incredible when they marched the peasantry through a successful planting season. The abolition of collections and the introduction of the grain tax revived some of the village's drooping faith and facilitated the Kremlin's drive. Today, accordingly, harvest prospects seem to be extremely bright. And a good crop in Russia covers a multitude of past mistakes. The peasantry has learned a terrible lesson and is not likely to refuse in the near future to gather in the last sheaf of grain. The experience of 1932 has probably also contributed to the government's education. It cannot with impunity kill the peasant's initiative by taking too much of his yield.

Harvesting has already commenced in the Northern Caucasus, the Central Volga district, and Southern Ukraine.

In one collective in the Odessa district, according to a press report, the crop is so big that each member of the artel may receive no less than 18,000 pounds of grain for his year's work and for disposal as he sees fit. "But how is it possible to distribute so much among the peasants?" the Communist leaders of the collective asked, and decided that they would "persuade" the happy mujiks to show their devotion by "offering" the state more than it requires them to pay in taxes. This demonstration of excessive zeal, Pravda states, has been rigorously suppressed. Last year it would have been lauded as an example for all others to follow. Now the authorities insist that the collectivists retain everything over and beyond the single grain tax. Should their share be large, the members of the kolhoz will grow rich. Did not Stalin promise recently that "the collectivized peasants must soon become well-to-do"?

If village administrators afflicted with "childish leftism" do not antagonize the peasants, if the peasants get enough help from the cities for the harvesting of the crop, if the weather does not play some cruel pranks, if the lifting of the British embargo does not stimulate the export of too much butter, poultry, eggs, and so on—these are big ifs—the Soviet food problem may be solved in a month or two. This will constitute a long step towards the stabilization, at least, of the peasant problem. No such stabilization was possible earlier. During the first Five-Year Plan the Bolsheviks had to rob the village in order to feed the growing city which was not paying its way. If they had allowed the collectives to keep more of their grain they could not have exchanged it for manufactured commodities anyway; those commodities were not available—the emphasis of 1929-32 was on new factories and not on shirts and shoes. Today, however, the supply of city goods has taken a sharp leap upwards. The investment of the first Piatiletka is beginning to yield dividends. This is the most striking change of the last six months. The trickle of consumers' goods which I noticed in Ukrainian villages in October, 1932, has now become a sizable stream. In Moscow, to a lesser extent in other cities, but to a considerable degree in rural districts, one can buy without any rationing or cards or special "pull," beds, other furniture, soap, underwear, shoes, cotton goods, stockings, thread, buttons, bottles, china ware, cooking utensils, and many other household articles. Their quality, needless to say, is bad, but a year ago they could scarcely be obtained at all.

This favorable development has ■■ adverse side. The new manufactured commodities go to those who can pay the high prices. Since ordinary cooperative stores are poorly stocked and good closed-factory cooperatives are few in number, those citizens who have gold or foreign currency or many rubles can buy most of what they need, and those not so fortunate do without. But this is not exactly socialism. When the pressing scarcity of necessities shall have been eliminated, the Bolsheviks will still be faced with the problem of devising ■ more equitable system of distribution. It is distribution, more even than production, that determines the character of a society.

Meanwhile, socialist industry is making great strides. In 1924, there were 24,000 automobiles and trucks in all of the Soviet Union. During the first six months of 1933, the Amo factory in Moscow, the new Nizhni Novgorod plant, and the Yaroslav plant for five-ton trucks together produced 21,101 passenger machines and trucks. In addition, Kharkov, Stalingrad, and Cheliabinsk turned out 33,031 tractors. The output of coal, steel, pig iron, agricultural combines, synthetic rubber, chemicals, and of dozens of machines not previously made in Russia has risen to unprecedented heights, although Magnitogorsk, the most gigantic "giant" of the Five-Year Plan, is not yet operating smoothly, and other big units are still suffering from "infantile diseases." Questions of quality and cost of production continue to worry the Kremlin, and the shortage of skilled labor has not been alleviated by deflation or passportization. Despite the drop in big-scale construction, many factories, railroads, homes, and roads are being built, and the use of youthful, unskilled peasants at tasks which I have observed, the difficulty of finding workers to put finishing touches on our new apartment, ■■ well as intensive inquiries among my friends and acquaintances, lead me to the conclusion that recent economic changes have not resulted in any unemployment. A person who wants ■ job can get it even in overcrowded Moscow, and certainly in the provinces.

With very little ado and practically no press comment, an edict has merged the Commissariat of Labor into the All-Soviet Trade Unions, so that control of the many-billion-ruble social-insurance fund, the sanatoria, rest homes, all workers' medical services, and the protection of labor passes from the hands of the government to the trade unions. Thus, formally at least, the process by which, under socialism, the state dies a slow death through attrition has advanced another step. Back in 1920, Trotsky advocated a reverse development: the suppression of the unions and the organization of official labor battalions. Nevertheless, as usual, some foreign observers have styled the recent Soviet decree a "Trotskyist move." Professional anti-Trotskyists, on the other hand, viewing the 1920 Lenin-Trotsky trade-union controversy in the new light of Italian and German fascism, find ideological points of contact between the Duce, Hitler, and the sage of Prinkipo. While these salon polemics rage, we shall wait to see whether the latest change which gives the unions broader functions also gives them greater independence.

Akulov, an old Bolshevik and former associate of Lenin, has been appointed Attorney-General of the Soviet Union. This is a new office. Previously, the separate Soviet republics had procurators but the federal government did not. The attorney-general has been granted very wide prerogatives. He is to be responsible for the observance of laws, decrees, and the constitution by Soviet departments; he is to see that Soviet courts apply the law correctly and uniformly. He may enter a protest against any legal sentence and stop its execution. But the most surprising of Akulov's functions is his right to watch over the activities of the G. P. U. One of the attorney-general's duties is "the supervision . . . of the legality and regularity of the G. P. U.'s acts." Two years ago, Akulov was appointed vice-president of the G. P. U. As such he actually superseded Yagoda, the active head of that organization, and became the chief of the institution. Apparently, however, friction developed between him and the permanent officials, and before long the newcomer with ■ penchant for reform was removed and sent to ■ rather inferior post in the Donetz coal basin. In this light, Akulov's promotion and his new relationship vis-a-vis the G. P. U. take on special significance. They would seem to reflect a desire on the part of those responsible for the appointment to have a more direct check on the work of the G. P. U., and perhaps, also, to modify its psychology.

Somebody said to me the other day: "Stalin is like a mountain with ■ head on it. He cannot be moved. But he thinks." His power and influence are greater now than ever, which is saying ■ great deal. He inspires the party with his will power and calm. Individuals in contact with him admire his capacity to listen and his skill in improving on the suggestions and drafts of highly intelligent subordinates. There is no doubt that his determination and wisdom have been important assets in the struggles of the last few years. But this in no way justifies the daily reams of Oriental praise which the press and Soviet organizations lavish on him. Though it seemed scarcely possible, that adulation has grown even more sentimental and saccharine in the past year.

Strange as it may seem to one arriving in Moscow from the Western world, the Bolsheviks are still obsessed by the fear of imminent war on the Soviet Union. Sometimes I suspect that the agitation about intervention is either for home, or for foreign Communist, consumption. And yet I know that any number of important Bolsheviks sincerely believe the bourgeois states are preparing to invade the U. S. S. R. in the near future. Such thoughts, I am persuaded, are unrealistic. War in Eurasia, to be sure, is a daily possibility. Nor can one easily overestimate the anti-Soviet wishes of the German, British, Japanese, and other governments. Nevertheless, there is considerable guaranty of peace in the new and selfish friendship of Poland and France for Moscow and in Japan's preoccupation in China. I am disposed to think that the direction of Nipponese expansion will be southward toward the Yangtze rather than north and east into Siberia or Outer Mongolia. Of course, this may change any day, and one cannot, therefore, criticize the Kremlin for maintaining a tremendous military establishment in the Soviet east. I see no immediate war danger, however, and I believe the Bolsheviks should not allow themselves to live in eternal dread of foreign aggression. It is bad for the nerves and it distorts policy.

The very marked improvement of Russia's relations with Paris and Warsaw should have a sobering effect on Japan. Litvinov has become a collector of pacts, and some of them are not mere scraps of paper, for they register real changes of feeling in bourgeois countries and in Moscow too. His latest convention with the Soviets' eight neighbors, significantly including Rumania, and with the other two states of the Little Entente, gives the world its first concrete and documented definition of an aggressor and should make the foreign commissar a powerful contender for the Nobel Peace Prize. I should not be surprised if he got it and accepted it. Like Karl Radek's visit to Warsaw on the invitation of the editor of Pilsudski's party organ and like Litvinov's stay in Paris as guest of the French government, the conferring of such a prize would proclaim to all that the new era of peaceful coexistence between the capitalist and communist systems has become an established international fact which bodes no ill for the bourgeoisie.

The Random Satire of George S. Kaufman

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

DURING a period of fifteen years George S. Kaufman, the most indefatigable collaborator of our theater, has had a hand in more than twenty plays—from "Someone in the House," which he wrote with Jacques Duval in 1918, to "Dinner at Eight," which he and Miss Edna Ferber started on its triumphal career last fall. "Dulcy," the first of his outstanding successes, was written with Marc Connelly in 1921 and with Mr. Connelly he has since worked on other plays, but the list of his collaborators is almost as long as the list of his plays and it includes, besides those already mentioned, Ring Lardner, Moss Hart, Alexander Woollcott, and Morrie Ryskind.

Even more striking than this persistent habit of collaboration is the fact that his fellow-worker often seems to set the tone of the piece. Thus "Beggars on Horseback," that delightful dream play of the composer who almost married into Big Business, is obviously dominated by the delicate fantasy of Marc Connelly. On the other hand the tone of "The Royal Family" and "Dinner at Eight" clearly results from the bravura touch of Miss Ferber, while "The Channel Road" is equally clearly the product of Mr. Woollcott's reminiscent sentiment.

Indeed, it is sometimes possible to separate out certain passages in some of the plays which seem to belong so wholly to the collaborator that Mr. Kaufman can have had little or nothing to do with the writing of them. Thus there can be, for example, little doubt that the fine prologue to "June Moon" belongs almost exclusively to Mr. Lardner whose flare for the grotesqueries of the urban clodhopper is evident in almost every speech. Only he could have written the curtain line which makes the embryo song writer say to the girl whom he has picked up on the train and invited to dinner, "Well I guess we can spare sixty cents apiece." Only he could have opened up the depths into which he invites us to peer when this same song writer remarks, "You don't need to be scared of me, girlie, I treat all women like they was my sister. Till I find out different." And only he could have written a passage like the following from the same scene:

And he said a man like I with the song-writing gift was a sucker not to go to New York, because that's where they have a Mecca for a man if you got the song-writing gift. So he give me a letter to the Friars Club, asking them to give me a two weeks card, they call it. The Friars Club is where they have the Mecca for song writers.

Under the circumstances it might seem that Mr. Kaufman had hardly earned the right to be considered an independent dramatist. He has, I believe, written only one play by himself and, if a biological metaphor be permitted, it appears that his own characteristics are "recessive" rather than "dominant." Yet the fact remains that no name carries more respect in theatrical circles than his and that he is, as a matter of fact, far better known as a dramatist than some of those with whom he has worked. His collaboration is believed to spell success and this fact is, no doubt, due in part to his skill in handling the conventional machinery of dramatic construction. Yet it would be a mistake to suppose that he contributes nothing else or that his writing has no character of its own. Nearly every play upon which he has worked is studded with passages obviously his and they are all characterized by the same quality—namely a sparkling wit of a peculiarly local kind.

This wit is not, like that of S. N. Behrman, essentially literary and timeless. Neither is it, like the wit of Mr. Lardner, the result of an imaginative penetration into the psychology of a stratum of humanity definitely below his own. It is, on the contrary, always the comment of Mr. Kaufman himself upon some event in the play or some happening in the passing show of the moment. Most of his best lines might easily be transplanted from one play to another. Many of them have nothing except their unusual felicity to distinguish them from countless other lines of similar sort and one often recognizes them as his, not because they are different from, but simply because they are better than, those written by various other contributors to the current stage. Essentially they are what we have learned to call "wisecracks" and Mr. Kaufman is essentially the best wisecracker that Broadway has produced—the acknowledged master of its phraseology and attitude.

Drawing by Georges Schreiber

George S. Kaufman

Long before the theater had ever heard of him, Mr. Kaufman was a newspaper columnist—first on the Washington Times and then on the New York Mail (1914-15). Then he passed on to the dramatic departments, first of the New York Tribune, then of the Times, and doubtless it was thus that he made the transition from journalism to the stage. But the significant fact is that he has remained essentially the "columnist"—one, that is to say, whose chief business it is to make brief random comments upon a thousand things. Members of the columnist's profession are not required to develop a philosophy or to have anything independent to say. They are supposed to sparkle a dozen times a day, not to throw the steady light of sustained criticism upon life or society as a whole, and it is the exception when one is found who has developed a consistent point of view. Certainly Mr. Kaufman, for all his brilliance, has not. He has said a hundred witty things; he is certainly on the side of good sense; yet it would be very difficult after reading his twenty-odd plays to say that they tend in any direction. One knows what Mr. Lardner or Mr. Behrman stands for. The quality of each is as definite almost as the quality of Eugene O'Neill. But in the case of Mr. Kaufman one cannot be sure of anything—except that one is almost certain to be amused.

Open almost any one of his plays at random and you are pretty sure to run across something like the following bit of dialogue from "Dulcy," which I quote, not because it is better than dozens of others, but because it is typical and especially because, having been timely when it was written during the depression of 1921, it has come around to being timely again. Gordon, a pompous business man, is greeting a flippant gentleman who happens to be called Bill but might very well be called George S. Kaufman instead:

GORDON: I say, how's business?

BILL: Haven't you heard?

GORDON (a bit cheery): Oh, I don't know. I have an idea it may pick up presently.

BILL: You've been reading Mr. Schwab. "Steel Man Sees Era of Profits."

GORDON: Well—I think he's right at that.

BILL: Yes. . . . Rockefeller expects to break even this year, too.

GORDON: Just the same I look for improvement. (Earnestly) Bill, if it could just be arranged that all the outstanding accounts could be absorbed by the banks, and then turn those accounts into payable—

BILL: I know. You mean—things would be better if we weren't all broke.

That is George Kaufman at his most typical.

Reviewers commonly greet Mr. Kaufman's plays with understandable enthusiasm. Occasionally, however, they temper their praise by complaining of a certain lack of substance. The play, they say, too often goes out like a spent sky-rocket, leaving nothing behind except the memory of an all too brief, not too significant splendor. Nor can there be any doubt that the complaint is well founded or that—especially in those plays where the general scheme has not obviously been contributed by a coauthor—the plot is both thin and conventional. Consider, for example, four of his most characteristic and successful pieces: "To the Ladies" (1922);

"The Butter and Egg Man" (1925); "June Moon" (1929); and "Once in a Lifetime" (1930). Such plot as each has is simply a variant of the same perversion of the Cinderella story. In each, that is to say, the hero is a grossly incompetent boob of one sort or another, and in each case he blunders into a not very credible success. In the first—and to my mind most wholly unconvincing—he is a small clerk whose clever wife helps him to make an impression on the boss. In the second he is an incredibly naive youth from the provinces who makes a miraculous hit as a theatrical "angel" despite all the wise guys preparing to fleece him; in the third, he is a simple-minded vulgarian who writes a song hit; in the fourth, he is a second-rate vaudeville actor who sells himself so successfully to the bewildered magnates of the new talking films that they make him a director only to discover that the film he has turned out is so bad that the critics all hail it as the work of a new and masterly technician. His passion for eating nuts has resulted in a constant tattoo accompanying the dialogue and his forgetfulness about ordering the lights to be turned on has had the natural result of enveloping many important scenes in an all but impenetrable obscurity. Nevertheless—while in full flight from the scene—he discovers from the reviews that all is well. The cracking of the nuts is interpreted as a technical invention comparable to the drum in "The Emperor Jones" and in the words of one reviewer: "The lighting of the picture is superb. Dr. Lewis has wisely seen the value of leaving the climaxes to the imagination of the audience. In the big scenes almost nothing is visible."

Despite the rather silly extravagance of such an incident as this and despite the plain sentimentality mixed in with "The Butter and Egg Man" and "To the Ladies," all these plays are rich with stretches of dialogue and touches of characterization which are amazingly shrewd and telling. Mr. Kaufman's comments are, in other words, on an entirely different level from that of the action itself and he displays in them an intelligence which the main outline would certainly offend if he considered that outline as more than a necessary evil. He can write a satire called "The Tangled Wildwood," of the John Golden-Winchell Smith school of popular drama, but he can descend to the same level himself, and in either "June Moon" or "The Butter and Egg Man" produce something which is perilously close to a simple-minded success story of the same sort.

The conventional explanation for this phenomenon is that Mr. Kaufman knows the weakness of the popular taste and has not had any scruples about giving his audience the sop it demands. Once when he was asked why he did not consistently write satire instead of mere popular entertainment with a satiric flavor, he is said to have replied: "Satire is what closes Saturday night." The remark is first-rate Broadway and has been accepted as a genuine explanation but I venture to say that it is not, at best, more than a witty rationalization. Mr. Kaufman does not write consistent satire chiefly because he has never taken the trouble to consider just what such satire would be.

Short flights of wit and shrewd touches of character are not enough to make a play. It has to be held together by a plot and a plot must tend somewhere. But Mr. Kaufman, being primarily a wit, does not know how to make a plot or even, perhaps, in just what direction he would want it to tend even if he could make one. Famous for his conversation, he is the author of half of the obiter dicta and bits of repartee quoted on Broadway. But his forte is what is known in the language of the moment as "a good comeback" and the good comeback is something arising out of the moment for the moment. It implies, perhaps, a philosophy in solution, but it does not imply a consistently formulated attitude and it is quite compatible with a complete inability to expand any further the criticism which it suggests. Mr. Kaufman, therefore, must borrow his plots, and he naturally borrows those which are nearest to hand. He gives his plays a conventionally sentimental ending because that is the way these plots have always ended before, and also, perhaps, because he has never explored his own mind thoroughly enough to know what sort of ending would actually be consistent with the tone which the dialogue consistently implies.

Eight years ago Montrose Moses wrote in "The American Dramatist": "The flare of George Kaufman and Marc Connelly in 'Dulcy' and 'To the Ladies' has almost a Gilbertian value to it. They could give us an American libretto as fresh as 'Patience' and 'The Mikado'." This prophecy was fulfilled when Kaufman and Ryskind wrote "Of Thee I Sing"—certainly the best satiric extravaganza of its kind ever written here. Unfortunately, however, there is no convincing proof that Mr. Kaufman is determined to realize the potentialities suggested by his best work or that he is other than satisfied with the popular and financial success which comes to him so easily. His latest work, "Dinner at Eight," obviously belongs in its general conception to Miss Ferber.

Certainly nothing in its romantically melodramatic thesis bears any relation to the mocking spirit of his wit, and Mr. Kaufman's hand is apparent chiefly in a few epigrams which here and there brighten the scenes without having any organic relation to the whole.

Mr. Kaufman is forty-four years old and the discouraging thing is that the twelve years since "Dulcy" have seen little if any development in the direction one would like to see him take. He has learned, perhaps, how to adapt himself to the requirements of almost any style which his collaborator chooses to adopt and there has certainly been no diminution in the brightness of his lines. But there has been no tendency for his wit to evolve into a philosophy or for his satire to be other than a succession of potshots which bring down a good deal of miscellaneous game but continue to give the impression that they are too random to be very effective. The plays are fun for him and fun for his audience. They pay such large returns in money and popularity that it is, perhaps, too much to ask that he should run the risk of writing something which "closes Saturday night." Yet one cannot but fear that if he does not begin to take the risk the final result will be several scores of plays of which history will be able to say no more than that they show how a talent wasted itself in doing things which it found all too easy to do.

[This is the second of a series of four articles on American dramatists. The third will appear soon.]

Refugees from Oppression

By ROSIKA SCHWIMMER

AS a child I was once an unwilling witness of a horrible spectacle in the corridor of the inspector's house on my father's estate. Some peasant boys threw kerosene over a mouse in a trap and set a match to it as they opened the trap. The wretched creature scurried around in the closed corridor, insane with pain. That vile picture is haunting me again when I think of the hundreds of thousands of Germans—Jews, pacifists, liberals, Socialists, and Communists—trapped and kerosened by a Neroesque pervert who has usurped the power in a civilized land.

Of all the cruelties which sections of human society have inflicted on other sections the present German outrage seems the most intolerable. Unspeakable as it is, however, we must not forget that it has had its counterparts all through history. We are more excited about it because it crashed down on us when the world was so overburdened with trouble that it seemed impossible to endure any more. What we face now is Hitler's cold-blooded elaboration on the technique employed against non-conformists in the past by powerful religious, social, political, and economic bigots.

The world-wide demonstrations of sorrow and protest against Hitlerism have been directed chiefly at its anti-Semitic manifestations, and the far more numerous non-Jewish victims have not received their share of sympathy. International relief, too, has been chiefly planned to ease the ghastly situation of the Jews, little organized attempt having been made as yet to assist those persecuted for political rather than racial reasons. To the outstanding individuals in their ranks help has been offered from official and private sources, but the tens of thousands of obscure sufferers are as neglected as the victims of other post-war dictatorships—the Russian, the Hungarian, the Italian, or the Latin American.

The acute suffering of the German victims throws a sharp light on a chronic international problem that cannot be ignored any longer. Present-day dictatorships, following the ancient custom of dealing with non-conformists, have sent hundreds of thousands of persons begging for shelter in foreign countries, at a time when no country can afford to be as hospitable as humane considerations would require. Other hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children, of many nationalities, were deprived of their citizenship rights in the country of their birth and ancestry by the World War. Still others, also numbering hundreds of thousands, lost their citizenship through the technical intricacies of the treaties which defamed the word peace. At the same time, national problems, the political and economic consequences of the World War, became so engrossing that people lost sight of the crushing burdens the exiled groups and individuals had to carry. Nationalism reached the point of insanity in many countries, and the stateless, fleeing for life, were regarded as a human pest wherever they turned up.

The problem of the stateless has been summarized in a pamphlet by Mrs. Anna Aszkanazy of Vienna, an indefatigable worker for world citizenship. She says:

To be stateless means death by starvation, for the stateless cannot secure work anywhere without permission of the authorities. The authorities rarely grant this permission on the ground that hundreds of thousands of their own subjects are without work. Nor can the stateless enjoy the government institutions for the unemployed. He has no consular protection anywhere. He cannot get a passport or visa, and on the other hand he may be expelled from a country at any time without reason.

Various futile attempts have been made to give to people without nationality a legal status, as the first requirement to enable these unfortunates to live a normal life. In 1922 a Congress of the Succession States (formerly the component parts of Austria-Hungary) was called at Rome to solve the question of the stateless. The League of Nations Union has held conferences, drawn resolutions, urged the League of Nations to act. The International Law Association, the Harvard Law School, the French and the German League for Human Rights, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the Quakers, and many other organizations have exerted themselves—all in vain. The League of Nations, satisfied with its Nansen committee, initiated by the great humanitarian scientist for the protection of Armenian and Russian political refugees, remained cold to every proposal going beyond the Nansen proteges. A disinterested worker referring to the League wrote in a report:

While they work for the Nansen proteges, they do not want to have anything to do with the political émigrés. As far as I could observe in Geneva, the League people are mostly of a reactionary mind and the political émigrés are for the greater part liberals and Socialists. The standpoint of the League of Nations is therefore easily to be understood.

It has been authoritatively stated that even timid attempts on the part of the League to deal with the question of broadening the scope of the Nansen passport have been opposed by Italy, Hungary, and Rumania. Equally sterile were the efforts made at the first Conference for the Codification of International Law held at The Hague in 1930.

Since Hitler's accession to power, organizations interested in world citizenship have renewed their efforts, but meanwhile the question has become more complicated. Conditions in Germany have aggravated an intolerable situation, not only by making hundreds of thousands of new victims, but also in another respect. It is at this point that the problem of the stateless merges in a larger general problem. There are very serious and growing indications that even the most civilized countries may not be safe against fascist outbreaks within their own boundaries. Denmark and Sweden have Socialist governments; Norway has a liberal, Holland a decent conservative regime. In all these countries we hear that reactionary parties may seize the power at the next elections if economic conditions do not improve. And in chorus the friends of civilization and reason ask desperately: "How can we improve conditions, how can we provide work for the unemployed millions?" In Austria, in Switzerland, in the Balkan countries, the same despair, the same dread. Chaos impends, with untold added suffering ahead of us, unless the situation is met internationally, radically, and at once.

The millions of stateless people deprived of their most elementary rights need a legal status. Hitherto the chief obstacle has been that countries which would receive them could not provide economic security. But now the safety of those countries themselves depends on their ability to provide work and wages for their own population. That requires international economic planning, and its accomplishment will automatically solve the economic problem of the stateless. It will permit all human beings to consider the world their home again, wherever they may choose to settle.

In the Driftway

SOMEWHERE lately the Drifter found among those newspaper fillers that crop up on newsless Monday mornings an item from some Middle Western State which told how many millions of dollars are willed away each year by persons who have nothing, and named the sum of public money which has to be spent in executing these bequests and discovering their worthlessness. No doubt the story could be duplicated in every State in the Union, and every country in the world. Making a will is one of the simplest and most satisfying of all gestures. It costs nothing—a hobo in a box-car can write one provided he can find a scrap of paper, a pencil, and a smooth rail bed; it provides the opportunity for a last word, for a final assertion of power over life before death closes in; and the state cannot prosecute a dead man even if he gives away money he does not own. Will-making, in fact, is a pursuit which the penniless man will find even pleasanter than the rich. The rich man very likely has worked hard for his millions; to give them away is painful and to that pain must be added the responsibility of distributing his money wisely among people who will use it intelligently. To be sure, he can cut off with a dollar and some scathing remarks any relative he dislikes, and that is something. But for him, making a will is anything but a carefree, happy exercise.

* * * * *

THE poor man, a drifter, for instance, suffers no such limitations. He may have worked even harder than the rich man, but it causes him no pain to make a will, and he need not worry for fear the money will be used unwisely. Being completely disinterested, he can be creative, and his will is much more likely to be an expression of his essential self, which remains the dearest privilege of human beings. Again, his imagination is unstultified by figures in a bank book or the records of a corporation. He can afford to be more generous than the richest man in the world, and he can be sure that his gifts will never quench a young ambition, disfigure a public square, or cause a legal battle to be waged from one year's end to the other.

* * * * *

THE stipulations in a poor man's will seldom cause trouble. Those in the wills of rich men and women almost always cause trouble, and often turn what was a magnificent gesture into a ridiculous example of human fallibility. The Drifter is thinking particularly of a bequest of some $50,000 which some kind lady made to the Art Institute in Chicago early in the present century. The will stipulated that the income from the $50,000 should be used to build and maintain drinking fountains for horses. Such is the human faith in permanence that it had never crossed the lady's mind that horses, any more than skilled workers, would presently be discarded. But the horse as a form of motive power began slipping soon after the lady died. What was even more disturbing, as the need for horse troughs receded, the capital and income of the bequest, through wise investment, increased at a speed which would have appeared unseemly to both kind ladies and horses in the carriage days. By 1929 the $50,000 had become a quarter of a million and Chicago had reached the saturation point for drinking fountains for horses. Meanwhile the Art Institute was pressed for funds with which to increase its collection. Conceivably, ingenious interpretation of the will might have allowed the purchase of pictures of horses by Rosa Bonheur, but it could scarcely be stretched to include still lifes by Picasso. This particular will has at last been broken, after several attempts, and the institute is free to use the money for other purposes, if it has any left after the crash of 1929 and the legal battles since. The public cost of executing worthless wills may be clear waste. But it is infinitesimal compared with the public cost of litigation over rich men's wills, and perhaps the joy of the populace in writing their last testaments is worth the price—one of those minor circuses that our rulers could abolish only at their own peril.

THE DRIFTER

Finance

Taking the Rock Island Investors for a Ride

ALL that has happened to date in the eight-weeks-old bankruptcy of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway has emitted the familiar dank odor of banking exploitation of a bankruptcy reorganization which Max Lowenthal reproduced so impressively in his study of the St. Paul receivership. How the interests of bondholders fare in the present setting of another Wall Street coup d'état will provide a real test of the safeguards for railroad security holders set forth in the amendment to the bankruptcy act passed early this year.

When the $550,000,000 Rock Island road passed into bankruptcy on June 7, the direct reason for insolvency was the road's inability to raise $2,259,000 to meet its semi-annual interest requirements. This deficiency occurred despite the fact that the road's net profits, after payment of all interest, amounted to $57,000,000 during the five years ended with 1930, that it had raised $30,000,000 in new funds in 1930, and had obtained loans of $13,700,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the subsequent years. With all these large additions to the road's resources, losses of $10,300,000 in 1931 and 1932 were sufficient to exhaust its liquid funds.

The receivership placed in jeopardy a total funded debt with a face value of $313,000,000. Of this, equipment obligations of $34,000,000, the underlying general mortgage 4 per cent bonds amounting to $61,500,000, and similar securities of about $20,000,000 are in a preferred position to pass unscathed through reorganization. Here an interesting point arises. The largest of the Rock Island bond issues is the $104,470,000 first and refunding mortgage 4 per cent bonds, certainly a name to roll impressively on the tongue of the average investor seeking a gilt-edged security. Furthermore, there has clearly been nothing to indicate to the average purchaser, unversed in financial matters, that these bonds, which fall due in April, 1934, are of inferior value to the general mortgage 4's. Yet the general mortgage bonds are backed principally by a first lien on 3,130 miles of road while the first and refunding mortgage bonds have a direct first lien on only 753 miles and a first lien through pledge of capital stock or first mortgage bonds on 537 miles. In addition, the issue has a second lien on 4,482 miles, has a lien on 1,090 miles of leasehold interests and trackage rights, and is secured by deposit of securities with a face value of $96,739,050. However, the real relative values are shown by the current selling price of about 32 for the first and refunding bonds compared with 67 for the general mortgage bonds. Although probably legal, certainly a delusion is successfully effected in selling a security under the paraphernalia of a name indicating a first mortgage which in reality is a secondary lien. As late as January 1931, the first and refunding bonds sold at 99½. In a similar situation are the $40,000,000 secured 4½ per cent bonds while, at the bottom of the Rock Island debt structure, are the $32,000,000 convertible 4½ per cent bonds which are unsecured by any mortgage. These last three bond issues, with a total par value of $176,000,000, descended to a market valuation of $29,000,000 in 1933.

In the face of these obvious testimonials to the financial bungling of the Rock Island management, the road's bankruptcy was barely one month old before machinery was openly under way for a reorganization designed without question to perpetuate the present management and stock control of the road as well as its past banking affiliations. On July 7 the venerable Charles Hayden, holder of seventy-nine directorships in addition to his posts as chairman of the board and chairman of the finance committee of the Rock Island, and veteran of as many operations as his fellow-surgeon, old "Doctor Kuhn, Loeb," announced that pursuant to a resolution of the directors his own firm of Hayden, Stone, and Company, together with the Chase National Bank and Dillon, Read, and Company had "agreed" to serve as joint readjustment managers in the Rock Island reorganization.

The record of the Hayden regime should be enough in itself to arouse skepticism on the part of Rock Island bondholders as to Hayden's preemptive qualifications for conducting the reorganization. But of more direct application to the bondholders' interests is the fact that Hayden and his colleagues while assuming the role of impartial negotiators between the various classes of Rock Island securities, are predominantly and personally interested in the common stock of the road. The Chase, through a nominee, and Hayden, Stone are the second and third largest stockholders, respectively. Dillon, Read has a large indirect interest in the stock through an investment trust under its sponsorship. The Chase also is the largest banking creditor of the Rock Island. The largest stockholder—the St. Louis-San Francisco Railway, also bankrupt—has always worked in closest cooperation with the Hayden regime. Hayden's reorganization group, together with its friendly allies in the 'Frisco, control roughly 40 per cent of the total common stock of the Rock Island.

If any real meaning attaches to the term "bond" as applied to railroad securities sold to investors seeking a safe and secure income in return for purchasing low-interest-bearing issues, then these "bonds" by any standards of financial justice should have full priority at the expense of the capital stock when insolvency necessitates a reorganization. But a direct inkling of how the Hayden group, with its affiliations and pocketbooks bound up in the common stock, would probably like to mete out justice to the Rock Island bondholders is presented by the plan of reorganization for the St. Louis-San Francisco recently propounded by Hayden's confrère, Edward N. Brown, chairman of the 'Frisco and also chairman of the executive committee of the Rock Island. Under this plan, the reorganization would take the form of a moratorium on the road's funded debt and obligations to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with no assessment or contribution by the stockholders and with a preferred position for the road's banking creditors. There would be no reduction in the interest and principal requirements responsible for the present bankruptcy, and no readjustment worthy of the name other than a renewed prayer that revenues will increase sufficiently to countenance a debt and capital structure which recent years have shown to be unsound.

The significance of this plan to the Rock Island bondholders is enhanced by the fact that the Hayden readjustment managers have already approached the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with a proposal that their plan of reorganization embodies a consolidation of the Rock Island with the 'Frisco. Rock Island bondholders would be entitled to apprehensive shivers at these familiar signs of interested insiders seizing control of the reorganization. However, stumbling blocks have already appeared which may interfere with a clear road to success for Hayden and his confrères. Their acceptance of the reorganization managership was followed within three days by the announcement of protective committees for the principal bond issues under the sponsorship of insurance companies and banks holding large interests in these securities. While the experience of the past has been that protective committees are all too often stalking horses, protective only of the interests of the banking reorganizers (as in the case of the St. Paul), the pecuniary interests of the institutional bondholders in this instance should strengthen the position of the public bondholders.

But the most vital potential safeguard inheres in the attitude the Interstate Commerce Commission can take towards a reorganization proposal by Hayden's group. Under the terms of the new bankruptcy amendment, the commission must approve any reorganization plan before it is confirmed by the court and, under certain conditions, is empowered to write its own plan of reorganization. In the light of these new powers, considerable significance attaches to the commission's opinion on the Rock Island and 'Frisco directors handed down last August in connection with its investigation of the deals whereby Edward N. Brown, without authority from the directors, committed the Rock Island to a purchase of 25,000 shares of 'Frisco for $1,752,572 and the 'Frisco to a purchase of 25,000 shares of Gulf, Mobile, and Northern for $965,340. The commission cited these transactions as indicative of "the easy manner in which the boards of directors of these railroads bore their responsibilities," and declared that "stockholders have a right to expect competent conduct of corporate affairs. Directors who merely ratify without investigating large transactions engaged in on their behalf without their knowledge, are likely to disappoint such an expectation." Furthermore, in the St. Paul receivership, Commissioner Joseph B. Eastman, now federal coordinator of railroads in addition to his post on the commission, remarked: "The reorganization managers should be wholly impartial and neutral, not affiliated with any group of security holders nor with any particular group of bankers."

In the light of these statements, the manner in which the Rock Island reorganization is worked out should demonstrate conclusively to security holders how much they can expect from the new deal in railroad bankruptcies. The contest will be a sharp one. The Rock Island readjustment managers are old hands at the game. Hayden himself is a veteran of the 1915-1917 bankruptcy of the road. But the Interstate Commerce Commission now has ample power to dictate a plan which will be in the true public interest and which will break the sordid succession of past reorganizations written for the enrichment of the reorganizers, and for the perpetuation and protection of the vested banking and management interests at the expense of innocent investors. The Rock Island bondholders, as well as the general public, have a right to expect that the commission will have the inclination to exercise this power.

PETER HELMOOP NOYES

Contributors to This Issue

HENRY GOLDEY is a member of the New York bar and a student of political economy.

TALBOT FAULKNER HAMLIN, a practicing architect and member of the American Institute of Architects, is the author of "The American Spirit in Architecture" and "The Enjoyment of Architecture."

LOUIS FISCHER, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, is the author of "Machines and Men in Russia" and "The Soviets in World Affairs."

ROSIKA SCHWIMMER has been a political refugee from Hungary since 1920 because of her uncompromising pacifism.

CONRAD AIKEN was awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1930 for his "Selected Poems."

HORACE GREGORY is an American poet whose most recent work is a volume of verse entitled "No Retreat."

S. K. RATCLIFFE, British publicist and lecturer, is a regular contributor to the London Spectator.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is the author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

ABRAM L. HARRIS, professor of economics at Howard University, is coauthor with Sterling Spero of "The Black Worker."

BROADUS MITCHELL is associate professor of political economy at Johns Hopkins University.

Why is it that all our first six Presidents were men of exceptional ability and only four of the next twenty-two?

THE PEOPLE'S CHOICE

HERBERT AGAR

A new and liberal interpretation of American history through the lives of our Presidents. The author shows that three forms of democracy have existed in America, of which the worst has triumphed. The result has left us today with the choice between political anarchy and a planned society.

"The People's Choice" is an example of history as it should be written: witty, dramatic, authentic, and of practical value in dealing with today's news.

Illustrated, $3.50

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

Books

Prelude

By CONRAD AIKEN

The miracle said "I" and then was still, lost in the wing-bright sphere of his own wonder:
as if the river paused to say a river,
or thunder to self said thunder.

As once the voice had spoken, now the mind uttered itself, and gave itself a name;
and in the instant all was changed, the world two separate worlds became—

The indivisible unalterably divided;
the rock forever sundered from the eye;
henceforth the lonely self, by self anointed, hostile to earth and sky.

Alas, good angel, loneliest of heroes!
pity your coward grandsons who become afraid of loneliness, and long for rock as children long for home.

On American Literature

American Literature: An Introduction. By Carl Van Doren.
United States Library Association. 25 cents.

THIS little volume, barely ninety pages long, might well serve as a model of its kind. Probably no other scholar knows American literature as a whole so thoroughly as Mr. Van Doren does, and no other, therefore, would dare to be as brief as he is. Behind every generalization one feels the authority of an immense, detailed knowledge; behind every specific fact, the exercise of a judgment which has selected that fact, not because it is the one which has come to mind, but because, out of a thousand, it is the fact most significant for the understanding of a man, a book, or a tendency. In its brevity the booklet is an essay, but to call it such would be to carry the term far away from its original significance. There is nothing tentative, experimental, or merely suggestive about these ninety pages. What they contain is neither an impression nor a summary. It is a distillation.

Mr. Van Doren's extensive view sweeps over everything from the first writing done on this continent down to the literature of today. He divides the vast field into five sections called—in accordance with the nature of the influence dominant in each—Colonial, National, Continental, Imperial, and Critical. Yet he actually treats only slightly more than a score of individual writers because, as he says, "In literature the first writers are first and the rest, in the long run, nowhere but in anthologies." Reading him, one does not, therefore, get that sense so commonly conveyed by histories and treatises, that the author is huddling together lists of writers tagged with more or less appropriate epithets, merely because he is desperately afraid of leaving something out. What one does get is, on the contrary, the sense of a panorama in which every really salient figure stands out in its true significance and importance.

The remarkable thing is that for all its scope and brevity Mr. Van Doren's Introduction should remain so specific. It is able to do so because it is everywhere so brilliantly epigrammatic—not always, even not usually, because it is paradoxical, but because so many significant aspects of a given subject are revealed in marvelously condensed but accurate phrases. Of Jonathan Edwards he says: "Whatever icy logic he had on his tongue, he had rapturous prophecy in his heart." And then, of the frenzy which he stirred up in Northampton, "Edwards, the last of the Puritan prophets, was the first of the revivalists." Emily Dickinson "did not so much cut her poems to the bone as leave them as they were without adding the customary flesh. Her work approaches poetry's irreducible minimum, which is poetry's immortal part." Of Sinclair Lewis: "Hating, he pays his villains back with exuberant satire. But his books with their black and white are also hot and cold . . . Arrowsmith, his chief hero, sums up an age. He is not a Faust, the intellectual and moral heir of accumulated centuries. He is an American technician, a bacteriologist who knows little but bacteriology . . . Arrowsmith is a hero for a scientific age . . . A hundred years before Arrowsmith an American hero turned his back on the settlements to live with nature. Leather Stocking repeats himself in Arrowsmith. They are the earliest and the latest heroes for America."

Mr. Van Doren's generalizations concerning traditions and movements are as brilliant as those concerning persons. One of them may be mentioned. It is that literature on this continent was first "news from America" and that Europe, still regarding American literature as that, still refuses to take seriously any American book which is not in some way or another a report on the strange customs of a distant frontier. But it is hardly worth while to go on. The whole of the book may be read in a time comparable to the time required to read a review of it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

War-Mad World

The First World War: A Photographic History. Edited by Laurence Stallings. Simon and Schuster. $3.50.

MR. STALLINGS has done an immensely clever job in compressing his pictorial story of the World War into a single volume large in size, but not large in content. The pictures, and the clippings from the press of the various countries which tell this horrible story of a war-mad world, are extraordinarily well chosen, the captions unusually brilliant. It is, moreover, done with complete objectivity. Here we have a history which differentiates not at all between victors and vanquished, but establishes beyond all dispute that the experience of both sides was identical, that the slaughter was as horrible, as inexcusable, and as useless on one side as on the other. If anyone can look through these pages and not feel that the plain people of both sides were crucified needlessly and with fiendish torture, there must be something wrong with him.

Particularly effective is Mr. Stallings's presentation of the criminality of the church. His pictures of the war lords, the generals, and the soldiers invoking the same God in the field and at home, with complete certainty that the Almighty was on their side, is utterly devastating. Can anyone behold these pictures and wonder that the Christian church has steadily lost ground, that it merits in this respect the Russian denunciation of it as the opiate of the people? Similarly well done is his grouping together of our four leading dictators, Stalin, Hitler, Mussolini, and Kemal, as proof of the success of our campaign to make the world safe for democracy.

In his foreword Mr. Stallings says that he will probably be denounced by pacifists for not putting in more horrors and by the militarists for not putting in more military matter. That may be, though I doubt the former statement. The book is not nearly as gruesome as "The Horror of It," but it is immensely effective by reason of its restraint, its contrasts, and its telling captions and quotations from contemporary newspapers. It is extraordinarily moving and compelling, and it is literally a volume which should be placed in every household in the United States, certainly in every one in which there is oncoming cannon-fodder for the next wholesale slaughter of humanity, because our so-called statesmen have not the brains or the courage to keep us out of war.

I suppose that there will be violent protests from the army and navy and our patriotic societies against this publication. Only those will oppose it who defend the institution which has rightly been called the "sum of all villainies." We live in a conspiracy to blot out the horrors of the trenches, a conspiracy made possible because, incredible as it seems, men do forget even those horrors. This is demonstrated by the fact that veterans who came back from France swearing to oppose all further wars are now voting for larger armies and navies, and urging complete military preparations for the next struggle. The horrors have faded out of their minds. They find themselves basking in popular and political favor. Their war experience has become their best asset and their stock-in-trade. They are remembering the pleasanter experiences, minimizing the evils, and so helping to prepare the day for another wholesale slaughter. Only among portions of our youth do we find protest. That is the reason why this book ought to be in the hands of every young man. Especially should it be on display in every school, but I venture to prophesy that ninety-nine out of every one hundred of our boards of education will pronounce this volume unfit to be put before the youths who may be the next to pay for the bloodthirstiness of our capitalist civilization.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Brother to Dr. Munthe

The Arches of the Years. By Halliday Sutherland. William Morrow and Company. $2.75.

THERE is a tradition behind such phenomena as "The Story of San Michele" and the book before me, a good old Victorian tradition now half-forgotten. Turn to the files of Harper's magazine, to the dates ranging from 1855 to 1870, and there, between instalments of "Bleak House" or "Little Dorrit," you will find anonymous articles signed by A Physician, A Lady, A Sea Captain. These were extraordinary stories, stories of ghosts, of insane patients, of strange sea-monsters that climbed the forecastle, apparently for no other purpose than to frighten the pious brave sea captain who told the yarn, not forgetting at the close to point a moral, a warning to young men who yearned for like adventure. Often I wondered who these poor hacks were, anonymous sea captains, ladies, doctors. Now I know; they were the ancestors of Dr. Axel Munthe and Halliday Sutherland, who dared not sign their names.

They wrote engaging trash, popular trash in anecdotal form, and the pronoun "I" was used for the conviction of the less sophisticated readers of the magazine. During the past seventy years somehow this type of story—no plot, a mere episode based on current superstition—dropped from the memory of even the brightest magazine editors. The stuff was too naive (thought they) for twentieth century consumption. Meanwhile a huge public starved, a public that went to movies, heard the radio, read the newspapers, went to war, came home again—the vast middle class of England and America. "San Michele" was published, and the flood dams broke. The publishers had been caught napping, had innocently misrepresented the book in their advertisements. What? this collection of stale jokes, dubious yarns, and mild horror stories coated with mid-Victorian sentimentality selling out an entire edition? More editions sold, and more. The public had not read Baron Munchausen, nor the anonymous heroes of old Harper's; it was delighted with a flow of anecdote, each episode as causeless, as irresponsible as the stock smoking-car story, but "clean" and moral. All that could be said of Dr. Munthe can be repeated about Dr. Sutherland, his twin brother, a Baron Munchausen, this time in Tam O'Shanter, tweed jacket, and kilts; a dead shot, amateur whaler, bull fighter, attractive to ladies (even those who are insane), a stock-market gambler, naval officer, and, of course, a marvelous physician. Sometimes the stories he tells are too well known, and most of them are very old. The one about the newspaper man who was fired by Lord Northcliffe and then rehired is a classic, and in America its hero is Eugene Field. I for one am ready to bet that Dr. Sutherland has a rich and large practice, for the doctor tells such engaging stories, and if the handsome fellow smiles at a girl, his patient may be assured he means no harm.

HORACE GREGORY

Joseph Chamberlain

The Life of Joseph Chamberlain. Volume Two: 1885-1895. By J. L. Garvin. The Macmillan Company. $5.

IN the first volume of this magniloquent biography Mr. Garvin carried his hero down to the eve of the break with Gladstone over Irish home rule. In 1885 Joseph Chamberlain was in his glory as leader of the new English radicalism, challenging the unique position of Gladstone. In this second volume we follow him through the series of events which culminated in the final defeat of the amazing old man in 1894, and Chamberlain's entry into a Tory cabinet the following year. These were ten years of incessant agitation and embittered conflict, lightened only by the fortunate marriage with Mary Endicott of Salem, who was at that time less than half his own age.

Mr. Garvin's ardent narrative makes clear how little truth there was in the once familiar saying that Chamberlain was a home-ruler before Gladstone. He never came within sight of agreeing with the Irish demand. What he believed in was a federal plan for the British Isles—full self-government for the four countries, and no more independence for Ireland than for Wales. There was, he held, no stopping-place between that kind of solution and the separation of Ireland from England, and nothing today seems more plainly demonstrable than that the virtual separation of 1922 came about mainly because of the refusal in 1886 of parliamentary home rule. Mr. Garvin admits that Chamberlain had no understanding of Irish nationality, and now, at a distance of half a century, we are able to form some estimate of the ruinous results to the British system wrought by the implacable resolve to maintain a union which was by its nature impossible in the modern world.

The feat accomplished by Chamberlain was a most extraordinary example of parliamentary opposition. By his conversion to home rule and his disastrous method of working alone and refusing confidence to his Cabinet, Gladstone outraged large sections of his party. But he set out to convert the electorate, and there can be little doubt that he would have accomplished this within four years but for the personal tragedy of Parnell. That humiliating business destroyed in advance the potential Liberal majority and immensely strengthened the position of Chamberlain, who after the election of 1892 drove hard toward the smashing of Gladstone's second home-rule bill. He was merciless in attack, matching the wonderful old man's defense with untiring persistence and resourcefulness. Needless to say, Mr. Garvin makes a resounding story of the events and personalities of this crowded decade. He has a complete mastery of the documents. Every incident and every turn of the conflict is presented with an abundance of detail. No biographer could surpass Mr. Garvin in his special combination of knowledge and sustained enthusiasm. And yet one rises from the reading with a strong feeling that Chamberlain was exerting his remarkable powers for the arresting of a movement which could not fail to work out to an issue which he abhorred, and further, that even as regards the immediate aim of the Unionist Party his terrific energies were spent to little purpose. The Liberals at that time could not have carried home rule for Ireland. Their leader was far too old, their majority in the Commons was meager, and the House of Lords was implacable.

Mr. Garvin makes the entire political and personal tragedy impressively clear. Chamberlain was thoroughly and violently sincere in his hostility to Gladstone and Irish nationalism. He detested Parnell and his party; he loathed the Liberal alliance with them, and in consequence he gave up what looked like the certainty of the Liberal leadership and the premiership. For a short time he held to his radicalism in social policy, but surrender to the Tories could have been avoided only at the cost of giving up public life. Happiness in the Tory camp, however, was not for him. He lost his radical cronies, especially Charles Dilke and John Morley, and thereafter never made a friend in the political world. The facts compel Mr. Garvin to describe a continuous experience of anger and vengeance, of weariness and bitterness of soul. During the forty years of Chamberlain's prominence in the affairs of his country no English politician was more virulently attacked, and not one in the front rank, so far as we are able to tell from the record, gained so small a measure of satisfaction out of his labors and successes. Is it not a fair inference that, considering the issues at stake and the quality of the men opposed to him, he must himself have been in some degree to blame?

S. K. RATCLIFFE

Love Life of a Revolutionist

The Romantic Exiles. By Edward Hallett Carr. Frederick A. Stokes and Company. $2.75.

CONTEMPORARY biography is frequently an outright exploitation of its subject. The chosen "hero" is martyred, baited through several hundred pages merely to displace one prejudice by another, or to entertain a generation that hates and suspects heroes. Why there is such suspicion of great men in our generation is worth thinking about. The reason, I believe, is that, living in a period of disintegration when men in high places are doomed to deceive and disappoint us, we project our experience into the past and feel that, to arrive at the truth, we must dig out the rotten matter in the hero's life.

In "The Romantic Exiles," which has Baron Herzen and his circle for its subject, Mr. Carr quite unscrupulously exploits his characters to make a point about a generation of earlier revolutionists and to amuse his readers. No single statement in the book may be inaccurate; but in his selection of incident, in his emphases, and in his general allusions Mr. Carr gives us falsified portraits of Herzen and his fellow-revolutionaries. That Mr. Carr should do this when Herzen's memoirs are so well known and still so widely read is strange, because one has only to read a dozen pages of Herzen's own words to find Mr. Carr's portraits misleading. Conceited and self-important Herzen certainly exhibits himself to be at times in his memoirs; but instead of the futile romantic that Mr. Carr paints, we face a manly figure, with a strong and capacious mind.

Any judgment of Mr. Carr's book, therefore, involves a careful calculation of values. It is adroitly and smoothly written; it is consistently entertaining; and it spectacularly illuminates the romantic temperament. Do these accomplishments overbalance the disfigurement of character which they cost? Furthermore, Herzen and his circle were revolutionaries and their lives as revolutionaries are especially interesting to us today because we are in a revolutionary era. To have chosen to present them in the role of frustrated lovers is to have chosen the irrelevant. Five years ago the book would have had a place. Today it seems an anachronism.

Had Mr. Carr written his book as a historical novel it would be more understandable, for the two situations upon which the book is mainly based draw in emotional complications that would tempt any novelist. Herzen's marriage was an elopement. The couple pitched their love on a high spiritual plane, a descent from which was in any event inevitable. For several years the marriage was ecstatic. Afterwards, when Herzen in his self-exile became absorbed in his revolutionary activities and the uprooted family was trying to adjust itself in a strange land, Natalie began to look for other interests and, without realizing it, for a new attachment. Very significant was her neurotic affection for a young girl, parting from whom was one of the great wrenches of her life. Later the German revolutionary poet Herwegh entered the household. An affair between Natalie and Herwegh developed. Natalie believed that her love for Herwegh subtracted nothing from her love for Herzen, and in that belief acted frankly. But the affair brought black misery into the lives of the two families. Despite their lofty principles the two men were driven by jealousy into a hatred that survived Natalie's death and kept them in pursuit of each other with attacks and calumnies for years afterwards. Herwegh suffered from jealousy as much as Herzen, and indicted the relations between husband and wife as "prostitution." Herwegh's wife was reduced to the pitiful role of his procuress. During the course of the affair she could hold him in no other way. The matter spread outside the complex family circles, and under the guise of discussions of revolutionary morality became the theme of articles in the radical press. Revolutionists took sides, and much energy was wasted by the partisans of each in devising elaborate provocations and insults.

After Natalie's death, Herzen underwent a painful readjustment. Then the situation, in reverse, reoccurred to him. Another Natalie, the wife of Ogarev, his fellow-editor on the revolutionary journal, the Voice, fell in love with Herzen. The love was consummated. Ogarev, a gentle spirit, resisted only in his obvious sufferings. He sickened; a latent epilepsy seized him; he retreated, and after some years found in a London prostitute the one woman who was faithful to him. The affair, however, brought happiness to neither Herzen nor Natalie. Herzen had become hardened by his first disaster, and gave only a minimum of his mind and emotions to the second Natalie, who exhausted herself in the attempt to involve him more deeply. The conflict drove her to neuroticism. In the end she became the butt of a sophisticated daughter, who despised her and committed suicide at eighteen as the outcome of another adulterous affair, leaving a note which intimated that life was so trivial that it was fitting to end it, as a morbid joke upon one's ineffectual friends and parents.

Other affairs and other characters appear in Mr. Carr's pages—among them the virile figure of Bakunin, who becomes in Mr. Carr's treatment the Falstaff of the revolution, and the flashing figures of the terrorists who become criminals rationalizing individual crimes into social necessities. Herzen's repudiation by the new generation of revolutionists is mentioned, but the reasons are not clearly given. An absorbing epoch of revolutionary activity that could be vitally informing to us is thus idly glanced at and ignored, while our attention is diverted to trivial love affairs. The book, adroit and smooth and well constructed through it is—a book that some years ago incautious critics might have hailed as a minor classic—has therefore something of the untimely effect of an amusing story told on a grave occasion when a joke becomes an affront.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Mr. O'Flaherty's Development

The Martyr. By Liam O'Flaherty. The Macmillan Company. $2.

TO SAY of Mr. O'Flaherty's new novel that it is the best he has given us in some time is not so much to praise it as to give some encouragement to those of his readers who, more recently, have given him up for lost. To them especially the extent of his productivity in the last five or six years has been a source of deep concern. As late as 1927 it was possible to write an estimate of Mr. O'Flaherty's work from "The Black Soul" to "The Assassin" on the assumption that he was one of the most gifted and serious of the younger British writers. But Mr. O'Flaherty's only response has been to increase the quantity of his output to an average of about two books a year and to decrease its quality, in such works as "Two Years" and "The House of Gold," to the level of the lowest journalism. If Mr. O'Flaherty had set out to betray his talents and the confidence of those who believed in them, he could not have better succeeded. But as this would amount to the worst sort of perversity one must seek a better explanation. And, ignoring possible material motives, one feels oneself on the right track in the reflection that the deterioration of Mr. O'Flaherty's writing has corresponded exactly to the rise of his intense hatred against Ireland and certain Irish institutions.

Over a Norman Irish gateway in Galway, across the bay from Mr. O'Flaherty's native Aran, there is an inscription: "From the Furious O'Flaherties Good Lord Deliver Us." In "The House of Gold" and the more recent "Skerrett" Mr. O'Flaherty chose to unleash the ancestral fury against what is the pivotal institution of Irish life and society, the Catholic church. His detestation of the priests has been so great that it has extended by degrees from the parish to the country as a whole. The result is that his versions of contemporary Ireland have had about as much reality as would be supplied by an English member of the A. P. A. society after a tour of the Irish lakes. The effect of his ferocity has been to distort every aspect of whatever subject he treats, even to the physical features of his characters, most of whom are incredibly ill-shapen, ugly, and mean. For this reason his Irish landscapes, human and otherwise, have had a certain nightmarish quality which has been recognizable only to London reviewers. One is reminded of Mr. Yeats's statement last winter, that to write out of hate alone is as bad as to write out of love alone, and that only out of a combination of the two do we get something like the truth.

If Mr. O'Flaherty's new book is so much better it is because the individual passion is subordinated to the dialectic representation of several different attitudes. Like "The Informer" and "The Assassin," it returns to the period of the "troubles," and once again the drama comes out of the clash of different points of view toward the ultimate motives and ends of revolution. In one character we have the revolutionist as pure opportunist, the gunman out of employment. In another, we have the familiar type of revolutionist as superman—out of Nietzsche and Dostoevski. And in his hero, Mr. O'Flaherty offers another treatment of the new type of revolutionist that Ireland seems to have thrown up—the mystical.

Despite many fluid pages, it must be granted that the type is here much more comprehensible than in Francis Stuart's "The Colored Dome." The struggle between the superman and the mystic ends in the last chapter in a scene which Rebecca West has compared with Goya's "Desastres de la Guerra." This scene cannot be divulged but it is very terrible, unusual, and incredible. It has been praised by William Faulkner and should therefore be pleasing to his admirers as well. But it comes so clearly out of an imagination that is captivated by the sinister and the evil that it leaves us with further and different doubts about Mr. O'Flaherty's development.

WILLIAM TROY

America's Forced Labor

Forced Labor in the United States. By Walter Wilson. International Publishers. $1.50.

Machine Age in the Hills. By Malcolm Ross. The Macmillan Company. $2.

MR. WILSON'S book is a survey of labor coercion in the various forms it assumes in the United States. It depicts the brutalities and the ruthless disregard of human life of the peonage and chain-gang systems of the Southern States; the exploitation of labor in our penal and reform institutions, under yellow-dog contracts, and on public works; and the virtual enslavement and expropriation of colonial labor by American imperialism. These deplorable conditions, especially those connected with the use of prison labor, have been exposed over and over again. Some of these exposures have resulted in significant improvement in the treatment of prisoners and their living conditions. These reforms Mr. Wilson discounts, or rather dismisses. He is not interested in reforming the penal structure of capitalist society. He views all forms of coerced labor in the perspective of Communist propaganda and concludes that they are products of capitalism and its necessary exploitation of human labor. "Wage labor," he tells us, "differs from forced labor not in content but only in form." It is therefore futile to attempt to reform the penal institutions of capitalism. Nothing short of the establishment of a workers' republic such as now exists in Russia will give us the basis for a real change in our methods of handling our prisoners humanely and for rehabilitating them.

The best proof of the futility of penal reform under capitalism Mr. Wilson finds in the persistence of the exceptional cruelties of the Southern chain-gang and peonage systems after repeated exposures and minor reforms. Now it may be good Communist propaganda to identify the exploitation of the black peons of the South as the product of capitalism as Mr. Wilson does, but that does not make his analysis correct. Every student of economic history knows, and Mr. Wilson tacitly admits, that peonage and the chain-gang are modern manifestations of habits nurtured by an agrarian slave economy. To argue otherwise is simply to spout historical nonsense.

Since, according to Mr. Wilson, wage labor and prison labor are but different methods for extracting surplus value from the working class, the only difference that he can find between them is that the latter is performed in a penal institution often under the lash while the former is sold under free contract for what it will fetch in the open market. This is a very big difference and one that no amount of scholastic twisting of Marxian terminologies can conceal. Under free contract the workers are not only free to starve, as Mr. Wilson contends, but also to mobilize their industrial and political power either for immediate economic advances or for the revolutionary objectives of the Communist Party. This freedom, whatever its limitations, makes all the difference between a free man and a slave. Of course, Mr. Wilson sees no difference between slavery, serfdom, and the wage system, although Marx who is his authority for the identity between these various systems of labor exploitation saw important practical and theoretical differences between them. For example, Marx explained that

It is one of the civilizing sides of capital that it enforces this surplus labor in a manner and under conditions which promote the development of the productive forces, of social conditions, and the creation of the elements for a new and higher formation better than did the preceding forms of slavery, serfdom, etc. Thus it leads on the one hand to a stage in which the coercion and the monopolization of the social development (including its material and intellectual advantages) by a portion of society at the expense of the other portion are eliminated; on the other hand it creates the material requirements and the germ of conditions, which make it possible to combine this surplus labor in a higher form of society. . . .

This identity which Mr. Wilson posits between penal labor and wage labor just does not make practical sense, whether we view it from the standpoint of liberal prison reform or from that of revolutionary communism. It merely serves to buttress the real thesis of his book, which is the non-existence of forced labor in the Soviet Union and the superiority of its penal methods and institutions as compared with those of capitalist United States.

Turning now to Mr. Ross's "Machine Age in the Hills" we find that while his economics are not as romantic as Mr. Wilson's his underlying theoretical assumption is about as naive. He attempts to show the effect of improved techniques upon the original simplicity of the mountaineers of Tennessee, West Virginia, and Kentucky.

These people are the descendants of poor white farmers pushed back into the sterile hills and plains by unsuccessful competition with wealthy plantation masters during the days of slavery. Before 1910 most of these simple folk were pocketed in their native hills, content to eke out a crude but comfortable subsistence on their mountain patches. Then came the war-time demand for coal, followed by the penetration of northern capital into the rich coal fields of southern West Virginia and Kentucky. The farm hut disappeared to make room for the miner's shack; timber land and forests receded before the tippie; and self-sufficient peasant farmers were suddenly converted into a landless but high-waged proletariat. The new prosperity brought high pressure salesmen and their wares to be sold on the instalment plan—automobiles, washing machines, radios, and silk shirts. Good times were interrupted by the termination of the war but resumed upon the post-war demand for coal from Italy and France. When this ended, the coal-mining industry in this country, which had been for years in a state of chronic overproduction, was found to be highly overcapitalized. The inevitable collapse threw thousands out of work and reduced the wages of those who continued to work. Prosperity disappeared as suddenly as it had come. Unable to return to the land, since most of it had been leased for a long period or else had been none too scrupulously inclosed, and lacking financial reserves, the miners in the Southern hills have lived in poverty for over eight years. These years have seen the complete disintegration of the once powerful and militant United Mine Workers whose collapse is largely due to its failure to organize the Southern coal fields; and the sudden rise and disappearance of radical independent unions like Keeney's West Virginia Miners Union, and the Communists' National Miners Union. Even if these unions had lived, the chaos caused by cutthroat competition among the operators would have prevented them from functioning. What is needed is stabilization and reemployment. While the author thinks the former is possible he points out that the latter can hardly take place on any considerable scale. There are already too many miners and too many mines not only in the Appalachian section but in the rest of the coal industry. Moreover, modern chemistry has already increased the power capacity of a single lump of coal, thereby reducing the amount necessary for industrial consumption. Industrial consumption has been further reduced by the use of oil and hydroelectricity. On the other hand, the productivity of the miner has been increased by the introduction of cutting and loading machines.

Like most of the diagnoses of present-day industrial problems, Mr. Ross's analysis leads him to the conclusion that the coal problem is the result of our inability or refusal to govern the machine. We are told that the problem of coal, while in many respects unique, gives us in microcosm the ills of machine civilization. As a way out he suggests the adoption of the British plan of placing a one-cent tax on every ton of coal mined, the proceeds to be used for discovering newer uses for coal, for settling surplus miners on small homesteads, and for unemployment insurance. This British scheme, it should be remembered, is still in the experimental stage. Whatever the future success of the plan, it will hardly bring about fundamental changes. What is needed in the coal industry is planned utilization along with that of our other natural resources. This is impossible without public ownership, a subject which Mr. Ross does not touch upon. He is much too occupied with the effects of modern technology upon our social habits to see that after all the cause of our discomfort is not the machine as such but the ends it serves under private ownership.

ABRAM L. HARRIS

Henry George Today

The Philosophy of Henry George. By George R. Geiger. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE persistent neglect of Henry George by American economists, publicists, and legislators has been due to a number of causes. The era of large scale operations in industry and finance was opening at the time when he was trying to center attention upon a proposal respecting the older problem of land. The different philosophy of socialism possessed a European breeding-ground from which a flood of immigrants transferred germs to America. As the West filled up, the particular transition stage from mere appropriation to a more complicated economy, which had excited George's analysis, tended to disappear, so that the object lesson was not so easily grasped. It is easy to understand a little of socialism, and so to become a convert to it; but one must grasp the whole theory of the single tax, or be slow to perceive any of it. The American academic economists of the thirty years following George's advent were mightily conscious of their university training, and to them the author of "Progress and Poverty" was a Philistine.

All of this has been true despite the fact that George's ideas were naturally fitted, if any could be, for reception by the American mind. He was rigidly orthodox in his premises and deductions. He was the apotheosis of laissez faire; Jefferson was his spiritual father, and he promised the slightest chastisement of the business enterprise. He was a native product who achieved worldwide fame. Further, he possessed the evangelical zeal which we so readily admire.

Our refusal of recognition has argued our own shortcomings. Our usual textbooks on economics, in shutting George out, have stultified themselves. There are many reasons for believing, however, that sentiment is changing, and that the specific proposal of Henry George to absorb economic rent in taxes is apt to be adopted widely in greater or less degree.

This will justify the loyal band of single-tax disciples in the eyes of the public, but not in their own eyes, for their theoretical system will not be embraced in its purity and exclusiveness.

The appearance of Dr. Geiger's appraisal is in itself evidence of the depth to which George's advocacy penetrated without our knowing it. A generation removed from George's death, the book is fuller, more scholarly, and sets its subject in truer perspective than any other. Encomium, unavoidable in those over whom Henry George's spell was personally cast, has been avoided, and the admiration for a man of genius, which has properly taken its place, is advanced with a simplicity which wins approval. Dr. Geiger has reviewed the wide literature of George's movement, and has selected and condensed from it with a skill which illumines the important phases of his subject's thought and work. The relation between the single tax and socialism, which has remained too obscure to the average reader, is admirably clarified. The influence of Henry George is estimated with good judgment, and the account comes down almost to the day of going to press. It was not an easy thing to present a critical account of a thinker who was his own severe critic and who knew so well how to express his considered ideas.

The author, however, has done more than substantiate the claims of Henry George to be considered among the first order of minds in economic inquiry. He has everywhere emphasized the ethical hopes that drove George onward. He has made a convincing plea for the return of ethical motives to economic scrutiny, for the reentry of idealism into economic method. This is a needed correction, which entitles Dr. Geiger to thanks not only as a skilful scholar, but as a constructive economist.

BROADUS MITCHELL

Shorter Notices

Maxim Gorky, Writer and Revolutionist. By Moissaye J. Olgin. International Publishers. 75 cents.

Coming from Mr. Olgin, this book is particularly disappointing. On the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of Gorki's literary birth a serious study of Gorki, critical and biographical, was very much in order, and Olgin is ideally qualified to write it. Instead he has chosen to give us this brochure, which is about as critical as an after-dinner panegyric. Gorki is stuffed willy-nilly into a ready-made suit of proletarian art clothes, though the measurements would fit Jack London or O. Henry quite as well. Mr. Olgin glosses over the religious recidivism of Gorki's "Confession" period, and fails to discuss his more serious political defection as editor of Novaya Zhizn in 1917.

Fifty Poets: An American Auto-Anthology. By William Rose Benét. Duffield and Green. $2.50.

This is an anthology with a difference. Fifty poets were chosen by Mr. Benét and asked to contribute to the volume their favorite short poem. They were requested, moreover, to explain the mental background of the poem's composition. The poets included in the list of fifty ranged all the way from Edwin Markham to Marianne Moore. Obviously Mr. Benét's purpose was to discover what the poets themselves understood of the creative process. The reader finishes the "Auto-Anthology," however, convinced that poets are rather inarticulate about the working of their own minds. Personal moods, it seems, have brought most of these "favorite poems" into being, and that is as we should expect it to be. Just how these personal moods came to have a larger or more universal significance the poet seldom understands. Léonie Adams alone attempts an intellectual testing of her own poetic message, and sends Mr. Benét a poem "which seems to me to bear a special relation to most of the other verses in [my] collection." Many of these poets in choosing a certain poem recall a scene, an action, a feeling which forced them to write the lines. Several of the poets chose poems because the words came to them almost as if dictated, poems over which they did not need to work. Such poems always seem to the poet the most surely perfect. Usually they are. Since the sources of any poem and its final artistic statement may have very little in common, Benét's "Auto-Anthology" is in truth more interesting for the light it throws on poets in character than for any illumination of the creative process.

Hitlers Kampf um die Macht. Der Nationalsozialismus und die Ereignisse des Jahres 1932. Von Edgar von Schmidt-Pauli. Berlin: Verlag von Georg Stilke. 1.80 and 3.80 marks.

Dr. Schmidt-Pauli is the Great Pacifier of contemporary Germany. He is hopeful that Hitler's remarkable abilities, his personal appeal, and his incredible energy, confidence, and stubbornness will prove equal to the task of saving Germany, but he is not blind to the dangerous sides of that sour and infallible patriot. He has a good word for Hindenburg, the Crown Prince, von Schleicher, Major von Stephani of the Stahlhelm, even for Brüning, and a great many good words for that much maligned old campaigner Von Papen, whom he describes as one of a type of Rhineland aristocrats who are given to "allerlei Schwänken" but whose Catholic convictions constitute "a fundamentally serious guide to life." All these leaders have had honorable and useful parts in the crusade against "Kultur-bolschewismus," and most of them have aided loyally in the sinking of differences from which, and from which only, can come Germany's salvation. The book is admirably written, with perfect simplicity and an air of judicial calmness; and although its tone of kindness for everybody but "die roten Mörder" will cause exasperation in various quarters, the book is indispensable for a clear understanding of exactly what happened in ministerial circles from Brüning to Hitler.

Whatever You Reap. By Anne Persov. Detroit: Schuman's.

These poems received the Avery and Julia Hopwood Major Poetry Award of $2,500 at the University of Michigan. The young poet is introduced by Max Eastman, who has high praise for these verses and allows himself amusing comment on the state of poetry in the modern world. Anne Persov, whose first volume this is, has facility in the handling of many verse forms, some originality not yet entirely cleared of literary echoes in language, and now and then a rather striking individuality of poetic conception. She is young and her subjects are those of many another young woman poet—love, the beauty of certain aspects of nature, observations concerning human life. But she treats these subjects with a difference. There is a vein of ironical wit underlying the romantic mood which many of the poems portray, and this irony allows the young poet an artistic detachment from her theme. In other words, Anne Persov is likely to develop into a good poet not because of her almost too great ease in writing verse, not because of what Max Eastman calls "the load of emotion" which her lines carry, but because she has a sharp mind and the ability humorously to criticize life at the very time that she feels it passionately. In this first book the best poems present an upside-

THE NATION RADIO HOUR

Every Wednesday evening at 8:15
Over Station WEVD—1300 Kc.

The Editors of The Nation discuss men and affairs from an informed and liberal point of view.

down world, where dragons are vegetarians, where human attitudes and problems change with the perspective. In these poems the poet's mind is very active, she disciplines her own verses, her rhythms, and her images. In the more usual romantic love sonnets and lyrics she is much less original.

Always a Grand Duke. By the Grand Duke Alexander of Russia. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

At fifty-three it is not always so easy to live down the fact that one has been a Grand Duke of Russia. The Grand Duke Alexander, or if you prefer, Mr. Alexander Romanov, succeeded fairly well. Precipitated from power by the Soviets, he landed in the mad post-war Paris just as the Versailles treaty was being signed. Having escaped Russia with his life, he was also lucky enough to escape the various forms of melancholy and "Bolshevikophobia" that overwhelmed most of his living relatives and loyal compatriots in Paris. The past was indeed dead, and he realized it almost immediately. In the future he meant to live as an individual with as little strain as possible on dead titles and old friends. This volume of his memoirs tells of his experiences up to the time of his death in the early part of 1933. It is an exciting story and the grand duke knew how to tell it. Between circumventing the fantastic prides and prejudices of his royal relations and the equally difficult task of not being exploited—more than necessary—as a freak and social lion, he had a busy and interesting time. Readers of "Always a Grand Duke" will see that he was not the person to miss the humorous sidelights.

Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City. By Archibald MacLeish. The John Day Pamphlets. 25 cents.

So far as the poetry in this pamphlet is concerned, it is Archibald MacLeish at his worst. The verses sound like collections of lines taken from a residue left when Mr. MacLeish completed "Conquistador." Each poem is a panel picture, as the poet would paint it, for Mr. Rockefeller's city—therefore the title. And how would Mr. MacLeish decorate these walls? Obviously, he would, in the first panel, paint the sprawling female America, nude. The second panel would picture Wild West history. Here, in particular, we find rinsings of the poet's original inspiration for "Conquistador." The third panel depicts immigration, the fourth shows the intelligent artist washing his hands of America and its problems, the fifth is a portrait of the empire builders, the sixth, a study of revolutionists. In all this political versifying, MacLeish can not be called a fascist. He may, however, be classified as a traditionalist, as one who holds dear the history and past glory of his country, now betrayed. His attitude is patrician and paternal: though he pats the heads of the hard-working slaves and hunkies who built the Union Pacific and died in the process, though he sneers at Harriman, Morgan, and Mellon who betrayed America by exploiting her for gain, he expresses an equally violent contempt for communism, a dislike for the foreigners who, knowing nothing of our tradition and of our glorious past, "Lenin-millennium" us in their bad English.

FILM

FILM

SOVIETS DARING ACHIEVEMENT! DYNAMIC STORY OF THE NORTH!
AMERICAN PREMIERE OF NEW SOVIET TALKIE

CONQUERORS of the NIGHT

THRILLING AND ADVENTUROUS VOYAGE OF THE ICE-BREAKER "MALYGIN" TO THE ARCTIC (ENGLISH TITLES)

ACME THEATRE 14th St. and Union Sq. | Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

William Troy's regular comment on motion pictures will appear at intervals of two weeks during August and September. At the end of that time, Mr. Troy will resume his weekly column.

RESORTS

SEA GATE—Accommodations available for several guests in quiet, refined boarding home. Home cooking, special dietetic attention to children. Private boat runs to Battery daily. Moderate rates. Mrs. Blum, 4120 Manhattan Ave. ESplanade 2-9612.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship, wholesome food. Tennis.

THE HIL-BERT HOUSE

Lake Mahopac New York
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 953

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE

Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Jewish. Rate $16 wkly.

LOVELY old stone farmhouse, 150 acres. Tennis, riding, swimming. Excellent food. Congenial atmosphere. $14 week; $5 weekend. Tel. New Milford 1-803 or write E. Adams, New Milford, Ct.

SPRING LAKE HOTEL

Youngsville, Sullivan Co., N. Y.
All modern improvements. Dietary Laws. Bathing, fishing, tennis, hand ball. Imposing Casino.
City Information: ATwater 9-8854 or 9350

BROOKWOOD LABOR COLLEGE (Katonah, N. Y.) is now open to summer guests. An interesting place to spend your summer vacation, within commuting distance of New York City. Tennis, swimming, hiking, unique labor library, good food. Rates $14.50 to $18.50 weekly; special season and week-end rates. Write for folder.

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG

A delightful hide-away in the mountains inviting people of better taste. Wholesome food, delightful companionship, all outdoor sports. Reduced rates. Woodbourne, N. Y. Tel. Fallsburg 186-J

RESTAURANT

71 IRVING PLACE, INC. RESTAURANT

BREAKFAST
10c and up

LUNCH
25c and up

DINNER
45c and up

MRS. NORMAN THOMAS
Owner
NRA member

PERSONAL

WILL buy old barn; bargain for studio. Trees brook, seclusion. Drinking water. Commute. Newark. State Price. Box 205 c/o The Nation.

FIRST EDITIONS FOR SALE: Longfellow's Tales of A Wayside Inn; Wharton's Ethan Frome. Write making offer. Box 207, c/o The Nation.

A MATEUR ASTRONOMER would like to buy telescope. State lens diameter, make and price. Box 208, c/o The Nation.

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG MAN, 23, knowledge of French and Spanish, accounting, 2 years college, desires interesting work. Box 206, c/o The Nation.

OPEN SHELF

Henry Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men. —sent free.

George's Books

None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.

ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
Park Place, New York City

SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

CURIOUS BOOKS Send for Catalogue of Privately Printed Unexpurgated Items Exotically Illustrated Limited Editions

THE FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. N, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York

LANGUAGES

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Ave. HARlem 7-8446.

Learn languages at home by World's Easiest, Quickest Method. Free Demonstration. Linguaphone Institute, R.C.A. Bldg., Rockefeller Center.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 16, 1933

No. 3554

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	169
EDITORIALS:
The Death Penalty for Kidnapping	172
The Assault on the Schoolhouse	173
Mortgage Relief	173
Editors as Teachers	174
ISSUES AND MEN. WHY DO PUBLIC MEN RATIONALIZE?
By Oswald Garrison Villard	175
MINE WAR IN PENNSYLVANIA. By Daniel Allen	176
LABOR RACKETEERING. By Harold Seidman	177
THE NRA SPEEDS UP. By Paul Y. Anderson	181
THE TEACHER FACES THE DEPRESSION. By Eunice Langdon	182
LIBERIA IN SHACKLES. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	185
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	188
CORRESPONDENCE	189
BOOKS AND FILMS:
Flight of Fish. By Kay Boyle	190
Rio Grande. By Maxwell Anderson	190
Jews and Minority Rights. By Marvin Lowenthal	191
World Without End. By Dorothy Van Doren	191
Both Ends of the Microscope. By Grace Adams	192
Down Under. By C. Hartley Grattan	193
Health Can Be Bought. By David Beres	193
Counter-Revolution in Russia. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	194
The Frontier of Today. By Ruth Benedict	194
Shorter Notices	195
Films: American Exhibit. By William Troy	196
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	196

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE DEFINITE STAND of the Administration against strikes, although expected, has come sooner than most persons had thought likely. It is put forward by Mr. Roosevelt as an "appeal" rather than as an order, and although eventually there is sure to be strong pressure to insure compliance with it, the fact remains that labor organizations are not required to accept the mediation of the new National Board of Arbitration, nor is there any authority in existing law for exercising compulsion upon them. The government's legal powers under the National Recovery Act are much greater over the employer than over the employee. Under a licensing system the former may be directed almost at will, but we believe that labor will and should use its discretion in accepting the services of the new board, never losing sight of its right to strike as a final recourse. It is true that with working hours and minimum wages settled by codes there will be less reason for strikes and less public sympathy with strikers than otherwise, but the workers will still be compelled to fight for wage scales above the minimums and will have to demand revision of the latter from time to time if prices rise according to expectations. Perhaps the greatest objection to the government's precipitance in trying to head off strikes by a mediation board is that it ought first to have clarified unmistakably its intention to support the right of labor to maintain its own organizations and treat with employers through them. Until the government definitely rejects company unions as representatives of labor, labor will and should refuse to sheath its one effective weapon—the strike.

THIS FAILURE of the Administration to rule against company unions was seized upon by Mary Van Kleeck in making an early and effective protest against the National Board of Arbitration. Miss Van Kleeck, who is the director of industrial study for the Russell Sage Foundation, had accepted membership on the Federal Advisory Board of the United States Employment Service, but sent her resignation to Secretary Perkins upon the appointment of the mediation board. Investigation and experience, said Miss Van Kleeck, "have led me to the conclusion that only genuine collective bargaining through trade unions, with the right to strike preserved and not discouraged, can insure the self-government in industry necessary to stabilize employment and raise wages." Miss Van Kleeck voiced justifiable objection also to the personnel of the mediation board. It is certainly unfortunate that two of the three employer members, Walter C. Teagle and Gerard Swope, should be known opponents of labor organization. With the exception of Leo Wolman, the labor members are no better. It was perhaps inevitable that William Green should be chosen, since he is the head of the American Federation of Labor, but there was no excuse for including John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers. Mr. Lewis is discredited with a large proportion of his own organization, and his loyalty to labor is so widely doubted that he will inspire no confidence whatever among workers as a dependable representative of their interests. The revealing test of the Administration's attitude toward labor will come in the steel and coal codes. Their terms will have more to do with precipitating or preventing strikes than the National Board of Arbitration.

FRANCES PERKINS'S VISIT to the steel mills was played up by the daily press for the excellent news it was, but the story of how she was denied her constitutional rights in the town of Homestead, Pennsylvania, was either ignored or reported obscurely. In the steel country Miss Perkins learned how hot a blast furnace can be. She also learned about something else that steel workers have to put up with. In Homestead the Secretary of Labor of the United States announced that she would hold a question hour in the Town Hall at which she would be glad to hear any comment on the steel code by any worker. But when President E. P. Cush of the Steel and Metal Workers Industrial Union tried to attend the meeting, he was ordered away by the Homestead police. A reporter from the Federated Press was also barred. Miss Perkins was informed of the discrimination and repeated that anyone who wished to come should be admitted. Again Mr. Cush was barred by the police. Miss Perkins was beginning to be annoyed. Deserting the Town Hall, she announced that she would adjourn the meeting to a nearby park. But here again she met with difficulties; the mayor of the town informed her that she could not hold a meeting in the public park! The tale ends with Miss Perkins holding her meeting in the United States Post Office, having told the Homestead police to stay on their own territory outside the federal precincts. It should be added that once inside, Mr. Cush justified the worst fears of the police and the mayor. He asked for a thirty-hour week, unemployment insurance at company and government cost, and a minimum wage of 66 2/3 cents an hour.

THE labor racketeer is an American phenomenon, the product of our national desire for easy money and a ruthless individualism which has made of social conscience in this country the sickly plant it is. On another page of this issue we print an account of the methods by which corrupt labor leaders have used trade-union organizations for their own enrichment, sold out the rank and file to employers and politicians, and yet been able to intrench themselves so securely as to be removable only by court action and then only rarely. At the moment, American labor faces a crisis whose importance cannot be exaggerated. On the strength of the cohesion of its own ranks and the integrity of its leadership and aims, depends in part the answer to the question whether labor is to be the slave of an industrial fascism or the strong partner in an industrial democracy. The labor racketeer, though he is by no means typical of American labor leadership, is the epitome of the forces which have made the labor movement ineffectual in this country. It has been undemocratic; it has assumed no social responsibility; it has sought to perpetuate its own special set-up without regard to the needs of the great mass of workers who have looked in vain for disinterested leadership. The rank and file of labor must take matters into its own hands if it is to attain a decent way of life. The coal miners in Pennsylvania seem to have learned this lesson, but the tragic side of their situation is that while they have discovered that John L. Lewis is generally to be found on the same side of the fence as their employers, they are only now developing leaders of their own.

OF all the government's attempts to economize at the expense of tried and trusted civil servants, the dropping of a number of young, trained consuls and other foreign-service officers is especially depressing. For years the effort was made to establish a permanent diplomatic corps; at last Congress agreed, and it was announced that permanent careers were available for young men who could pass the tests set by the government. If they did, and their conduct in the service was good, they were assured of employment, steady promotion, and pensions on retirement, toward which they made contributions out of their pay. All went well until the present Administration came in, and then the axe fell ruthlessly. A number of these young officials stationed abroad were dismissed and turned adrift without any promise of reinstatement if times should improve, to find jobs where there were no jobs after having prepared themselves for a special career. If private employers behaved thus, we know how we should feel about such a violation of obligation. This case is, of course, no worse than the dismissal of thousands of other civil-service employees, but it is a shining example of false economy.

GANDHI HAS GONE BACK to prison. Amid all the screaming newspaper headlines of arriving and departing aviators, of strikes and riots, of industrial codes, of murder clues, of parleys and conferences and pacts, this announcement alone seems to be of permanent consequence. Rather than promise not to participate further in civil disobedience and so remain free on parole, the Mahatma has accepted a sentence of a year in jail, from which not improbably he will never emerge alive. We talk about this as the age of the machine and an era in which only organization can accomplish results. Yet where else is there a spectacle of power faintly comparable to that of this frail body opposing its lone personality, peaceably yet effectively, against the united land, sea, and air forces of the British Empire? Without any of the adjuncts which we regard as essential to power—without fortune, or family, or office, or armed supporters—this humble Indian is known and revered all over the world because almost alone among the so-called great of the day there is not a shadow of a doubt of his utter unselfishness, of his complete devotion to his cause. We may or may not believe in Gandhi's objectives, but unless all of man's supposed progress upward from the cave is fictitious, unless the idea that reason is destined to prevail over brute force is false, then the methods and spirit of the Mahatma are bound to survive his weak and ungainly body and become an increasing power on the earth.

THE WHIRLIGIG OF TIME has been bringing changes to the Caribbean republics as well as to other parts of the world. As this issue of The Nation went to press the abdication, or ousting, of President Machado of Cuba appeared imminent, bringing to an end his unhappy administration of tyranny, repression, and corruption. Sumner Welles, the American Ambassador, has been working guardedly for such a solution since his arrival in Havana, but events seem to have outfooted the pace of his diplomacy. In the neighboring republic of Haiti an agreement has been reached between our minister and the insular government by which October 1 of next year has been set for the complete withdrawal of American marines. This will liquidate the unjustifiable occupation of Latin American soil authorized by Wilson, Harding, and Coolidge, but disapproved by Hoover and Roosevelt. The United States still holds a financial string to Haiti. This should be loosed next and Americans given to understand that they must take the same chances in investments abroad as they run at home.

MATHILDE VAERTING has been dismissed by the German government from the staff of the University of Jena where she has served since 1923 as professor of education. Friends who are seeking funds in order to make possible the continuation of Dr. Vaerting's work in some other country have issued a statement asserting that her dismissal was neither for political reasons nor for reasons of race; she is not a member of any party nor is she a Jew. The statement does not hazard a guess as to the actual cause of the government's action, but it is easy to do so even at this distance. Dr. Vaerting is famous the world over as a feminist. Although her activities have been educational rather than political or propagandist, she has expressed in many books and articles her belief in the equality of the sexes. She maintains that the political dominance of men is a sociological rather than a biological factor—a dominance comparable to the dominance at various periods of various races and types of culture and subject, like them, to evolutionary or revolutionary change. She believes that the claims of the dominant group, be it class, or race, or sex, to inherent superiorities can be controverted by an impartial examination of the records of history. It is not hard to see how antipathetic the ideas of this educator must be to the present dominant group in Germany. Her teaching is a direct challenge to their basic claims—racial and national superiority, political autocracy, and, finally, the desirability of relegating women to political subservience and the primary function of breeding new Nazis. Apart from her views the very presence of this distinguished woman on the faculty of a great German university must have been distressing to the government. Her dismissal is the most striking overt act so far committed in the Nazi war against the freedom of women.

THE PEOPLE of New York City are fortunate in the chance to vote for Fiorello H. La Guardia for Mayor. If they elect him, they will secure more than "reform." They will be assured of a militant and enlightened effort to establish for the metropolis the equivalent of the New Deal which the progressives in Washington are earnestly seeking for the nation. Nor can national recovery percolate to the people of New York if it is largely nullified by local misgovernment. La Guardia can be elected. Not for twenty years has Tammany been so much on the defensive, so vulnerable. More than ever is it clear that the alternative between a Tammany victory and a La Guardia victory is bankruptcy or solvency for the city, corrupt or honest government. But that is stating the lowest common denominator of the issue. Fusion headed by La Guardia will demonstrate how much enlightened leadership and policy can achieve. It should mean not merely carrying on the numerous vital municipal services with an effectiveness previously unknown, but the creation of a new type of planned urban society, with housing, school, and playground facilities hitherto undreamed of, and other manifestations of how a socially minded administration may transform the character of the dwelling place of six million people. The prenomination skirmishing and the collapse of the early opposition to La Guardia have enormously strengthened him. It now remains to be seen whether the people of New York will rise to their great opportunity not merely in the minimum performance of their elementary duty of registering and voting—which so many thousands who should know better neglect—but in taking an active part in the campaign.

WHETHER it was a sincere desire for self-reform, the fear of action by Congress when it meets in December if self-reform was not initiated, or the result of a direct warning from the Administration which led the Stock Exchange to adopt its recent rulings to control speculation, we need not inquire too curiously. In any case the reforms must be welcomed as steps in the right direction. The exchange has ruled that in future customers having accounts of less than $5,000 must have minimum margins of 50 per cent, while accounts over $5,000 must have margins of 30 per cent. No margin is to be granted on stocks selling below $5 a share or bonds selling at less than 10 per cent of their face value. Weekly reports are demanded from members of all pools and syndicates, giving the number of shares involved and including copies of any written agreements. Various rulings are adopted through which it is hoped to reduce the high-pressure methods of "customers' men" in soliciting orders. These should be merely first steps toward more thoroughgoing reforms. The functions of speculation are to provide a constant flow of new capital funds for industry and a quick and fluid market for the purchase and sale of securities. These functions are currently performed at a disproportionate social cost. The volume and violence of speculation should be curbed. The next step, certainly, should be a raising of the margin requirements of the larger accounts to 50 per cent; and it may be well for the exchange to ask itself whether such devices as the so-called "stop-loss order," which always aggravates fluctuations, should not be prohibited.

WE COMMENTED last week on the backward step of the Wisconsin Legislature in voting to make military training in the State university compulsory instead of optional, and expressed the hope that Governor Schemedeman would veto the measure. We are glad to say that he has vetoed it.

OF ERUDITION, unlike most other forms of wealth amassed through effort, it is unfortunately true that it can be taken by its owner to the grave. The knowledge of the scholar, like the voice of the singer, the gesture of the actor, or the technique of the musical performer, is one of those possessions which the world enjoys only so long as it gives breath to the possessor. The death of a scholar in any field is therefore a very real and tangible loss to the world. And this loss is even greater when the particular field happens to be one to which too few have devoted themselves, in which the ground-work has scarcely been laid and authorities are rare. Just such a loss is represented in the recent death in New York, at the age of thirty-five, of Harry Alan Potamkin, who was perhaps more erudite in his particular field than anyone in the country. Although not well known to the great public which goes to the films, Potamkin revealed in his reviews and articles a familiarity with the motion-picture field, past and present, so complete as to inspire the same implicit confidence in his authority as a Bernard Berenson writing on Florentine painting or a T. S. Eliot writing on Elizabethan poetry. As a film correspondent in Europe for several years and as a member of the National Board of Review, Potamkin had opportunities of seeing more pictures, and a greater variety of them, than is the lot of very many people interested in the field anywhere in the world. The result was that he was in a position, just before his death, of becoming the first historian of the new art—its stumbling beginnings, transitions, experiments, and triumphs. In his essays on Pabst, Clair, Pudovkin, and Eisenstein, published during the last year, he showed an equipment for that task at least as complete as that of any Ph.D. in a university about to prepare a thesis in some more traditional field of learning. As a critic, it is true, he might have continued to suffer from what many people believed to be a too insistent application of the social point of view, as well as from his highly abstract and idiosyncratic style. But what distinguished his writing was the wealth of information it revealed in a field in which not many are yet well informed—and this is what makes it seem so irreplaceable.

The Death Penalty for Kidnapping

IN recent years kidnapping has been attracting unusual attention. The number of kidnappings perpetrated with a view to ransom seems to have increased considerably, and the publicity accorded to them has increased tremendously. The two circumstances have interacted. The increase in kidnappings has led the press to put extraordinary emphasis on such crimes, while this very emphasis has been the direct suggestion to many persons to attempt this method of getting money. A public demand to "do something about it" has been fanned by the newspapers, and as usual in such situations a good deal of hysteria and unwisdom has resulted. The counsel easiest to give, and therefore the most generally given, has been to stiffen the penalties for kidnapping. A thoughtless and uninformed campaign has been undertaken by a good many newspapers to make kidnapping an offense punishable by death. Several States have already taken such action. In Missouri one of the participants in the kidnapping of Mary McElroy is actually under sentence of death. In California recently Governor Rolph signed an act making kidnapping punishable by death, and almost at the same time Governor Lehman recommended to the Legislature of New York that it pass a law making possible a similar penalty.

Although this demand for a pound of flesh, this reversion to violence as a preventive of crime, is the easiest answer to the problem, it is, in the light of all experience, not only sure to be ineffective but certain to have disastrous consequences on our attitude toward and treatment of the entire subject of crime and the criminal. The all too prevalent belief that capital punishment lessens crime has little support either in history or in psychology. In the days when even in the most enlightened countries men and women were executed, frequently with torture, for a large number of offenses, such severity seems to have had no observable effect in checking crime. Rather than inspiring fear and horror in the hearts of potential criminals, it seared them with indifference and steeped them in contempt for human life—their own or another's. Relaxation in the severity and brutality of punishment has gone hand in hand with a reduction in crimes of violence. Perhaps it may be argued that a reduction in crime preceded a lessening in the brutality of punishment rather than the other way around. Probably each influence has reacted on the other, but nothing seems better established in psychology than that violence begets violence and respect for life on the part of the community engenders the same feeling on the part of the individual.

Our entire attitude toward crime has undergone profound modifications in recent years. Punishment as an act of vengeance no longer has any standing in civilized communities. The object is prevention and reform, and prevention is retarded, not furthered, by legalized butchery. So long as the state, acting in cold blood, destroys human life, it cannot expect its citizens to attain to high practices in the treatment of their fellows. All students of criminal psychology are united now in the belief that the criminal mind is abnormal and that crime should be treated as a disease as surely as insanity. The offender should be put where he can no longer offend, cured if possible, but in no circumstances made the victim of legalized official violence, which can have no other effect than to make violence tolerable in the community.

Up to a few years ago the world was making good progress toward the abolition of capital punishment. Civilized nations had abolished it almost entirely except for murder, and a number of the most enlightened had done away with it altogether. In this country the movement had made such headway as to include a sixth of our States. It would be a tragedy if public hysteria, stimulated by thoughtless newspapers and clap-trap politicians, should set an enlightened movement back through an opportunist effort to deal with kidnapping.

Without question kidnapping is a difficult crime to contend with, because commonly no help can be had from the relatives of the victim, who are naturally more anxious to get their loved one back than to make him a possible victim in the interest of public justice. Last year a law was passed by Congress making kidnapping which involves interstate conspiracy or transportation of the victim a federal crime. Since then federal agents have assisted in the effort to unravel most of the important cases of kidnapping and only two such have gone unsolved.

Although the intervention of the federal government in kidnapping cases is probably a step in the right direction, it is not without considerable dangers. One of them is a tendency to permit, or encourage, the national government to intrude increasingly into the prosecution of crime, a field hitherto reserved almost exclusively to the States. There is some agitation at the moment, indeed, for the development of a kind of super police force by the national government—an American Scotland Yard. Under our Constitution federal police authority is exceedingly limited in scope, existing chiefly in connection with smuggling, counterfeiting, robbing the mails, violations of the income-tax, internal-revenue, narcotic, and prohibition laws, and the like. To change our Constitution so as to give the federal government wide control of crime would probably be repugnant to the instincts of a citizenry which has been accustomed to a more flexible and localized system. On the other hand, to allow the federal government to superimpose an illegal or extra legal police force upon our existing State authorities would be highly dangerous. We saw something of the possibilities of such action when A. Mitchell Palmer was at the head of the Department of Justice during the World War. Whereas we are in acute need of better State and municipal police, an enlargement of the federal field would inevitably tend to weaken the local services. In recent years the Bureau of Identification of the Department of Justice has done excellent work in the way of collecting and distributing criminal records and acting as a clearing house of information useful to State and municipal police. Such work is capable of further expansion with promise of good results, but the recent conference of State Governors was well advised in refusing to indorse the project of a super police directed by the United States Government.

It is safe to say that the most effective way to reduce kidnappings is to apprehend a high proportion of the culprits, thus taking the profit out of the crime. So far as kidnapping for ransom is concerned—and that is the kind that is giving trouble nowadays—the crime will stop automatically the moment that it begins to result generally in financial failure, no matter whether the punishment provided is great or small. On the other hand, no punishment however severe, holds much terror if the perpetrator knows that the chance that he will be caught is slight. It is a question if fear of punishment ever weighs much in the mind of a prospective criminal anyhow. Either he believes that his lucky star is going to save him from capture and conviction, or else he envisages the future with indifference and a refusal to consider in any reasoning way the possibilities of his contemplated action.

The Assault on the Schoolhouse

THE plight of the teacher is discussed elsewhere in this issue in one of a series of articles dealing with the effect of the depression on the various professions. Even since this article was put into type, the distress of the school teacher—and of the college teacher, which will be treated next week—has become markedly aggravated. Chicago, flaunting its Century of Progress exhibition along the waterfront, has, through its political Board of Education, leveled the most destructive blow at primary and secondary education in the annals of any American city. It has voted to abolish all junior high schools, the Crane Junior College, swimming pools, the vocational guidance bureau, orchestral music, physical education in elementary schools, manual training and household arts in all elementary schools, and has dismissed 1,000 teachers.

The leading support for this campaign comes from the Chicago Tribune, long the most jingoistic, sinister force in the life of Chicago. Bellowing at all times for defense against every fancied foreign enemy and against "reds"—in which category it includes the most high-minded citizens who do not share the Tribune's reactionary views—it was complacent during the assaults against life, law, and order from the underworld gangsterism for which its own police reporter was the go-between. It was complacent too toward the Insulls, and the corruption which they fostered in the Mid-Western metropolis. Gangsters and banksters have seldom drawn the fire of the "World's Greatest Newspaper," but the hounded and harried school teachers, and that most truly American institution, that potential bulwark against the tyrannies of the right and left, the schoolhouse—these have been the objects of the Tribune's vicious attack.

Against this obscurantism, a higher type of Americanism has sought expression through the Chicago Daily News and the Hearst papers, and through mass meetings. Robert Maynard Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, has publicly demanded that the school board be driven out. Jane Addams and scores of other enlightened citizens have protested with utmost vigor against the closing of Crane Junior College with its 3,500 students—girls and boys who cannot afford the tuition fees of other institutions—and against the elimination of other indispensable adjuncts of modern education which the Tribune denounces as "frills and furbelows."

It should be noted further that it is under the leadership of Silas Strawn, Chicago corporation lawyer, that the United States Chamber of Commerce and other "business" groups, have with the declared objective of reducing taxation been conducting a campaign against our public educational system. Their recommendations include the reduction of high-school and elementary-school curricula by one year each, the shortening of the school year by a month, the shortening of the school day by one hour, the discontinuance of evening classes and kindergartens, increase in the size of classes (as if they were not already far too large), lengthening of teachers' hours, further reduction in teachers' salaries, and numerous other drastic "economies."

Of all the disastrous consequences of the depression, this assault on the coming generation's chance to secure a modicum of education is the most damnable. These would-be tax-slackers are public enemies who, while patrioteering at every opportunity, are themselves as unpatriotic a brood as exist in our society. They should be scourged from their positions of authority and influence by a wrathful public opinion, and education should not only be restored to its former place, but lifted to a new level of efficiency, dignity, and freedom.

Mortgage Relief

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S special message to the New York legislature on mortgage relief advocated measures most of which are desirable as far as they go. His chief recommendation was the enactment of a law establishing a moratorium on foreclosure proceedings for a period ending May 1, 1934, providing that tax payments and mortgage-interest payments are made in the meanwhile and that there is a default only on account of principal. The Governor also asked for a limitation on the amount of any deficiency judgment against defaulting mortgagors, the limitation being determined in accordance with a "fair value" of the properties involved as determined by a court. He recommended in addition that securities of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation be made legal investments for banks and insurance companies and for trust funds, and that banks, insurance companies, and trustees be authorized to exchange mortgages in their possession for bonds of the corporation.

As Henry Goldey pointed out in our issue of last week, the bonds of this corporation are so dubious in some respects that it is doubtful whether holders of mortgages more than covered by the value of the property would prefer to accept them rather than foreclose, even if granted the legal power to acquire them. Again, it may be asked—in view of the present great desire of all holders of mortgages "to get out from under" at the earliest opportunity, because of the general decline in real-estate values—whether a moratorium on principal payments of eight or nine months would be long enough to do a great deal of good. Governor Lehman, it is true, recommends that the moratorium run "at least" till May 1, 1934, and remarks that before the end of that time the legislature may determine whether a continuation of the moratorium is necessary and advisable. But as conditions in the real-estate field seem unlikely to change radically for the better in a mere nine months, it would add greatly to the present peace of mind of home owners if the moratorium were immediately made to run until May 1, 1935, or at least until January 1 of that year. This extension could be granted at very little risk, particularly as it would merely cover the repayment of principal and would not affect the income of mortgages from interest payments.

Finally, one may question the Governor's conclusion that a moratorium on interest payments themselves could only be harmful. Certainly this argument would apply against a moratorium permitting a general and total suspension of interest payments, but not against one permitting home owners in certain circumstances to pay somewhat less than the full interest due—especially as such a moratorium would not relieve them of their obligation to remit the unpaid balance at the end of the partial moratorium period.

Editors As Teachers

CHESTER S. LORD was his name, but "Boss" Lord was what they called him in the office of the New York Sun where he was for thirty-three years managing editor, and his men adored him. Although he was a master craftsman, when the news of his death came, the survivors among his disciples thought, we are sure, far more of the man, their friend and inspirer, than of his skill in the technique of his profession. One of them, long dead, once wrote of him that he was "calm, dispassionate, without the slightest atom of impulse, as wise as a serpent, as gentle as a dove," and that in all his years of authority he was never known "to utter an unkind word to any man on the paper, no matter how humble his station." If it seems strange to some that it should be necessary to say that a New York managing editor was both that and a gentleman, be it remembered that Mr. Lord labored in the days when many newspaper offices prided themselves on their utterly conscienceless and hard-boiled character and were not considered the real thing unless they were desolate, dirty, and generally devoid of manners and morals, with editors who considered cursing and rowdyism a necessary part of their trade.

But Mr. Lord was far more than a kindly newspaper executive. He had a rare gift for recognizing other men's talents and bringing out the best that was in them. He taught them a love of their work and of its tools. He nurtured in them a great pride in the daily which they helped to make, and together they created a newspaper which beyond question was the best written, the most brilliantly edited, and the liveliest news-sheet in its palmy days. Its staff was the envy of many competitors, who constantly sought to draw away from it "men trained by Lord." In most newspaper offices its arrival was more eagerly awaited than that of any other journal. Its stories were imitated, copied, stolen, "lifted." There was endless enjoyment of its sarcasm, its frequent bitterness, its all-pervading cynicism, its brilliance, its mastery of style, its extraordinarily intelligent and accurate reporting—when it wanted to be accurate. But the truth must also be told that it was anything but an ideal newspaper. It could be guilty of the most vindictive vendettas, the most flagrant misrepresentations. It stabbed men and women freely and then knew how to turn the dagger in their wounds in the most diabolical way.

The Sun of Charles A. Dana never was actuated by principle. It scoffed at many a verity, as it defied the moralities. It made vice attractive, as was often said, and naturally did little to advance its times or to improve the standards of its day. That it punctured humbugs and exposed many a bogus pretension is true, and that must be remembered to its credit. But when it was obsessed by a mortal antipathy toward any individual there was no length to which it would not go. It then seemed impossible that there could be even one man upon its staff in whom the milk of human kindness had not curdled. For these characteristics the credit and discredit belong, of course, to Charles A. Dana. But Chester S. Lord was not one to dissociate himself from his chief. However much the daily whose make-up he directed might appear to be in complete contrast to those high traits of character for which he was beloved by all who knew him well, Mr. Lord exalted his association with Mr. Dana, recalling with pride that "for seventeen years of my thirty-three years as managing editor I was Dana's right-hand man."

Of the powerful newspaper these men directed there is today not a trace. It cannot, however, be said that its lack of conscience and of morals killed it, for there is likewise nothing but tradition left of dailies whose standards were far superior. But we would not stress the question today of the relation of newspaper morality to longevity. It is a pleasanter task to point out the great opportunities for great teachers within newspaper offices profoundly to affect the growth and direct the education of the younger men who come under their influence. Mr. Lord achieved wonders in a bad school. In others such as the Manchester Guardian and, on this side of the Atlantic, the Springfield Republican and the Boston Herald—of earlier days—men were profoundly molded, and not merely as brilliant writers and technicians, by the great personalities at the head of the staff.

Not even the professor in his class room has such opportunities as has an editor to form and develop the men around him. That is not merely due to the close daily association year in and year out; the making of a great journal is a daily grappling with life, with every phase of the world's activity, with all its triumphs and all its sorrows and disasters. It is a joint enterprise for all concerned, in which few can take part, even as office boys, without a sense of comradeship in adventure. If then there are leaders in the shop, whether with or without scruple, it is a fact that they have extraordinary chances to rally to themselves those about them. There is a joint sense of being on the firing-line, even one of being on the defensive as well as the offensive, since the newspaper, whenever it leaves the press, is subject to the critical barrage of its readers. This again makes for the closest ties among its workers as well as affording endless opportunities for the best of generalship.

It is pleasant to record that in the case of Mr. Lord his obituaries have stressed the kindly human side; not the evil that he helped to do has lived after him but the good. So in England men mourn today C. P. Scott and Henry W. Massingham, whose journalistic standards were so high and beyond reproach that men consider it their proudest boast to say that they worked for Scott's "M. G." and "H. W. M.'s Nation." Fortunately, the list of similar American editors who have placed conscience and courage above success is not small.

Issues and Men

Why Do Public Men Rationalize?

I AM moved to ask this question by the extraordinary expression of opinions by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister MacDonald apropos the end of the World Economic Conference. MacDonald would not only not admit failure, he declared that the conference was not even adjourned; it had merely ended one session without specifying when it would meet again! As for our President, he had not a doubt. "I do not regard the economic conference as a failure," he telegraphed to London. "Results are not always measured in terms of formal agreements," he also said. "They can come equally from a free presentation of each nation's difficulties and each nation's methods to meet its individual needs." In other words, he assured the world that those wasted weeks, which his own acts doomed to futility, were really not wasted at all but had accomplished something worth while, expecting that everyone who read the press of the world would have forgotten his own fervent assertions that the conference must accomplish a great deal in order to save the world from complete disaster, as well as Ramsay MacDonald's and Cordell Hull's almost hysterical appeals to the conference to save our civilization. I very much prefer the brutal truth of a man I have no use for at all—Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, the Nazi head of the German Reichsbank. Speaking over the radio from Berlin, he flatly called the conference a complete failure and answered MacDonald by declaring that Germany would not again participate in a world conference, but only in smaller gatherings devoted to specific purposes.

Now I well know all the stock excuses that will be offered for Mr. Roosevelt's performance—that he could not publicly admit failure; that he wisely kept alive the hope that there was still some life in the conference; that in view of the preconference prophecies of world disaster if it failed, it was necessary for him to head off any feeling of complete despair. But when all is said and done, his statement boils down to complete deceit and such obvious and silly deceit that it is bound to do far more harm to his standing and reputation than any good that might be achieved by his telegram. The conference was in session too short a time for people to forget the words with which it was ushered in; certainly nobody in public life in any part of Europe can have read that telegram from Washington without ribald laughter. But it is true that what Roosevelt did is precisely what most heads of governments, at least those of Anglo-Saxon stock, would have done in his place. Herbert Hoover was certainly a master in the art of misleading public statements and there is no more striking example of this kind of self-deceit—when it is that—and rationalizing than President Wilson's assurance to the American people, on his return from Paris, that the bastard peace treaty he brought back with him embodied each and every point that he had gone to Paris to achieve.

If in the case of Woodrow Wilson it was self-deceit to keep up his own fervent belief that he was beyond the possibility of error or failure, in other cases in recent years this rationalizing by our Presidents is due primarily to the fact that when men take high office they feel themselves freed from the ordinary moralities and decencies. They find that the diplomatic game is largely one of bluff, lying, and deceit, of stealing secrets and private dispatches, and they assume too readily the same attitude toward their other relations with the public. I am told that to one who in the Belgian relief days charged Herbert Hoover to his face with lying, Hoover with admirable frankness replied that he would never think of doing so to his own advantage or that of any other member of his family, but that the cause in which they were engaged warranted a disregard of truth. Nothing could put the case more clearly. Soon after that we were in the war, and lying became the chief activity of the United States Government on the quite defensible ground that you could not win the war in any other way, especially since every other government was devoting its best energies to just that thing.

Is it any wonder that statesmen in peace time continue to think that the Commandments do not apply to them when they are working for the welfare of great masses of human beings, when they know so perfectly just how high-minded and altruistic they, the statesmen, are? Here we have one of the pitfalls of men in high office, especially to be illustrated by Mr. Hoover and Mr. Wilson—this dreadful certainty that they cannot be wrong, that they cannot make mistakes, that they alone know what is right and what is best for the people of whom they are so properly and justly the guardians. Here is where the deadly, character-wrecking influence of high office and vast authority over millions of one's fellow-men does its most effective work—in the swelling of the ego until we sometimes get a pathological case. It does not take long for the king, crowned or uncrowned, to believe, with all his heart and with complete sincerity, that he can do no wrong. There are exceptions—Harding, for instance. He knew too well his own limitations and shortcomings and his feet were much too solidly on earth for him to be able to persuade himself that he was anything but a very ordinary politician washed up into the White House by a fortunate series of political deals. But in the main, given the type of man who now usually finds his way to high office it is just a matter of calculation how long it will be before the symptoms will appear.

None the less I am sorry to see them appearing so early in Franklin Roosevelt. It seems to me that he would today stand much better with the American people and the world if he had issued a statement that read something like this:

Fellow-Citizens, I am profoundly sorry that the World Conference for which we had such high hopes, has come to nothing, especially as I am charged in many quarters at home and abroad with responsibility for the failure. I can see now that it was a mistake to have it meet without previous agreement upon an exact agenda and finding out in advance some measures upon which all the participants could agree. I must admit guilt, too, in that after the conference met, our own circumstances, and the conditions of our recovery changed so much that I had to alter my opinion as to what the conference should do in the matter of currency stabilization. I am also sorry that I did it with so much heat and feeling. But while the failure of the conference is a disaster and very much jeopardizes the world's recovery, I have not lost hope, so successful is our plan for recovery and so evident are the signs in other countries of rapid improvement.

But a simple, honest, gentlemanly gesture like this is not to be expected of a president or a prime minister; it does not go with the job. Indeed I am not a bit surprised to read that the President is more pleased by his abominably rude, unjust, and inconsistent attack upon the conference for undertaking to do just what he asked it to do than by anything else he has done. The press reports that he is convinced that the American people, or the majority of them, are delighted with the swift kick that he administered to the conference. They rejoice that he told those European welchers "where they got off," so he is entirely content. Why not? The king, I repeat, can do no wrong.

It is just because of this danger that I worry so much over the indications that we are in for a "stand-by-the-President" hysteria, with everybody being denounced as unpatriotic who does not throw up his hat for the N.R.A. and get a blue eagle into his front window instantly. That isn't kindness to the President. His friends can do him no better service than to criticize quietly and efficiently and earnestly, when there is something to criticize. No Administration is safe without criticism; the best man in the world will go wrong if there are no checks upon him, and the best check remains that of honest dissent publicly expressed. If Mr. Roosevelt does not encounter that he is going to fall into a lot of errors besides the Home Loan Act.

Quoted Garrison Village

Mine War in Pennsylvania

By DANIEL ALLEN

Fayette County, Pa., August 6

FROM the H. C. Frick mines in Fayette County the coal strike has spread swiftly and spontaneously into Washington, Westmoreland, Greene, and Alleghany Counties. The entire soft-coal and coke region has been affected; 70,000 miners have struck and as many as 150 mines have shut down. Passing up and down the Monongahela River, one sees the unsmoking shafts, the huge steam shovels drawn up, the coalwagons and trains bunched motionless, and along the highways into the mine country the long lines of the pickets. There they sit and stand and walk in small compact groups at the entrances to the mines, or trail for long stretches on the road, sticking to the narrow dirt side-ways. This is a rank-and-file strike, a picket strike, and the haggling of their leaders seem here spurious and irrelevant.

This strike is like the war in China: it has never been declared. John L. Lewis had agreed to wait till the code was issued. Local leaders have been discouraging the walk-outs. "But we just had to walk out," they tell you all along the line. The H. C. Frick mines have always been anti-union. Men who attended union meetings found themselves on an unsought furlough. In the past few years the miners here and elsewhere have been so ill paid that many who were working had to be put on relief. They got nothing for dead time—for work, that is, other than the actual loading of the wagons—and they could be put to such work for entire days. There was this business of slack wagon and dirty coal, where they didn't overload or "hump" their wagons enough and were docked, or where some of the dust still clung to the coals and they got nothing for the mining and loading. Men known for their union activity were assigned to posts where, crowded together and jammed close to the wagons, they couldn't help having slack wagons. When, lately, operations in idle mines were being resumed, the men were still being docked for one thing or another, with money off for insurance, for back rent, for back relief, and back taxes. Storekeepers in Brownsville tell me of sixty-nine-cent pay envelopes. The union then became a bread-and-butter necessity. It was no matter of propaganda and organization. The men were driven together. It had to be the union or nothing. The checkweighman grievance, however keenly the men feel about it, is subordinated to the recognition of the union, and they resent the efforts of John L. Lewis to make this grievance the big issue on which alone to settle the strike. "We'll take one dollar a day if once we've got union recognition."

I was in the lines with the strikers when they received the news of the Washington agreement. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of the next day, Saturday, speaks of the "lusty cheers from the throats of the tired pickets for Roosevelt, Pinchot, and the New Deal." I didn't hear any cheers. "It's funny they know all about the strike being over, and we don't," was what they said. It would not be over till they had union recognition. Lewis's signature was of no account.

They find the unaccustomed words difficult—recognition, code, recovery. They are slow of speech. But they do not resent my questioning them sharply, insistently. Among the younger men, some no more than boys, there are those who speak freely and brightly. "What right has Lewis to settle a strike he refuses to call?" A sign bears the words, "This is 1933, not 1922," harking back to the time when Lewis is said to have sold them out. "For how much?" is the grim question. But this time it is different. It is their strike. Much has been made of their patriotism. They do look to Roosevelt and the New Deal. The idea of an Administration favorable to organized labor has won them over. In their own immediate neighborhood they know the impossibility of a partnership of capital and labor. There in Washington it may be. But Roosevelt is on probation. He will have to show himself a labor man.

It is easy to see how a corrupt and reactionary leadership has been able to gain the support of these men and to keep it. Most of them have a strong feeling of inferiority.

When I question them, it is hard getting past their inevitable, "I don' know nothin' 'bout that." For intricate dealings with the companies and representations to the outside world they feel a glibber speech and a more worldly experience are needed. A divergence of interests is even taken for granted. They can tolerate a great deal. But they are learning. There is a desire stirring in the ranks now to oust their present leadership when they have succeeded in establishing the union. They will in one breath speak of loyalty to their leaders, local and national, and in the next ask what sort of leadership it can be which disclaims responsibility for a rank-and-file strike. The strike has produced its own leaders, strong, close, cautious, bitter men; such a one is Martin Ryan at Colonial No. 3 and 4. A sense of solidarity with their fellow-workers in other fields is developing among the men. The Leith miners helped call out on strike the girls at the Berkowitz Shirt Company in Uniontown. A word about the dairymen's strike in New York State sets them tingling. They have been able to catch a glimpse of insidious interrelationships about them. Certain newspapers are banned as company sheets. Over at the Mellon-controlled Pittsburgh Coal mine at Crescent, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette had distributed gratis its headline celebrations of the formation of a company, or "Amos-and-Andy," union. At Colonial No. 3 where Padorsky had been murdered by deputies, cameramen were present when deputies sneaked up over the mound above the road and pelted the pickets with stones. This picture was not taken. The men remember these things and have begun to resent newspapermen. They are quick to detect a hostile or a patronizing attitude. They refused indignantly to pose with beer jugs for a New York Daily News correspondent. "This is no goddam beer party," they said. "We'll give you a strikers' picture, that's all we'll give you."

Louis Padorsky's funeral came the day after Lewis agreed to call the strike off. The roads to Brownsville are long lines of cars and demonstrating marchers. The talk in the procession is all of the strike settlement. There are the timid and the militant. I ask a young miner from a Hillman Coal mine what would be the result of another Lewis sell-out. "The National Miners," he answers shortly. "We'll go back," somebody else says, "if the President of the United States tells us to go back." And a third, "We ain't goin' back till we got recognition of the union." "We aren't Bolsheviks," the first miner tells me, and he points to the wooden houses on their brick bases, the porches with their inevitable swings and rocking chairs, and he points to the rolling brown and blue and green of the hills and valleys and the pinkish mist of the mountain ridge on the horizon, and he asks me, "Do we look like Bolsheviks? Does this look like Bolshevik country?" And he sets his jaws stubbornly, "But we want the right to live like human beings."

The operators, the Administration, and the labor leaders are plenty worried over the mood of the men. They have reason to be. In the towns the people tell you the miners mean business as never before. The left-wing National Miners Union is everywhere urging the men not to quit till the strike has been genuinely won. Will the men go back? They may, they may already have gone back by the time this is published. But all around me I hear, "This strike is just beginning." If they do not go back what will happen to President Roosevelt's merry partnership of capital and labor? The class struggle has not yet been exorcised.

Labor Racketeering

By HAROLD SEIDMAN

THE National Industrial Recovery Act forces employers to be fair in their dealings with labor, but what is going to protect labor from the tyranny of corrupt leaders who have long ruled over many unions? A Tammany sachem could not do a more thorough job than the labor bosses who reign supreme by means of gangsters, graft, machine-made constitutions, and judiciously distributed patronage. Under the leadership of these unscrupulous officials both local and international, every known type of racketeering flourishes. Most of the union czars have risen from the ranks. Once in power they are confronted by numerous temptations. They have the characteristic American love for easy money, and politicians and equally corrupt employers are willing to supply them with plenty of it in return for "favours." Unfortunately, union leadership in this country is for the most part notoriously lacking in social conscience, and more often than not union officials use their position to further their own interests.

Tribute exacted from both the employers and union members swells the already oversized incomes of labor racketeers who, according to federal estimates, are entrenched in forty-seven trades. Protesting victims are soon silenced by strong-arm squads, and the czar's political influence is usually sufficient to quash any court action. To date only two of these racketeers have been brought to justice. Sam Kaplan, president of Local 306 of the Motion Picture Operators, was found guilty of coercion, and Patrick J. Commerford of the Union of Operating Engineers, a Tammany leader, ran afoul of that bugaboo of all racketeers—the income-tax law.

The salaries paid to the union officials are out of all proportion to the service they perform. Sam Kaplan, who spent one or two days a week in the union office, received $21,800 a year, and his successor, Harry Sherman, was granted a salary of $18,000. No previous president of Local 306 had ever received more than $250 a year. P. J. Morrin, president of the International Association of Bridge, Structural, and Ornamental Iron Workers is paid $15,000 a year, all necessary expenses, and $12 a day for daily expenses. Louis Kaufmann, business agent of Local 244 of the Motion Picture Operators, is said to receive $14,000 a year. Although the majority of the union members are now unemployed, the salaries have not been reduced during the depression.

In addition to their salaries, the czars receive other monetary benefits from the union. Over a five-year period Kaplan was "voted gifts" amounting to $55,000 by the union. Three weeks after his last "gift" of $25,000, Kaplan announced to the startled brotherhood that the union was broke. Officials of unions are also usually allowed from $30 to $50 a month for the upkeep of luxurious automobiles presented to them by the union. In one New Jersey local the president had $300 worth of dental work done at the union's expense. Yet the labor racketeer has not been satisfied with his seemingly adequate stipend and has found other lucrative sources of income.

Incomes of the large unions run into huge sums. The boss has complete charge of this money and rarely accounts for expenditures. Members of Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Engineers brought a suit against the local officials to account for $7,500,000 of union funds, much of which they claimed had been used illegitimately. This is the same union which contrary to all union principles entered into an agreement with the New York Edison Company not to organize its employees. Jacob S. Solomon, secretary of the organizing committee of Local 3, admitted that he had secretly destroyed the vouchers and records of the expenditures of close to $1,500,000 between 1926 and 1930 because he feared that "spies" would gain access to the records, and Wilson, the president, agreed that considerably more than $1,000,000 had been spent without authorization. In 1926 before H. H. Broach, who has just resigned as head of the International, took office, the union spent $2,130 in legal fees; between 1927 and 1930, Broach spent $532,000 for legal services. The case for an accounting was suddenly settled last fall. According to a letter sent to Police Commissioner Mulrooney by a committee of the union, "the accounting case was settled by guaranteeing the men who brought the action one year's work in addition to a cash settlement."

Sam Kaplan made no accounting during his entire term of office. He was held in contempt of court by Judge May for failure to produce the books of the union. In a case now pending trial, members of suspended Local 52 of the Iron Workers charge that John M. Schilling financial secretary of the local for twenty-four years, never gave an accounting during all this time. They found the auditor's report he presented this year unsatisfactory, and allege that Schilling refuses to account for $100,000 of the union's money.

To enrich the treasury of Local 306 further, Kaplan introduced the permit system by which non-union men are allowed to work on union jobs. This was done without the consent or knowledge of the members of the union. Under his rule there were 600 permit men who paid initiation fees ranging from $500 to $1,000 and 20 per cent of their salaries to the union. Permit men receive much lower wages than the regular card holders, and have absolutely no voice in union councils. They are not recognized as union members, but they are liable for certain levies and assessments. Harry Sherman, the new president, is now making an effort to reform this system which is still maintained in Local 306.

Tom Maloy employed the same system in Local 110 of the Motion Picture Operators of Chicago. Non-union men claimed that they could obtain jobs by paying Maloy or his representative, Pete Kitcheos, sums ranging from $450 to $1,000. However, they soon found themselves out of work again if they did not continue to pay tribute to Maloy after the initial instalment. If the permit man lost his job, he had to give Maloy another huge "gift" to obtain work. In addition to this, the permit men gave 10 per cent of all their earnings to Local 110. Permit men occupy jobs which ordinarily would go to the regular members of the union.

Many unemployed card men are willing to take a permit man's job, but they cannot get them. In Chicago men who had been members of the union since 1910 were without work while permit men held good jobs. Pleas to the local officials were unavailing.

Another racket practiced by union officials is to send a man out on a job paying, say, $100 a week. The employers pay this money not to the worker, but to an official of the local who gives the worker a salary of $50 a week and pockets the other $50. The employee pays 10 per cent of his $50 into the union treasury. Even workers who receive starvation wages must pay part of their pittance to the union for protection. Thirteen complainants, seven of whom were women, brought charges against the Teamsters and Chauffeurs Union in Hudson County, New Jersey. The affidavits alleged that the women, who were cleaners and pressers, were forced to pay from one dollar to two dollars as weekly fees to what was termed a cleaners' branch of the union for the privilege of working unmolested. Some of the women's salaries amounted in all to only five or six dollars a week.

Employers also contribute their share to the labor czar's revenue. Kaplan, Brandle, and Fay, in addition to being representatives of the workers, were also big business men. Sam Kaplan was head of a non-union company which manufactured projection machines. Brandle, fourth vice-president of the International Union of Iron Workers, was president of the Labor National Bank of Jersey City and an officer of the Branleygran Company, dealers in insurance and bonds. The Branleygran Company, which was the second largest holding company in the State, wrote bonds for construction work. Joseph Fay, head of Local 825 of the Union of Operating Engineers, was part owner of the International Excavating Company which rented out ten dump trucks and several steam shovels to building contractors. The wise employer patronized these firms. John Springer of the Springer-Cocalis theater circuit stated that although the prices of Sam Kaplan's company were higher than the prices of his competitors, we thought it a wise policy to pay much higher prices to Sam Kaplan's company and insure freedom from labor troubles in our theaters. Our records further show that when we gave all of our business to Sam Kaplan's company, no attempts to unionize our theaters were made, but that when we ceased to patronize Sam Kaplan's company, the attempts of Local 306 to unionize our theaters became aggressive and were marked by violence.

An amusing story is told of how one of the trucks from Sam Kaplan's company drove up to instal equipment in the Ward theater in the Bronx when that theater was being picketed by Kaplan's own union. Union theaters which patronized Kaplan's firm were allowed to employ one card man at $85 a week and four permit men at $45 to $50 a week. Others had to use five regular men at $85 a week.

"Gifts" to the union boss usually prevent all labor difficulties. Patrick J. Commerford, vice-president of the Building Trades Council and delegate at large of the International Union of Operating Engineers, was on the pay roll of several non-union companies. The Carlton Hoisting Company paid him $25 a week in 1927 and $50 a week in 1928 and 1929 to keep it free of labor trouble. The cash was kept in a safe until a sizable amount accumulated and then Commerford would call for it. The United Hoisting Company paid Commerford $75 a week for the same services. These gifts were for protection against Commerford's own union.

Strike breaking was another of Commerford's specialties. He received $7,000 from the W. R. Gahagan Company to call off a strike, and $5,000 from R. J. Murphy Company to break up a strike at Jones Beach. Theodore Brandle and officials of other New Jersey locals of the Iron Workers split a $10,000 "gift" from the Iron League of New Jersey. Brandle was also director general of the Iron League, an employers' organization. He said he was going "to serve both sides."

The czar, who exercises absolute control of the distribution of jobs, preserves his power by giving the best ones to his supporters. Members of the opposition soon find themselves unemployed. Local 11 of the Newark Iron Workers used the "card-index" system for the purpose of discrimination. Under the "card-index" system a worker may receive a job only when the card bearing his name appears at the head of the file. When he receives work his card is moved to the end of the file. A job given to a favorite might last for several months, while a member not in the good graces of the officials of the union might receive work only lasting a day and yet have to wait his turn before receiving another job. Chancellor Berry said that workers in this union were oppressed almost to the point of serfdom. Sam Kaplan appointed the business agents of Local 306, and the business agents distributed the jobs. No member of Local 3 of the Electrical Workers was permitted to accept employment without permission of the local officials. Other bosses use the same methods.

If a member persists in his attacks on the administration, he is soon suspended or expelled from the union and loses his means of livelihood. Many union constitutions are so written that the czar can always find a pretext for suspending or expelling a member. A member can be fined hundreds of dollars, suspended, or expelled for "improper conduct," "committing a nuisance," "using his own automobile in a manner considered unfair to other members or against the best interests of the local," "creating or attempting to create dissatisfaction or dissension," "disturbing the harmony of meetings," "using profane language in the property of the local union," "revealing the business of the union to outsiders," and "attending any meetings or conferences having for their purpose the criticism of any officers or representatives of the district council." The Iron Workers must also take the following oath: "I will at all times be respectful in word and action to every woman, and be considerate to the widow and orphan, the weak and the defenseless." The constitutions are often drawn up by hand-picked committees selected by the czar.

Joseph Blek was suspended from Local 3 of the Electrical Workers on the charge of working with non-union men. The men were actually members of his own union, and Judge Martin stated in his opinion that "the alleged charges were merely a pretext to discipline the plaintiff." Fourteen members of the same union who attended a meeting for "the restoration of union rights of Local 3" were suspended for a year and fined $300 each. Alexander Polin was beaten up and expelled from Kaplan's union for asking for an accounting.

Although Judge Peter Schmuck declared that unions which expelled their members for taking their grievances to court were not only "ridiculous" but were "assuming governmental authority which would not be tolerated by the government," yet most unions still provide for the immediate expulsion of members who go to court before exhausting their resources within the union. Union trials (and often the conviction is had without any) are notorious farces. The highest authority to which a member can appeal is the international convention which is held every two, three, or four years, provided it is not postponed to save expenses. The convicted member may wait as long as eight years before being heard, and then there is little likelihood of the original decision being reversed. In the Carpenters Union during the last eight years 102 appeals were taken to the executive board from the rulings of the international president. In every case the decision of the international head was confirmed.

If the opposition does succeed in wresting the power from the czar, the international often steps in and suspends the local; and another union is established in the same territory with the ousted officials in power. The constitution of the Iron Workers contains the following clause:

The general president shall, whenever in his judgment subordinate bodies or the members thereof are working against the best interest of the International Association, have the power to order said body to disband or cease such practices under penalty of revocation of charter. He may personally, or by deputy take possession of, for examination, all books, papers, and financial accounts of all subordinate bodies.

The president of the Electrical Workers has the same power.

Patrick J. Commerford was appointed supervisor of Local 125 of the International Union of Operating Engineers by President Possehl to "eliminate graft and corruption." The same system was installed in eighteen other locals. Commerford appointed all the officers and there were no elections. When the union rebelled and removed Commerford, Local 125 was suspended and a new Local 130 was formed with Commerford as its supervisor. He informed contractors that they must deal with the new local. A similar procedure has apparently been followed in the case of Local 52 of the Iron Workers. When John M. Schilling, a vice president of the International, was not reelected financial secretary, Local 52 was suspended and a new Local 447 was formed with Schilling as financial secretary.

Gangsters and strong-arm men are employed by the racketeers to intimidate the members of the union. Kaplan had four bodyguards whose salaries were paid out of the union treasury. Men who became too obstreperous at meetings were silenced by these thugs. One of them, Teddy Greenberg, was sentenced to six months for assaulting Cecil Woods, Jr., a member of the opposition party of Local 306, but Kaplan saw to it that the union continued to pay Greenberg his salary of $125 a week during his term of imprisonment. Henry Godel, an active critic of the officers of Local 3 of the Electrical Workers, was recently murdered. Sternburg, Young, Clohessy, Martin, Terry, and Malone were all severely beaten up, and Sorenson and Dooner were shot in the union offices. A member of the union who testified in court against Van Arsdale, who was accused of shooting Sorenson, had acid thrown in his face and lost the sight of his right eye. Dissenters in Local 110 of the Motion Picture operators met similar fates.

A fight between the Touhys gangsters and the Humphreys gangsters to gain control of the teamsters union in Chicago provided even more spectacular displays of violence. Eighty-three-year-old Steve Summer, an officer of the union for more than thirty years, had bullet-proof glass windows in his home, steel mesh on the windows, and a porthole for a rifle in the door to protect him against invaders. One mob drove up to the union headquarters with a battery of machine guns, automatic shotguns, and revolvers and announced "we are taking over the place for the day." They were driven out a few days later in a counter revolution. Sass and Goldberg, officers of the union, were abducted, and the home of Arthur Metzger, a business agent, was bombed when he refused "a fabulous salary to retire and revoke the union's membership in the American Federation of Labor." There were seven bombings in forty-eight hours at the height of the guerrilla warfare.

Union treasuries are milked by the czars not only to defend themselves, but their gangsters. Greenberg was defended on numerous occasions by high-priced union lawyers. Each member of Local 306 was assessed $21 to provide a $25,000 fee for Max Steuer who defended Sam Kaplan against an indictment based on charges made by members of the union. Kaplan also spent $3,000 a week for an intensive advertising campaign to "maintain the reputation of Local 306." The administration of Local 3 of the Electrical Workers requested $1,500 for the legal defense of Constantino who was accused of shooting Sorenson and Dooner. When a member moved to use the $1,500 for the medical expenses of Sorenson, he was ruled out of order.

International officers have done little to remedy the situation. Instead, they often give aid and comfort to unscrupulous officials by laying all dissension within the unions to "radicals" and "labor spies." At the convention in 1932, P. J. Morrin, International President of the Iron Workers, said that in the Eastern section of the country, especially the Newark [Brandle] district, our organization has been cursed with a lot of radical activities which have kept that organization embroiled in internal conflict for the past two years. They have kept up constant wrangling and dissension within the ranks of their local union accompanied by radical bulldozing tactics seeking either to rule or ruin. I myself visited our Newark local union and pointed out to them the dangers of permitting their internal dissension to continue, and the dangers of permitting these dissensionists to lurk within their ranks. I urged them to forget their differences and disregard the wild, radical propaganda made to them by radical members within their own ranks.

Morrin apparently changed his mind about the source of the troubles in the Newark unions this June when he removed Brandle, Sherlock, and the other officials for misuse of powers.

H. H. Broach attributed the trouble in Local 3 to the work of "labor spies." The June, 1932, issue of the Journal of Electrical Workers bore on its cover the legend, "Union Destroyers Exposed." A series of obviously faked letters from one "G. Edgar Applegate" of the "American Financiers Protective and Investigation Bureau" to his agent "Bartly" were published in this issue. No record of the concern or of Applegate has ever been found. Broach asserted that he had several investigating organizations working, and promised further "startling results."

When anyone discloses the rotten conditions within a union, he is immediately branded as a union destroyer and enemy of labor. The Electrical Workers Journal launched a vicious attack against Louis Budenz, one of the most conscientious and highly respected workers in the American labor movement, because he criticized the administration of Local 3 in an article for Labor Age. Bugniatet, the editor of the Journal, claimed among other things that "Budenz almost ruined the Hosiery Workers financially, and was forming an outlaw group in Philadelphia known as Hosiery Workers Branch No. 1." Budenz's suit for libel is now pending trial. Many people have hesitated to expose the labor racketeers because they feared that they would be accused of attempting to undermine the structure of the trade-union movement in the United States.

Complaints by members of labor unions have received little sympathy from authorities representing a corrupt political machine in New York. District Attorney Crain was very slow to act on the Kaplan case. Waiters of Local 1 who complained that they were being forced to pay from $100 to $300 for jobs which lasted only six weeks were turned away from Crain's office. One of them, Ben Glast, embarrassed the District Attorney's office by taking the law into his own hands and shooting two agents of the union. Daly, head of the complaint bureau, gave the lame excuse that "he had not gone into the matter to protect the union members, and it was considered wiser to let the complaining waiters handle the early stages of the prosecution themselves."

All union czars have powerful political connections which probably explains in some degree the reluctance of the public prosecutors to act. Tom Farley of tin-box fame, the sheriff ousted by former Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt, was dictator of the Cleaning and Dyeing Industry at a salary of $50,000 a year, and was an honorary member of Kaplan's union. Kaplan instructed his men to vote the straight Democratic ticket, and purchased five motion-picture sound trucks with union funds to aid the Democratic Party in its 1930 campaign. Former Senator Baird said that Brandle and Hague were the "owners" of the Democratic Party in New Jersey. It was Brandle's certified check for $60,000 that settled Hague's income-tax difficulties. Tom Farley, former sheriff Charles W. Culkin, and District Leader James Hines were reported to be the political angels of Local 3 of the Electrical Workers. Pat Commerford was himself a Tammany leader.

Organization of workers has been greatly stimulated by the National Industrial Recovery Act, and the labor racketeer is looking forward to even more lucrative pickings in the future. The American Federation of Labor, a fundamentally weak organization, has not the power to act. All President Green can do is issue proclamations and make recommendations. He has been doing this during the past two years with negligible results. It is extremely difficult to amend the present constitutions of the unions, and this precludes all possibility that the unions will be able to do their own housecleaning.

If labor is to be properly represented in drawing up the codes of fair practice and in collective bargaining, the federal government must find the means of driving out the labor racketeer. One may doubt that the committee to investigate racketeering headed by Senator Copeland of Tammany Hall will be capable of finding the solution.

The NRA Speeds Up

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, August 5

THE recovery program is very definitely under way. Despite the sullen and bitter opposition of the steel, oil, coal, and lumber barons, and the financiers who actually control them; despite the idle sniping of lily-fingered "liberals" who will be satisfied with nothing less than paradise by high noon; despite poisoned arrows from without and monkey wrenches from within, it is moving with astonishing speed. I say astonishing, although no one is astonished who is familiar with the terrific labor and devotion back of the program and the dire suffering which it aims to end. If I were a prophet instead of a humble reporter of events, I should not only say that it will succeed, but that it will serve as a transition stage to an early socialization of industry on a scale which no living adult could reasonably have hoped, twelve months ago, to witness. Such a statement may seem optimistic to those who are still thinking in the outworn, conventional, standard political terms of 1932, but I question whether anyone who is not a first-hand observer can appreciate the changes which have taken place here. Perhaps it is all a gigantic fraud, or a fantastic dream, but the persons in it appear to be very real, and extremely familiar.

* * * * *

IT would be cruel to describe in detail the holy show which Frances Perkins and Donald Richberg made of the steel magnates. It has been common knowledge for a good many years that the industry was not oversupplied with brains, but why it should have chosen poor old Bob Lamont to give an example of what one NRA official described as "the complicated stupidity which characterized the Hoover Administration," must forever remain a mystery. As an eye-witness of the spectacle, I can testify to its ghastliness. Even the lame drama of renouncing its claim for government sanction of company unions was spoiled in advance for the industry. Lamont's halting plea for the steel code was simply ripped to pieces by Miss Perkins, and Richberg completed Lamont's humiliation by asking a series of schoolboy questions which he lacked either the knowledge or the authority to answer. The decorum of the procedure was almost destroyed by a succession of volcanic guffaws which resounded along the press tables. The fact is that the code submitted by the steel industry was regarded from the beginning by recovery officials as an insult or a very poor joke. For the steel men to have supposed that they could obtain government sanction of company unions, reinstatement of a modified "Pittsburg-plus" price-basing system, and prohibition of any equipment reducing the cost of production, was simply another evidence of "the complicated stupidity" which seems to characterize most large business undertakings in this country. The fact is that the steel industry is in very bad grace with the recovery administration. It will be given one more opportunity—and a brief one—to show signs of repentance. Very few informed persons in this vicinity expect it to take advantage of that opportunity, in view of the United States Steel Corporation's responsibility for the recent bloodshed in Pennsylvania. What will happen then? Johnson and Roosevelt will simply prescribe a new steel code—and the industry will be confronted with the choice of accepting it or declaring a revolution against the New Deal.

* * * * *

AS I have possibly intimated, there are many phases of this situation which entertain and satisfy. Consider, for example, the spectacle of the power trust rushing to Washington to plead for the protection of a code. The power trust, of course, is one of the few industries which has not been hurt by the depression. In some mysterious way it has managed to maintain rates, while cutting wages. But suddenly it is afraid. Whether this is conscience or a consciousness of guilt, I cannot say, but the result is the same. The oil people, with their eternal—and internal—bickering, have just about succeeded in making out a good case for the nationalization of that industry. It is my guess that Johnson, after listening to them for several days, will let them stew in their own juice for a week, and then prescribe a code for them. The oil industry is almost impossible. The big producers cannot agree with the "independents," the States cannot agree with each other, and State officials cannot agree among themselves. At this time it looks as if Johnson and Roosevelt eventually will be compelled to tell them how to run their business.

* * * * *

THE big hurdle which has always confronted the recovery program was the possibility of a court injunction. Johnson dodged this very cleverly by devising the "voluntary" blanket agreement, an alternative to the licensing system authorized by the act. However, Secretary Wallace and Administrator Peek of the Department of Agriculture elected to meet the problem head on—as if to prove, perhaps, that the administration of agriculture is a little bit tougher than the administration of industry. As a result, the whole program is now confronted with the possibility of an injunction by the most reactionary federal judge in the United States—Wilkerson, of Chicago, the man Harry Daugherty put on the bench. Whether Wilkerson will have the nerve to issue such an order is questionable. It can hardly be doubted that he is very bitter against the recovery administration. Richberg was mainly responsible for blocking his promotion by Hoover to the Circuit Court of Appeals. It will be interesting to see whether he is moved more by vindictiveness or fear. I am of the opinion that Wallace and Peek acted somewhat obstinately and injudiciously. The milk racketeers of Chicago afforded a serious problem, but the matter could have been handled in smoother fashion.

* * * * *

AFTER listening to the representatives of the steel and oil industries I thought I had heard from the most benighted and reactionary elements of American industry. But that was a mistake. The Honorable Harry New, Postmaster-General under Warren Harding and Calvin Coolidge, who was no saint himself, once remarked bitterly in private that of all the greedy, selfish, grasping crew with which he had been compelled to deal, nobody could touch the newspaper publishers. They were not satisfied to have the government transport their product at cost—it must be transported at a loss to the government. They were always looking for the “chiseler’s percentage.” In the present situation they have run true to type. They have whined, threatened, and attempted something close to blackmail. The agreement submitted to Johnson by a committee of the American Newspaper Publishers Association was a joke. It would have prolonged child labor on the ground that a boy should be permitted to keep his newspaper route; would have exempted editorial workers on the ground that they are “professional men” (although they are not required to undergo technical training, have no freedom as to hours of labor, do not charge fees for their services, and have no organization or code of ethics), and would have excepted mechanical workers under contract. Recovery officials have hesitated to use the big stick on newspaper owners for fear that they would sabotage the whole program. I consider this fear to be entirely groundless. In one five-minute speech on the radio Roosevelt could break the back of every newspaper slacker in the country. As a matter of fact, their situation has already become extremely delicate. Their pages are filled with advertisements which flaunt the Blue Eagle, but it is missing from their mastheads. I recognize the existence of an honorable minority. But for every Patterson, Pulitzer, or Stern, for every Milwaukee Journal, there are a dozen like Harry Chandler, Howard Davis, and Frank B. Noyes. In the end Johnson may be compelled to bring the newspapers under a code designed for a profession at least more ancient and possibly as honorable as journalism.

The Teacher Faces the Depression

By EUNICE LANGDON

ON April 27, according to the New York Times, Paul Schneider, aged forty-four, a sick and crippled Chicago school teacher, shot himself to death. His widow, left with three children, stated that he had not been paid for eight months, that his property had depreciated, groceries which his family needed could be bought only on wage assignment, and worry had aggravated his illness. Less than a month after Paul Schneider’s discouragement drove him to suicide, the militant action of the Chicago teachers—patient no longer—in invading the banks and refusing to be distracted or amused by the picturesque profanity of Mr. Dawes resulted in the payment of $12,000,000 due them for the last months of 1932. Their pay for the five months of 1933 is still owed them. Four hundred of them are reported to be in asylums and sanitariums as a result of the strain, and are possibly beyond help by this very belated and partial payment. Replies to a questionnaire reveal, according to William G. Carr, director of the Research Division of the National Education Association, that 2,278 teachers in 263 schools have been unable to meet payments on $7,800,567 of life insurance, and 759 have been unable to meet payments on their homes. Large numbers of teachers have borrowed to the limit of their insurance policies and in some cases from loan sharks at exorbitant rates of interest. More than 500, only a part of those who applied, have been assisted by one teachers’ charitable foundation. In short, all the horrors of prolonged unemployment are incidents of employment in the public-school system of the second largest city in the country, which is conducting a “Century of Progress” exposition.

But the situation of the Chicago teachers, distressing as it is, is far from unique. Because of certain incongruous and sensational angles in the situation which habitually make Chicago “news,” the plight of Chicago’s teachers has received a relatively large amount of publicity, whereas the equally desperate, perhaps more hopeless condition of teachers in rural schools throughout the South and in many sections of the West and Middle West has gone almost unnoticed. Public education is threatened with something little short of an absolute breakdown in vast areas of the country. Alabama owes its teachers $7,000,000. Eighty-five per cent of its elementary and secondary schools were reported as closed in April of this year and the rest as running on part time. Many schools, according to a statement made by Dr. A. F. Harmon, State Superintendent of Education, closed before January 1 of this year not to open again until October if they do then. Some counties have gone back to a three months’ term such as was maintained thirty years ago. Few teachers of elementary, high-school, or college rank in State institutions have been paid their full salaries, and most of them are from three to eight months behind. Even these unpaid salaries had previously been cut from 10 to 40 per cent, as they have in other States. Where they have been paid, it has been only partly in cash and partly in scrip, which merchants in some places are no longer willing to accept. In Georgia, teachers in rural counties have gone unpaid for months and in many places their credit is exhausted. Some of them have met the situation by camping in schoolhouses, cooking their meals in the domestic-science rooms. In some rural communities farmers have helped by taking turns in boarding teachers, but in many instances this has proved too great a burden for the impoverished families. These statements, like many official reports, investigations, and surveys, apply almost wholly to white teachers in white schools. But it is a safe assumption that in those States and counties which normally spend from three to sixty times as much on their white as on their colored schools, the sufferings of the Negro school teachers and of the Negro school population have been proportionately heavier. Here as elsewhere complete breakdown has been averted largely by the devotion of the teachers, who have not only gone on working without pay, but have often out of their depleted means helped needy school children.

And as if this crippled condition of the schools were not sufficiently serious, in every locality cries for further retrenchment from taxpayers’ committees, citizens’ budget commissions, the bankers, the power interests, the merchants’ associations, and the real-estate associations are being heard. To a large extent these have already been heeded, and at a time when unprecedentedly heavy demands are being made on our public schools they have been forced almost everywhere to run on reduced budgets, to cut teachers' salaries, to increase the size of classes, and to drop such "fads and frills" as the teaching of music, child-guidance work, playground work, school gardens, vacation schools—in short, all the myriad developments of the school system which are intelligent responses to the complex needs of the community, the very features which make the public-school system, with all its weaknesses and shortcomings, an asset to democracy.

And what are the results? In Michigan, says George E. Carrothers of the University of Michigan, "a 7 per cent increase in the number of students in Michigan high schools has been accompanied by a 3 per cent decrease in the number of teachers, salary cuts of from 10 to 40 per cent, and the elimination of courses, which is putting an unparalleled burden on teachers and school systems to keep State educational standards up to normal." Detroit has cut its night-school service in half, increased the size of classes, and eliminated free summer schools; Indianapolis has eliminated its department of curriculum revision, eliminated night schools, summer schools, and teachers' colleges, and greatly reduced its appropriations for kindergartens. In Chicago nearly all evening schools have been closed, summer schools have been discontinued, community centers abolished, playgrounds reduced. To quote again from William Carr's recent summary of the situation in the New York Herald Tribune:

One or more phases of school service have been eliminated or curtailed in more than half of the city school systems of the nation. Conservative estimates indicate that by the end of the school year kindergartens will be reduced or eliminated in at least 170 cities, night schools in 120 cities, schools for handicapped children in 170 cities, art instruction in 100 cities, music instruction in 160 cities, school nurses in 135 cities, home economics or manual training or both in 145 cities, and physical education in 160 cities.

A short-sighted "economy" has insisted in all these cases on the elimination or the curtailment especially of those services which even in normal times are the strongest forces against disintegration, demoralization, and gangsterism, and which become acutely necessary in the face of the problems raised by the depression. Professor Paul Mort, of Teachers College in New York, announced last winter after a nationwide survey of educational financing that approximately 9,500,000 American boys and girls were being deprived of their educational birthright because of the depression. As large portions of the survey on which this conclusion was based dealt exclusively with white teachers and white schools it seems safe to regard these figures as highly conservative.

"Education is not sacred," said Mayor McKee at a meeting of the New York City Board of Estimate last October. For this and similar courtesies some 200,000 voters wrote in his name on their ballots in November and many more were prevented from expressing their appreciation only by the "fixing" of Tammany's voting machines. McKee's soul, however, goes marching on. According to an analysis by the Public Education Association, the educational budget for New York City for 1933 suffered the following reductions: First, the budget presented by the Board of Education for 1933 was $2,800,000 less than that for 1932. And since there is normally an annual increase in the budget of $5,000,000 on account of the increased number of pupils, the budget request for 1933 was lower than it normally would have been by approximately $7,800,000. This reduction was accomplished in the main by increasing the size of classes, restricting the number of sessions of evening schools, suspending the summer schools and other summer activities, reducing personnel, using substitutes instead of regular teachers to fill vacancies, and making large cuts in supplies and equipment.

Secondly, this budget request was reduced by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment by $1,500,000, which left it approximately $141,000,000. This reduction was accomplished by the elimination of after-school athletic centers and school gardens, a reduction in the appropriation for baths and pools*, the elimination of certain vacant positions, by transferring from the tax-levy budget inspectors and draftsmen for new building work, and by increasing anticipated accruals.

Thirdly, the budget was further diminished by an act of the extraordinary session of the legislature reducing salaries by $8,800,000 and then, after the reopening of the city budget, by an additional $2,500,000, leaving a net total budget for 1933 of $129,700,000, as compared with $145,300,000 in 1932. This last reduction was accomplished by abolishing training schools, withdrawing sick pay from teachers, filling vacancies with substitute teachers, postponing repairs, improvements, and replacements, and making further reductions in the amounts spent for school supplies. All of these reductions amounted to a total cut of $20,600,000.

There is every reason to fear similar and even more drastic economies for next year as well as a possible reduction in State aid. The teachers who took a straight pay cut last winter of from 6 to 10 per cent, as well as various disguised pay cuts in the form of reduced sick pay, larger classes, increased work, and fewer free periods, and still contributed more than $3,000,000 to the School Relief Fund—a contribution which compares rather favorably with that of bankers, power-company officials, realtors, and other citizens' budget commissioners—are again facing the threat of a pay cut in the Budget Commission's recommendation of a moratorium on all mandatory salary increases and increments. The threat, indeed, to the teachers' security, to their peace of mind, to their efficiency is constant. It is undermining not only their standard of living and tending to nullify the hard-won and justified salary increases of recent years, but also, by the strain and hardship it imposes on teachers, the efficiency of the schools. A harassed, underpaid, overworked, and bullied teaching body is inevitably harmful to the schools.

As Dr. Abraham Lefkowitz of the Teachers' Union recently pointed out in his pamphlet, "Teachers and the Economic Situation," teachers who were public employees were among the last to profit by rising wages in the boom years following 1914. Their salaries were established by law and could not readily be adjusted. The maximum salary for high-school teachers in New York at that time was $2,650, and this was reached only after fourteen years of service. (Again a comparison of the service rendered the community by the teachers and their remuneration with that of some of the members of the Citizens' Budget Commission is suggestive.) With rising prices, however, the purchasing power of the dollar shrank so rapidly that by June, 1920, with the price index at 216.5, the purchasing power of this maximum salary was $1,219. In August, 1920, as a result of an active campaign by the teachers, the Legislature of the State of New York raised salaries so that the maximum reached $3,700. But the purchasing power of even this maximum was still below that of the maximum of 1913. In 1928-29 a further adjustment raised the maximum salary to $4,500, at which level it remained until the salary cut passed by the extraordinary session of the legislature this winter. In the face of rising prices, however, even the teacher obtaining the present maximum salary may soon find himself worse off than he was before his salary was raised—and this even without further wage cuts. The suggested moratorium on increments, while not affecting holders of these maximum salaries would hit all those on the lower salary levels—in itself a very gross injustice.

* The service to the city rendered by these baths and pools can be gauged by the following figures: In the spring of 1931 there were, according to the Association of Day School Teachers of Swimming, 84,396 boys and girls enrolled for attendance at shower baths, and 62,185 enrolled for swimming. Children were examined every week for signs of contagious or other diseases.

DO NOT CUT THE FACE
BOOKS OR MAGAZINES.

These are the conditions facing teachers fortunate enough to be employed. What of the unemployed? Their number in New York City alone has been variously estimated at from 5,000 to 15,000. The Teachers' Union, which gives the lower figure, makes a distinction between those actually on eligible lists and those who for some reason have failed or had no opportunity to take the regular license examinations.) The Unemployment Relief Committee was recently said to be supporting 954 of them. Probably very few of the others have had the good luck to reach the stage of destitution at which they will be eligible for relief from the Home Relief Bureau or will be given "made work" by the Emergency Work Bureau. Many are known to have applied unsuccessfully to these and similar organizations. One such teacher, a young girl, according to a letter in the possession of the Unemployed Teachers Association was ineligible because in her family of five people, one, a brother, was working and making $17 a week.

"I passed the oral and written parts of an examination to teach English to foreigners," this girl wrote, "and had to have a postponement in my physical because my teeth are in bad shape and I cannot afford dental care. I've had to stop my work toward a high-school license because I had no money for tuition."

"We are always hungry," wrote another, also one of a family of five, only one of whom had any sort of employment. "We owe six months' rent. . . . We live every hour in fear of eviction. . . . My sister, a typist, and I, a teacher, have been out of work for two years. . . . We feel discouraged . . . and embittered. We are drifting, with no help from anyone." Two other teachers known to the Unemployed Teachers Association were declared "ineligible" because they had been making $5 a week by substitute work. The policy of the Board of Education in letting some permanent vacancies go unfilled and filling others with substitutes at substitutes' per diem pay is largely responsible for the high rate of teacher unemployment. It is a policy disastrous in many ways both to the teachers and to the schools. For the young and hopeful graduates of the training schools and the city colleges who passed their license examinations as far back as 1928 and 1929 and still have not received regular appointments, the situation is tragic. The board has not only decided to hold no further License No. 1 examination, at least until 1934 (to do so would, indeed, be a futile gesture with some 5,000 teachers on eligible lists to be appointed in order of merit) but is filling vacancies as they occur not by making regular appointments from the lists, but very largely by assigning substitutes. Even when these substitutes are taken from the eligible lists with a high ranking they receive only substitutes' per diem pay instead of the regular rate of compensation. They may thus be made to fill regular positions for years as permanent substitutes, doing regular teachers' work at substitutes' pay without salary increments and without permanent tenure, which last a regular teacher achieves automatically after three years of teaching in the city system. The consolidation of classes, the dropping of courses, and the closing of the three city training schools has also thrown upon the system a great number of teachers in excess who must be taken care of, still further reducing the chance of appointment from the lists. The appointment of substitutes has in fact reached a point where principals are protesting against it and against the continual shifting of teachers from school to school. (It was estimated last winter that one teacher in five in the high-school system was a substitute and in some schools the proportion is even higher.)

There is another real though insidious danger in manning our schools in so large a measure with teachers who have no secure tenure and are consequently defenseless against political injustice and favoritism, against the infraction of standards which the Teachers' Union and other teachers' associations have labored for years to build up, and against constantly increasing demands on their time and services, without additional compensation. The lack of security is an effective check upon any political or spiritual independence on the part of teachers, and it is particularly to the credit of the Unemployed Teachers Association, the majority of whose members have only a substitute's status, that they have repeatedly championed teachers who they feel had been unjustly treated. Particularly notable were their protests in the case of Ralph Fagin and Helen Weinstein, substitutes, transferred "for the good of the system" after taking part in a parade of a parent-teacher-student association against overcrowded conditions in Public School 225 at Brighton Beach; their demand for an open hearing of the charges against Isidore Blumberg, a dismissed probationary teacher; and their stand against the "tragic case" policy of Superintendent O'Shea, by which the merit system was abandoned and assignments given to teachers alleged to be in distressed circumstances. In the last case the Unemployed Teachers Association pointed out that many teachers thus assigned did not appear on any eligible list, that appointment on grounds of destitution rather than of efficiency was detrimental to the schools, and that unless all the tragic cases among the 5,000 eligibles were examined their relative destitution could not be fairly established anyway. It is significant that this "tragic case" list has not been open to inspection like other lists.

In the very tone of the announcements given out by the Board of Education in New York the new and lowered status of the teachers in New York schools is reflected. It was reflected, for instance, in Superintendent O'Shea's announcement that he intended to "draft" teachers for summer-school work without pay, and in the contemplated by-law of the Board of Education compelling them to give extra hours after school without additional remuneration for the purpose of coaching backward students. It was reflected also in the marvelous "share-the-work" plan, suggested but, happily, not as yet put into execution. Under this plan two substitutes, through "voluntary cooperation," would alternate in teaching a class, each substitute teaching one week for pay, the next week "voluntarily" assisting her alternate without remuneration. It is also an open secret in the teaching body that the "dear, wonderful, generous teachers," as Mayor O'Brien recently called them, were not wholly free from coercion in the matter of contributions to the School Relief Fund. It is significant too that teachers who have ventured to protest against this and other injustices have frequently drawn the unfavorable attention of their superiors and the whip of impermanent tenure has been held over them explicitly even at open meetings of the Board of Education.

Members of the New York Board of Education and of such boards throughout the country face no easy task. The pressure on them to reduce expenses, even by such disastrous economies as those described above, from all the reactionary elements in the community has been tremendous and is still going on. It is unfortunate that such boards are usually composed of people who are primarily politicians rather than educators and hence overresponsive to pressure of this kind. In the present emergency, moreover, there has been added to the usual reactionary business interests, the voice of the bewildered and overburdened small taxpayer, who may actually be bearing a disproportionate share of the cost of education. The equalization of the tax burden by a form of taxation placing this load where it belongs, State and federal aid to education throughout the nation, the strengthening of teachers' associations everywhere, and determined action against false "economies" by all who realize what is at stake will be needed if the schools and the teaching profession are to be saved from disaster.

Liberia in Shackles

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, August 7

LIBERIA, having already been reduced to helplessness through the financial dictatorship of the Firestone rubber interests, is now, with the aid of the League of Nations and consent of the American State Department, about to be placed in complete servitude. The Liberian government lost its financial autonomy through the 1926 loan agreement, which the State Department compelled it to accept against its will. Within another month it is to be stripped of its administrative independence and cultural autonomy as well. And this is all to be done ostensibly in the name of charity, but really to give the Firestone interests and the National City Bank absolute control of the country so that they may the better "protect" the 1926 loan and the extensive Firestone rubber concession. A "Plan of Assistance for Liberia," upon which a League commission had been working for two years, has been completed, and the Liberians have been informed that they must accept this plan before the League Council meets in September.

The League plan, which the Firestone people helped to write and which they have accepted with certain strings attached, provides for appointment by the League Council of a "chief adviser" to the Liberian government. According to Article 13, Paragraph 1, of the plan, this official "shall be attached to the central government in order to give it the benefit of his advice, to supervise the execution of the plan of assistance, and to coordinate the work of the foreign experts." The third paragraph requires the government "to collaborate with the chief adviser" and "to act in accordance with his advice and recommendations." It also agrees to grant him "ample and sufficient authority" to carry out the plan of assistance.

Liberia is arbitrarily divided "for administrative purposes" into three provinces, and each is to have a provincial commissioner. These commissioners, who will be responsible to the chief adviser, must be "foreign specialists." Technically, according to the plan, they will also be responsible to the President of Liberia, but only on the understanding that the President or his Secretary of the Interior shall issue "no instructions, regulations or orders . . . to the provincial commissioner except after consultation with and approval of the chief adviser." Nor shall this meaningless concession to the executive authority of the republic "be interpreted as intended to limit in any way the authority of the chief adviser as to this or any other department of the government." Moreover, "it shall be his duty to see that the laws and regulations are carried out, and he shall be responsible for public peace and order." To this end a "corps of messengers" is to be organized, it being left to the chief adviser to decide, "in collaboration with the government of Liberia, whether the messengers are to be armed or not." There surely can be no doubt that the chief adviser will be the real ruler of the country.

It is a curious fact that the draft protocol of the plan of assistance does not define or even mention the nature of the help to be extended to Liberia. However, the supplementary financial report suggests that $72,000 may be spent annually on "roads, bridges, public health, etc." At the same time it provides that the foreign "experts" engaged for this work are to be paid $78,000 a year for "salaries and travel-expenses to Europe." In addition, the 7 per cent interest rate on the 1926 loan is to be reduced to 5 per cent, and in the event that the interest charges for any year cannot be met out of current revenue the Finance Corporation of America (Firestone) agrees to renounce the interest payment for that year.

Standing alone these provisions would appear to be to Liberia's advantage. The reduction in the interest rate, which has long been sought, will mean a theoretical saving of $62,000 a year, although actually the saving will be less than $50,000 a year, for new bonds must be issued to cover arrears in past interest payments. Moreover, the interest renounced in any year because of inadequate revenues must also be covered by new bonds to be issued by the government to the Finance Corporation. (This provision appears neither in the draft protocol of the plan or the financial report but in a third document—a supplementary loan contract to be entered into between the Liberian government on the one hand and the Finance Corporation and National City Bank on the other.) So Liberia is to be helped, in part at least, by piling new debts on top of its already unbearable obligations!

While the cost of the plan of assistance, estimated at $150,000 annually, is to be borne in the first instance by the Finance Corporation, this expense must eventually come out of the Liberian budget. If this proves impossible, the Finance Corporation is obligated to issue bonds to cover the salaries and traveling expenses of the imported specialists—this it must guarantee in any event—but it need not issue bonds to cover the cost of the new roads and sanitary system. In brief, unless the government can stand the additional strain, the only part of the plan of assistance that can possibly benefit Liberia may be dispensed with at the pleasure of the Firestone interests!

The government had cut its current budget to about $400,000, below which, it declared, it could not go without completely undermining the essential public services. The financial adviser, a Firestone man, insisted that it could be cut to $281,500. The financial rapporteur for the League commission, M. Lighthart, a Frenchman, "compromised" by fixing the figure at $300,000. It is interesting to note that in his report M. Lighthart acknowledges the help he received from L. T. Lyle, representing the Finance Corporation; Harvey Firestone, Jr., representing the Firestone Plantations Company; and General Blanton Winship, representing the United States Government. Here, however, we come upon another discrepancy. The Lighthart report assigns the first $300,000 of revenue to the government for its "ordinary operating expenses." The report definitely states that salaries and expenses of the loan officials and the cost of the plan of assistance must come out of subsequent revenues. But Section XV of the supplementary loan contract mentioned above just as flatly states: "It is understood and agreed that in any fiscal year, after the payment each month of the cost and expenses of the collection, application, audit, and administration of the revenues and receipts, as provided in Section XIII hereof [which section provides for payment of salaries and expenses of loan officials and for maintenance of a frontier guard], any balance of assigned revenues may be applied to the ordinary expenditures of the government until such time as the total revenues and receipts of the government shall exceed $350,000." Again, Section II, paragraph (b), mentions the sum of $350,000 as the amount "required for the operating expenses of the government, including salaries and allowance of the fiscal officials." In a case of this sort is it likely that a recommendation of a League rapporteur will have more force than a contract with the National City Bank?

Incidentally—though incidental only in the sense that it seems less important than some of the more outrageous provisions of the League plan—while the total of the government expenses, salaries, and allowances of the loan officials, loan charges, and cost of the plan of assistance comes to $733,000 a year, estimated revenues for the current year amount only to $456,500. Who is to make up the difference? The Firestone interests? They have gone into Liberia to make money for themselves, not to dispense charity. M. Lighthart believes the problem will solve itself in time. "I am confident that this amount will be increased considerably," he said, "by the application of the plan and by a proper administration, as this will lead to a speedy development of the country and its resources." Quite apart from the difficulty of perceiving how any country can be helped which has dozens of high-salaried, parasitic officials foisted upon it, it is rather hard to follow M. Lighthart's logic. According to the League plan, $72,000 a year may be spent on roads, bridges, and public health. It need not be spent unless the government budget can stand the extra burden. M. Lighthart clearly suggests that the budget cannot stand the strain until the country and its resources are developed, that is to say, unless the money is spent!

The League commission is anxious to help Liberia economize. For example, it has recommended that the government stop appropriating funds for educational purposes and leave all education in the hands of missionaries. In short, Liberia is asked to abandon its cultural autonomy as well as its financial and administrative independence. It is obvious that the missionaries must be financed from abroad, primarily by Americans, by such churchly people as the Firestones, for example. The implications of this are too plain to need further discussion.

There remains the question of whether the chief adviser selected by the League Council shall be an American or a person of some other nationality. The Firestone people are insisting on the appointment of an American. General Winship has said that they will have his support. The State Department has pointedly declared that only an American can properly watch out for our interests in Liberia. And it is certain that the League has neither the courage nor the desire to cross the United States Government on this score. An American will be selected—unless Providence intervenes—and it is a foregone conclusion that in as much as "our interests" in Liberia are really Firestone's, the chief adviser will be another Firestone man. Then his control of this republic, which was created as a haven for free Negroes, will be complete. Nor need the Liberians look for help to the State Department, which has shown time and again that it sides with Firestone and the National City Bank as against the people of Liberia.

Despite the League commission's virtual ultimatum, Liberia has thus far refused to accept the plan of assistance. Secretary of State Grimes, the Liberian delegate, appended twelve reservations to the commission's report. Somewhat earlier in the deliberations he had submitted a lengthy memorandum, upon which the subsequent reservations were based. This memorandum was not only a complete presentation of the case for Liberia, but revealed the manner in which the State Department had cooperated with Firestone in saddling the loan contract and financial dictatorship upon the country.

In 1924 the Liberian government agreed to lease to Firestone "a large area of land upon which to plant rubber." Although Firestone's agent, W. D. Hines, approved the terms offered, they were not acceptable to Firestone. Hines was compelled to return the agreement to the government in a "considerably amended" form. The amendments, in brief, required Liberia to accept a loan from Firestone and a "financial adviser" to supervise the administration and collection of the loan. The government informed Hines that "in no circumstance" would it "place itself under financial obligation to your company." It declared subsequently that "it would be politically inadvisable . . . to place the republic under financial obligation to any private concern operating in this country under grants from the government." However, it would be willing, as the Liberian Secretary of State informed the American Minister in Monrovia, to accept "any benevolent assistance in this direction," provided that the money was obtained "from sources other than a corporation or individual operating commercially in Liberia."

Firestone's purpose was obvious. He clearly did not trust the Liberian government. In order to protect the rubber monopoly he determined to put the government under a binding obligation to himself—with the approval and assistance of the State Department. He argued that the planting and loan agreements had to be accepted together, because, "first, it establishes confidence in American investments not only for loans, but for the much larger investment for rubber development; second, the United States Government could not agree to assist a loan on unknown terms and conditions." He suggested that he would "raise capital from the American public for Liberia." The Liberian government, he cabled President King, "must have confidence in America and myself." In a cablegram sent to the American Minister in Monrovia a few days later, Secretary of State Kellogg supported Firestone with the declaration that the State Department "awaits with sympathetic interest the conclusion of the contracts now under consideration. . . . It would seem most unfortunate should a disagreement as to the exact terms of the loan prevent or delay the conclusion of a contract which, from every standpoint, is of immense advantage to Liberia." Later Secretary Kellogg stated in another cablegram:

The department appreciates the reluctance of the Liberian government to assume obligations toward private interests operating in Liberia identical with those which it might willingly assume toward the American government. Mr. Firestone assures the department that there is no thought of the money for a loan being advanced by the corporation which will be formed to promote rubber development in Liberia. . . . the department has already stated that it would, at the request of the Liberian government and American interests advancing the loan, cooperate in the selection of the loan officers. It would appear to this government that these provisions would thoroughly safeguard Liberian interests.

Subsequently the Liberian Secretary of State visited Washington, where he discussed the question of a loan with William R. Castle, Jr., then chief of the Western Europe division of the State Department. He informed Castle that Liberia was not particularly anxious to obtain a loan of any sort, but if the State Department recommended it "as essential and desirable, we were prepared to act upon that advice." But "the department agreed with my views that the money should not come from Firestone." These repeated assurances from the State Department were accepted in good faith by Liberia, and the loan agreement, despite continued and vigorous opposition at home, was finally approved by President King, who conducted the last-minute negotiations in Paris. Under the terms of the agreement a group of American officials took charge directly and indirectly of the whole of Liberia's finances.

At the ninth meeting of the League Committee, held on January 28, 1932, it was disclosed that "notwithstanding the objections of the Government of Liberia, and assurances received in the replies above quoted . . . the loan had been floated by Mr. Firestone, and . . . none of the bonds upon which the money was raised had been put upon the open market. It has since been established that Mr. Firestone is the leading director, if not the sole owner, of the Firestone Company, the Finance Corporation [the dummy company through which the loan was "floated"], and the United States Trading Company. . . ."

Of course, the State Department may have been perfectly sincere in stating that the Liberian government would not be delivered into Firestone's hands under the terms of the 1926 agreement. But if so, why did it insist upon having the contract rushed through, and why did it request the Liberian government not to quibble over the "exact terms" of the contract? And when it discovered that Firestone was putting up the loan himself, why did it not hasten to denounce him for having violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the agreement, and why did it not immediately inform the Liberian government that Firestone had tricked it into accepting the financial dictatorship? Lastly, if the State Department was sincere in the position it took in 1926, why did it later, through the American member of the League Committee, demand that Liberia observe the terms of the agreement to the least insignificant clause, though it must have known, that this course was driving Liberia into bankruptcy?

More than half of the Liberian memorandum was devoted to a detailed description of the efforts of the government to economize in order to comply with the requirements of the Financial Adviser. When the Firestone agents insisted that the government reduce expenditures to protect revenues earmarked for the loan, an investigation was undertaken and it was found that virtually every branch of the government was understaffed. Nevertheless, personnel was still further reduced and salaries were generally slashed, the latter being cut upon one occasion as much as 50 per cent. But this did not suffice and other revenues were diverted to meet payments on the loan and to pay the salaries and expenses of the loan officials, which of course were not affected by the economy drive. Indeed, the salaries of some of these men (though the memorandum does not mention it) have actually been increased. By April, 1930, the government found that it did not have enough free revenue to carry its floating debt or meet its current expenses. It sought to arrange temporary credits with the Bank of British West Afrika, Ltd., in Monrovia, but the bank refused to extend credits without the consent of the Financial Adviser, "which approval the Financial Adviser consistently refused to give." The Fiscal Agent and the Finance Corporation were appealed to in this connection, but their reply consisted "mainly in a series of indictments over questions of procedure and other matters, which in fact were traceable as much to the conduct of the fiscal officers as to others in the employ of the public service," and concluded "with an implied denial to cooperate, suggest, or give any assistance."

Finally, in September, 1932, the Liberian Secretary of the Treasury wrote to the Finance Corporation and to the National City Bank of New York proposing that the agreement be temporarily modified for the fiscal year 1933 by reducing the rate of interest from 7 to 4 per cent, declaring a moratorium on the sinking fund, eliminating two American officers of the Liberian Frontier Force and the American Assistant Auditor, equalizing the salary of the Supervisor of Customs with that of the Auditor and the Supervisor of Internal Revenue, reducing by 25 per cent the salaries of the Finance Adviser and other fiscal officers, and by agreeing to the government's plan to float a $500,000 internal loan for the purpose of funding the current floating debt. These proposals, while not rejected outright, met with many delays.

Finally, on June 27 of this year after a series of conferences in London, the League plan was drawn up. It was approved by all of the delegates "with the exception of the Liberian representative." He was told that his government must accept the plan "as a whole if it desires the assistance of the League," and must do so before September 1. There can be no doubt that copies of the report were received by the State Department soon after June 27. Yet the report has at no time been made available to the public through the department. Officials of the department were plainly disturbed when they learned that copies, sent from Liberian sources abroad, had reached this country. Apparently it had been hoped to keep the details of the plan from the American public until the League Council had had opportunity to compel Liberia to accept it.

When the full extent of the betrayal of Liberia at the hands of the League became known, a delegation of prominent Negroes, including Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson, president of Howard University; W. E. B. DuBois, editor of the Crisis, and Walter White, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, went to the State Department to protest against American acquiescence in the plan. They were received by Acting Secretary Phillips, who pointedly though politely informed them that the State Department had no intention of changing its policy with regard to Liberia. The delegates, except Dr. Johnson, insisted that if a "chief adviser" had to be sent to Liberia, he should be a non-American, preferably a Scandinavian. They expressed the fear that if he were an American, he would inevitably be a Firestone agent. Phillips, however, declared that he "favored an American expert." "Otherwise," he said, "we would lose our traditional interest in Liberia, which would be unwise." At another point he asked: "What would happen if the Firestone interests were taken out of Liberia? It would mean complete starvation in Liberia." He insisted that in as much as the League had taken up the matter of "helping" Liberia, there was nothing that the State Department could do. If the League appointed an American as "chief adviser," the department would have to accept him. Phillips also defended the high salaries paid to foreign experts on the ground "that we've got to get the very finest men we can find." When the objection was raised that this should not be done at the expense of the Liberian school system, he declared that many States in this country have had to cut down their school budgets. He finally promised to bring the school question to the attention of General Winship, who is now in Monrovia as an official "observer" for the American government.

It seems evident that Firestone will have his way in all things in Liberia. For example, among his many recommendations, M. Lighthart has suggested that the Liberian government grant no "further concessions or monopolies to foreigners, except after consultation with the chief adviser." Thus Firestone need have no fear of competition. And it appears certain that he can depend upon the complete support of the American State Department. Only an aroused public can prevent this new imperialist grab.

In the Driftway

THE attention of the Drifter has been directed to a new organization calling itself the Society for the Advancement of Better Living, with headquarters in the Hotel Astor, New York. Twenty-eight million young Americans have grown into adulthood in the last few years, so an announcement says, "with the most meager knowledge of the civilized pleasures of the table, with no design for dining. Their gastronomic experiences have been marked by heedless dash or mere indifference, and steeped—shall we say?—in juniper." The new society will be devoted, it is said, to the "epicurean arts." Certainly the epicurean arts need somebody's devotion, preferably that of a large, strong man with a tomahawk, who will devote his long winter evenings to a massacre of restaurant proprietors and cooks. For the restaurateur of the present century has pretty well driven out of public places that once matchless creation, American cooking, forcing it to take refuge in a select number of private homes. Foreign immigration has been partly responsible for this. Pathetically eager to become "Americanized," the newcomers—with the honorable exception of the Italians—have tended to cast aside their own sound traditions in regard to food and embrace our own before they had any but the shoddiest conception of what the latter were. The result has been the evolution of eating places which fabricate food with no technique except the least work, the most speed, and the greatest possible show.

* * * * *

THE new organization will arrange monthly dinners and luncheons, each one of which will feature some regional American dish or a specialty of some foreign country. The Drifter hopes that the first dinner will be one without spinach. He isn't particular what the menu includes just so it excludes a generous portion of this sickly looking, savorless weed. He would, in fact, like to head a committee to inaugurate an "Eat-Less-Spinach Week," or lead a march on Washington to demand a processing tax of $100 a peck and a reduction in acreage devoted to the crop in 1934 of at least 101 per cent. The Drifter can recall a time many years ago when he liked spinach, but that was before he had had it dished up in restaurants after it had been boiled a couple of hours by the cook and then allowed to stand half a day before serving. Even in the days when the Drifter still consented to eat spinach, he remembers it as inferior in flavor to greens of beet or turnip tops, young dandelion leaves, or pig weed, but he thinks what finally set him irretrievably and irrevocably against it was the campaign in its favor by "health experts" and the insistence of his friends that the stuff was "good" for him. The Drifter is in complete accord with the man who was accustomed to say that he owed all his good health to spinach. "Yes," he would add, "I haven't eaten any in ten years."

* * * * *

PROBABLY this insistence that spinach is "good" for one has been a potent influence in making it disliked by most of those now in childhood. Had it been doled out sparingly as a reward for exemplary behavior, it might still be acceptable to the new generation. As it is, the Drifter foresees vengeance when those now in the nursery arrive at an age to go to the polls. An Anti-Spinach Amendment will be offered by Congress and unanimously ratified by the States within a year, which will prohibit the raising, selling, cooking, or serving of spinach anywhere in the United States or its territories. A Volstead Law will be enacted establishing fines and imprisonment for any person serving, providing, or otherwise dispensing a meal containing more than one-half of 1 per cent spinach content, except in prisons as a punishment for crime. Of course some of the older generation will still demand their spinach tippie. The weed will be grown illicitly in moonshine gardens and smuggled into our cities in fast cars or by water in long, low, rakish craft painted gray. There may be spinach chasers and a Spinach Row off Sandy Hook. Certainly there will be spinach speakeasies where Flaming Age will have its fling. Into them will totter bleary-eyed grandfathers and shameless grandmothers with a thirsty shout to the bartender: "George, mix us up a spinach highball quick! And make it old-fashioned style, flavorless, and watery, and weak!"

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Pinchot versus Lippmann

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

If the Roosevelt program fails, it will probably fail because a dogmatic, deductive-minded people fail to adjust to an evolutionary, inductive age. This is nicely illustrated in the criticism of Walter Lippmann by Amos Pinchot in The Nation of July 19. Space forbids more than the discussion of one or two paragraphs. The crux of the controversy is whether social and economic life is made of material like the potter's clay to be molded at human will; or whether it is a part of the great biological world and therefore develops from inner urges which produce variations and mutations that selection lays hold of to insure progress.

From the evolutionary point of view Mr. Pinchot is wrong when he writes his dogma that "history repeats itself." History never repeats itself any more than nature produces two individuals just alike. The only way history can be made to repeat itself is for a clever literary writer to take two events much alike and describe them by selecting those phases in which they resemble each other most, thereby ignoring the variations.

From the standpoint of an evolutionist, the three sentences criticized by Mr. Pinchot make very good sense. "Life is [a biological and therefore] an irreversible process. . . . This insight we owe to Bergson [or to some other evolutionist]. The application of it to politics is not difficult [for those who understand the impact of Darwinism], because politics is one of the interests of [human and therefore biological] life." Lippmann's book would have been somewhat voluminous had he put into every sentence the required qualifying phrases necessary to interpret the matter fully to one who does not accept the pragmatic philosophy forced upon us by the wide acceptance of evolutionary and experimental inductive thinking.

"We are homeless in a jungle of machines," means, of course, that we find it very difficult to adjust to our complex age of exact science and modern business and industrial technology. If you grant that there was sufficient cause for the emotion to justify the use of the figure of speech, Lippmann's sentence is better than mine and again much shorter.

Young people in America are fairly familiar with the claim that capitalism as developed under the "philosophy of Alexander Hamilton" is coming to the natural end of an overspecialized biological organism and, like the dinosaur, is passing to its place among the fossils with feudalism and other outgrown culture patterns. This we heard especially from Norman Thomas and others during the recent Presidential campaign.

Lippmann's straddling in the Sacco-Vanzetti case is a common sin of newspaper writers. They have to be sheep who conform. As Ross says: "The damnable thing about the newspapers is that they will not print the news." Any writer who tries to force them will probably find himself a rebel freak out of a job.

ARTHUR D. CROMWELL

West Chester, Pennsylvania, July 21

Mr. Moley at London

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

An editorial paragraph in your issue of July 26 says that only the intervention of President Roosevelt saved Raymond Moley from making "an utter fool of himself" at the London conference by attempting a grand-stand play, and adds: "It is reported that he first had the notion of going incognito to London, arriving unannounced at the conference hall. His unexpected appearance would take the delegates by storm and the conference would be saved."

Are you sure of the accuracy of the "report" on which you based your stinging paragraph? Was there no reason to doubt its reliability when it was seen to differ so widely from the known facts regarding Mr. Moley's modest and tactful course in discharging the mission on which he was sent to London by the President? Sharpshooters like Drew Pearson may and do indulge in stupid fabrications at Mr. Moley's expense and it doesn't seem to matter. One expects more fairness from a responsible journal like The Nation.

Southbridge, Massachusetts, July 27 V. V. McNITT

Who Will Send Books?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

As we begin the second year's work at Highlander Folk School, Monteagle, Tennessee, we find ourselves greatly in need of more books.

This is the only school in the South devoted to the training of native leadership for labor and rural cooperative movements. This year we have furnished leadership in the South's most important mining strike at Wilder, Tennessee; uncovering new facts, furnishing relief, and preventing open warfare. Our students and teachers are giving full-time service to the labor cause in the South, all without salaries. We charge no tuition or other fees. Our living comes from a small farm.

So we must look to interested friends for books. Just now we need the best works on economics, sociology, religion, labor history, and tactics, and the important political and social movements of our day. Also for our community classes and library we need many more books of general literature, from the classics to the latest fiction and juveniles. Books placed in our school will be used constantly and creatively. Reinhold Niebuhr said in a recent editorial: "No worthier cause exists to claim the support of those who believe in labor education."

MYLES HORTON, Director

Monteagle, Tennessee, June 30

Books and Films

Flight of Fish

By KAY BOYLE

Throughout the tropical and temperate seas flora and fish
Ladies might wear as ornament drift deep in company:
The hermit-crab clasped mouth to mouth with his anemone,
Wax sea-pens floating upright, anchored in the sands,
Or ten-armed squids, clear as glass bugles sounding the dark forests under sea,

Alight with phosphorescence in their cloaks, and eyes
Like opals given sight to stud the foam.

The flight of squids is brief but powerful,
Wreathed by the boneless arms that weave, weaving in marriage water with air

Throughout the spasms of their flight; or fish with fins in motion like an icy fan

Leap in their armor to the saddle of the atmosphere
And before strangling on its gasping flanks, return
To the fresh valleys under water; there lie low Flickering in ambush until the menace passes, or in fear
Mount the dry steeds again, the parched winds that gallop
Neck to neck, towards shore.

(If flight of fish be fear of enemy
Then how must man and reptile be Opposed in courage utterly
And no association be.)

There is a time of year, a change of season under water,
A tide of spring and floods, a wide up-rooting
When sea anemones lift their throats and, thirsting, drink deeply of the wave.

Made buoyant thus they soar above the boughs of coral,
Drifting from windward, like wondrous flowers blowing,
Or ferns with feathered tentacles unfolded by the sea.
Great pliant river fish with metal sides and ventral keels
Embark upon the glassy water in their season,
Carving its surface with the keel's edge sharpened
For strong haunchless leaping from the stream:
Glib ice-eyed fish of Southern continents go winging
In true if unending flight for hunting.
(There is a time when the Medusae drift
In languor, opening and closing their parasols.)

Rio Grande

Rio Grande. By Harvey Fergusson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ONE certain morning in the year 1820 or thereabout a coon-skin-capped trapper, pushing farther than his fellows into the forest coverts of the Rockies in search of beavers for the beaver-hat trade, came unexpectedly upon an old and established civilization. He may have had warning that this civilization was there; he may have had none. To the trapper and hunter the Western mountains were his own so far as he could traverse them. Aside from nomadic Indians, he had met no opposition. To stumble upon a highly organized state, with its churches, aristocrats, peasants, and settled customs, must have been a distinct shock to him. It could not be, yet there it was, and he must have reconnoitered carefully.

What he saw was Taos, New Mexico, a farming and ranching community in the valley of the upper Rio Grande. It had not fallen there by accident, but had been left stranded by the now receding tide of Spanish exploration and settlement.
It was the farthest reach north of the long arm of Spain on this continent, and as that arm grew powerless and the grasp relaxed in nerveless fingers Taos struck deeper roots into the soil, became as much as necessary sufficient to itself and looked carefully to its weakening defenses.

The trapper, looking out and down, saw the pueblos and corn patches of the Indians along the river, but saw also the white-crossed missions and the great houses of the ricos on the hills. Obviously the place was of no use to a beaver-hunter except as a possible source of supplies. He may have gone away with a faint resentment that his hunting ended at that point.
Later, perhaps, he returned with companions to bargain with the Indians or the ricos for food, or to buy a night's lodging under a roof not much more satisfactory to him than the stars.
He was a tough fellow, ready with his gun and speaking no
Spanish. He would have been doubtfully welcome, if at all.
To the ricos he was a vagabond, a man of low caste, a drinker of raw spirits, an alien with no music in his soul. To the Indians he was a swaggering new monster, perhaps a marauder, a vague threat to their peace.

The Indians had learned by long and hard experience to endure the Spaniards, who had come north before the memory of the oldest inhabitants—parties of warriors, delegations of priests, hunting for gold, offering salvation and slaying when resisted, after the fashion of Spanish colonists. They had massacred and been massacred in turn; they had still come on, in-satiably, teaching their Christ, enslaving with superior weapons, taking over native customs, inter-breeding, driving out the warlike Comanches, requiring service from the Pueblos by means of an economic machine which the Indians failed to understand but must obey.

Now a new set of explorers had struggled down from the north. At first they came as single spies, but before long there were many of them, and a trail was beaten and blazed between Nebraska and New Mexico. Traders came along that trail with goods to sell in Taos. An annual fair was inaugurated for the exchange of goods. Two arms of conquest had met in the valley, one reaching west and south from the Northeastern seaboard, one reaching north from Mexico and Spain. Yankee traders began to settle in New Mexico, and in Taos itself. A quarrel began for the possession of the country, a quarrel of which the ultimate outcome was never in doubt, for one power was dying, the other just finding its strength. The Yankees set up a government in New Mexico. The Spaniards, in a desperate mood, murdered the governor and some of his entourage. There was a brief war and the Spaniards were beaten.

This story, told brilliantly with a synthesis of little-known facts and in a style peculiarly gracious, is the central theme of Harvey Fergusson's "Rio Grande." He goes back further into origins and takes the tale on into later times, but the essence of this tragic history is in this touching of two civilizations at a vital point in a vital time. The Spaniards who lived on the hills were a race of aristocrats, cultured in their way, proud as hidalgos, and of an undiminished courage. They might have built up a sovereign state, might have extended their influence and ruled an empire. But democracy drifted out that far, represented by a race of hard-bitten, uneducated Natty Bumpus, trappers of the hills, soldiers of meager fortune, and the old order went down as if under a blight. Some of the descendants of the ricos still keep to the old ways, still hold lands and inhabit their adobe castles, but not now so proudly.
If they wish a voice in the government they must go to the polls, choose who will rule them, help to send Representatives to Congress and Senators to the Senate. Something was lost here that will never be regained. Something is always lost when young barbarians trample the temples and relics of an older race, but since it was our culture that won we cannot bring ourselves to take the matter too much to heart. The lands of the earth, whether we like the code or not, belong to those who can take them.

Mr. Fergusson has written a fascinating book in "Rio Grande," enriched with extraordinary characters, elsewhere untouched, and exciting both to lovers of romance and to students of American history. For original research alone it will stand as a contribution to that history. One reason for its fascination is the perfection of the historical episode which it rehearses. Here, in little, is an epitome of history. An ancient order, laboriously built up on blood and conquest, settles down to a brief period of flower. The rabble of another race overruns it and sets up another system of living. Taos is now the haunt of artists, and the United States, we hope, will sometime achieve a culture comparable to that of Spain in the time of Calderon. But when we reach that point we cannot expect to balance there for ever. It will be time then for the barbarians to look enviously across our borders.

MAXWELL ANDERSON

Jews and Minority Rights

The Jews and Minority Rights (1898-1919). By Oscar I. Janowsky. With a Foreword by Judge Julian W. Mack. Columbia University Press. $3.75.

THE minority peoples of Europe—perhaps thirty millions in all—constitute, as ever, a thorny problem. And if it is allowed to go unsolved, it will remain as great a menace to peace as it proved to be in 1914, when the champion of a discontented minority threw the world into flames. Yet, despite its importance, English works on the problem are few; and Americans can be considered well-informed if they so much as know what a "minority people" means.

Mr. Janowsky's able study is therefore welcome. And because it deals almost exclusively with the Jewish minorities, it is doubly so—for the Jews present, if not a dangerous, at least a widespread, varied, and virulent case of the sufferings undergone by oppressed nationalities, and a case much in the public eye. Moreover, because of their singularly exposed position and, at the same time, of their wide connections in the Allied and victorious nations, the Jews were largely instrumental in securing "minority rights" not only for themselves, but for most of their fellow-victims in Central and Eastern Europe at the close of the war.

The Jewish fight for cultural freedom is told with great care and full detail by the author, who draws upon many unpublished sources from the files of the American Jewish Congress, the American Jewish Committee, the diary of Cyrus Adler, and so on. The views and the efforts of nationalists and anti-nationalists, in Europe and among American Jewry, are presented with calm impartiality. For an imaginative reader, the whole takes on the spirit of a drama.

It is no doubt ungrateful to complain of so painstaking a work; but one misses concrete and telling examples of what the Jews (and others) hoped to preserve or gain by the rights they fought for—of what, in living detail, nationalism and cultural freedom mean to a European minority. But this can be supplied in the story of what has happened to the minorities since the conclusion of the treaties supposedly guaranteeing their rights—a story which we join with Judge Mack in hoping that Mr. Janowsky will soon give us.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

World Without End

Livingstones. By Derrick Leon. The John Day Company. $2.50.

MR. LEON, to draw his first novel together, has adopted as cunning a device as was Jane Austen's when she deliberately took the occupants of two or three houses and drew upon the complicated interrelationships of their lives. Livingstones is the name of a London firm of interior decorators, and every character in the novel touches somehow the fortunes of the house. The head of the firm is a gentleman who has dared to go into trade, but who cannot resist pretty young girls, even when they are in his own office; his son is an amiable good-for-nothing who occupies himself with the lady customers—after hours; the various employees are variously concerned with the Livingstone family, the customers, and with each other. And the shuttle that weaves back and forth among these people reaches even as far as poor Ernie Telling, whose sister's husband worked for Livingstones, but who, when times got bad and the husband's salary was cut, found the river his only refuge from a life wherein jobs were simply not to be found.

Anyone who has spent several years of his life working with the same group in the same business will recognize the truth of Mr. Leon's portrayal. No partisanship is so fierce as loyalty to one's business associates; no envy can be so bitter as envy of them; no curiosity can be sharper than that which will not quite discover everything about them. The ties which bind the members of a family together hold with obscurer but no stronger links. Indeed, often enough to leave home for the office is in fact to escape from the vague, chafing bonds of the family circle into the warm reality of the life outside, that makes every week-day interesting or actively hateful and leaves Sunday a boring interlude when there is little to do but sleep and eat.

Mr. Leon has understood this very well, and his pattern of relationships is intricately woven and refreshingly realistic. His characters, on the whole, speak with authentic everyday speech, and undergo credible mental processes which lead to equally credible acts. A better than average novel, therefore, which would be better still if Mr. Leon had not been quite afraid of taking sides, of indulging occasionally in the luxury of emphasis.

One assumes that his aim has been to show that men and women affect other men and women in strange and often unexpected ways. If A had not made such-and-such a decision, then so-and-so would not have happened to B. This, of course, is not a new idea, but it is an effective novelistic device. One need not even quarrel with Mr. Leon's point that because we see here and there a faint pattern in life, we may deduce that an omniscient vision would see the whole pattern and believe it good.

But with all the virtues of his novel, what Mr. Leon needs most is a hero and a denouement. For the first he has wavered among several of his characters, settling at last on none of them; for the second he has allowed himself to be content with his thoughts about the ultimate pattern of life. I am convinced that for these reasons his novel leaves me—although I was pleased with most of the episodes and recognize him as an accomplished writer of fiction—curiously unsatisfied. This, I tell myself, is not really the end. Nothing has happened. With the exception of poor Ernie, drowned in the Thames, all of the members of the firm and their families and acquaintances are left more or less hanging in the air. Realistic enough, perhaps, but art must have its periods. It cannot be put off with a mere semicolon.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Both Ends of the Microscope

Seven Psychologies. By Edna Heidbreder. The Century Company. $3.

The Story of Scientific Psychology. By Adelbert Ford. Sears Publishing Company. $3.

Habits: Their Making and Unmaking. By Knight Dunlap. Liveright. $3.

The Energies of Men. By William McDougall. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

General Principles of Human Reflexology. By Vladimir M. Bechterev. International Publishers. $5.

IT was more than forty years ago, as Dr. Heidbreder reminds us, that William James in writing his "Principles" foresaw the "spying and scraping" of his young countrymen robbing psychology of that chivalrous "grand style" with which the British philosophers had endowed it. The first three of these books, all written by American professors, prove how canny his prophecy was.

After a brief review of psychology in its pre-scientific and embryo-scientific stages, Dr. Heidbreder analyzes the seven psychological systems which are, or have been, most influential in America. They are, besides James's theory of the on-flowing consciousness, Titchener's structuralism, the functionalism evolved at the University of Chicago, the dynamic psychology of Columbia, behaviorism, Gestalt Psychologie, and the psycho-analytic movement. Despite Dr. Heidbreder's competence, her facility in making the jargon of the laboratory intelligible, and the freshness and pertinency of her incidental criticisms, her book remains curiously boring. A hint as to why it does can be gathered from the very headings of her chapters. Except when she is discussing the imported theories of Freud and the Gestaltists, she connects each of her psychologies with a particular university. This, indeed, is the only way their development could have been comprehensively traced. But that very fact forms a cogent criticism of "scientific" psychology itself. In contrast to all other sciences, the experimental "data" of the psychological laboratories do not become the common property of all other investigators, but remain the jealously guarded, almost secret, possession of the special small group of professors whose theories had foreshadowed them.

Dr. Heidbreder makes a brave effort toward a "justification" of this condition. She maintains that "without the systems few facts would be forthcoming." In this we must admire her courage, but we are more inclined to believe her when she tells us that "the psychologists themselves . . . see with the eyes of familiar association not only the undeniable poverty of their science, but the flimsiness and shoddiness of much of the material they are asked to accept as genuine fact."

If our academic psychology is from its very nature torpid, it can scarcely be brought to stirring life by Dr. Ford's deliberate injections of professorial pep. "The Story of Scientific Psychology" turns out to be hardly a story at all and, if we accept as criteria recurrent inconsistencies and the wilful misuse of such fundamental terms as "cause" and "teleological," only questionably scientific. The whole "narrative account of a very important science," from the time of Plato until today, is rammed into a single chapter of thirty-five pages, which bears the strange heading "The Age of Alchemy." After this the volume falls into the familiar pattern of the regulation textbook, with its standardized discussions of sensation, action, learning, etc., tricked out in appropriately cute terminology.

"Habits," from its title, its preface, and the specific directions it gives for curing stammering, finger-nail biting, and homosexuality, may be no more than a popular guide to practical living. Toward this end the book is startling enough in its assertions that the best way to remember is "to dismiss at once the attempt to remember," and the most effective aid to forgetting is "the deliberate repetition of the motor performance which is to be disintegrated or unlearned." But when we find Dr. Dunlap declaring that "habits, in their totality, make up the character of the individual," we know we are here dealing with his entire concept of psychology. For him even the crying and sucking of a new-born babe are habits, acquired, if you please, "in utero." Thus all life, from conception till death, becomes nothing but a process of "learning and unlearning," which is most adequately understood through observing rats run mazes and college students throw darts.

"The Energies of Men" is not a new work but a condensation of Dr. McDougall's earlier "Outline of Psychology" and "Outline of Abnormal Psychology" into one small volume, which affords "the answer to the great question—'What is man that Thou art mindful of him?'" Its only striking innovations are the emphasis this once prudish author now places on sexual perversion and the "concession" he makes to his critics in calling instincts, of which he now recognizes eighteen, by "the good old word 'propensities.'" In spite of these concessions, and even though he never subscribed to the associationism of his native Britain, McDougall remains the last of those philosophic psychologists whose passing James so sincerely regretted.

Bechterev's book persuades us, however, that given the right man in the right country, a grand style can be evolved even from spying and scraping. "Human Reflexology" has become "the dominant note in Russian psychology today," because back in the eighties its author scraped and spied, not figuratively, but literally into the cerebral cortex of a dog. Though he taught in Russia from then until his death in 1927, it was not until the realization of the October Revolution that Bechterev came into his own. Then the Institute for the Study of the Brain, which he had founded in 1907 and which the tzarists had vigorously persecuted, was merged with the University of Petrograd and became the "GIMZ"—State Institute of Medical Science. Subsequently Bechterev established more than a dozen similar institutes, each one committed to applying "reflexological principles" to a specific problem of the Soviet state, ranging from the taming of anti-social children to the curing of alcoholism.

The appearance in English of the "General Principles" is, as the translators suggest, of special interest to Americans because, like behaviorism, reflexology rejects introspection from the methods of natural science, and studies humanity, individually and collectively, by completely objective methods. But this striking similarity must not be taken as identity. Reflexology is more than the rewriting of the old subjective psychology. It is "a new doctrine," which assumes a "bio-social standpoint" and "draws its general premises from the final generalizations of natural science." Accordingly, Bechterev cuts through the whole mind-body problem by reducing all psychic activity, however recorded, to the "molecular energy" of theoretical physics.

Because of its "premises" reflexology must be judged by the standards not of psychology but of general science. And in this connection it should be noted that the negative results given by recent American experiments on cerebral localization make Bechterev's neurological diagrams of such "orientation reflexes" as speaking and reading appear almost as antiquated as, and very like, phrenological charts. Yet because Bechterev has become "the guiding light in humanistic science in U.S.S.R.," because his reflexology is avowedly a "doctrine" and as such must serve the Soviets not only as psychology but as philosophy as well, it must also be judged by standards broader than those of pure science. Regarded in this light, Bechterev's accomplishment does become rather stupendous. He has provided the Russians with a concept of humanity which, whether or not it agrees with every recent detail of Western science, is completely deterministic. His doctrine rejects traditional metaphysics knowingly and positively and yet is broad enough to include such diverse hypotheses as Lamarckian evolution, Helmholtz's conservation of energy, Einstein's relativity, and Freud's unconscious. It encompasses the whole of Marx's economic history and yet, because Bechtereve recognizes urges other than economic, provides for the highest "creative activities"—art and science.

GRACE ADAMS

Down Under

The Cambridge History of the British Empire. Volume VII: Part I: Australia. Part II: New Zealand. General Editors: J. H. Rose, A. P. Newton, and E. A. Benians. Adviser for Australia, Ernest Scott. For New Zealand, J. Hight. By various hands. The Macmillan Company. $10.50.

THE authority which will automatically attach itself to these imposing volumes makes them of high importance even though, in an absolute sense, they lack any visible originality in interpretation and little literary brilliance in the statement of the facts assembled with such commendable diligence. As reference works they have no superiors or, for that matter, equals. The bibliographies attached are, while not exhaustive by intent, extraordinarily valuable; they are the best guides to the sources of Australian and New Zealand history available anywhere.

The very inclusiveness of the volumes makes it possible for students of whatever bias to use them advantageously. The facts are assembled, and the present writers have nothing to offer by way of interpretation beyond the conventional and entirely empirical categories of "good" and "bad," but students with a more sharply defined set of values can place an illuminating interpretation on the story with a minimum of effort. What sticks out with quite unusual plainness is the material for a consistently economic interpretation of Australian and New Zealand development. There is a minimum of complicating and obfuscating rationalizations; the pattern does not become at all complex until the latter part of the last century, when the interests of the different groups in the population began to conflict, and compromise and accommodation became common. To this day the Australians and New Zealanders are poor hands at rationalizing their conduct, and it is no trick at all to trace to its British roots what they do have to say in extenuation or justification of their social activity. The inner logic of the inherited structures of thought like the law has been very successfully accommodated to the economic necessities of the two nations, and only an occasional conflict is visible. The chief confusion is one which could be predicted by any perceptive student of human affairs in the present era: the Australian and New Zealand publics have a poor conception of the consequences of supporting capitalism, and they are prone to object to capitalistic logic in public affairs. The result is that they are occasionally (as during the present depression) hard put to it to maintain the imposing structure of governmental solicitude for the masses without attacking the strongholds of the capitalist masters—particularly the masters of money. For it should never be forgotten that what we have in Australia and New Zealand is a highly modified version of nineteenth-century English capitalism with an unusually potent agrarian base, and not in any sense socialism.

Selection of particular authors for special praise would be unnecessarily invidious; the chapters are of an unusual uniformity of excellence; and a comprehensive tribute is best. Certain points, however, seem to call for a special mention. First, both Australia and New Zealand were settled accidentally, so to speak. Australia for many years was regarded solely as a prison colony, and there was an extended fight for freedom; New Zealand, the most British of British colonies, got settled in spite of the reluctance of the Colonial Office to ratify and assist the colonists' efforts. The settlement of both nations was complicated by theoretical paternalism, public and private, which took many guises but all of which worked out to a heavy emphasis on the part of the government in social enterprise. There was thus implanted a tradition of governmental control which has continued to the present day, and which has been utilized by all parties, conservative and radical, to preserve and extend their influence. Both nations, again, were given extraordinary stimulation through the discovery of gold in their dominions. Both were able to profit by the export of capital during the heyday of British capitalism, and so became deeply involved in the fortunes of the mother country. Both have experienced periods of tremendous boom and corresponding periods of depression in response not so much to the nature of their internal activities as in response to the world economy in which they were intimately involved. Both today are almost entirely at the mercy of the world market for primary products. Both have, turning to the future, vast possibilities for expansion, but whether expansion can be made without some readjustment of their economies in the direction of less stimulation from without seems to me doubtful.

My emphasis has been random. Material for the study of Australia and New Zealand is so plentifully supplied in these volumes that the temptation is to develop an extended rationale of their development and probable futures. Perhaps this is as good a sign of their usefulness as any I could indicate.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Health Can Be Bought

Health and Environment. By Edgar Sydenstricker. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $2.50.

THE sick person invariably asks his physician, either complainingly or inquisitively: "Why has this illness come to me?" The answer to this question is the problem of Mr. Sydenstricker's book. Health, as a biological characteristic of the human being, is the resultant of two forces, heredity and environment. This fundamental conception, ignored alike by extreme eugenicists and environmentalists, is clearly recognized by Mr. Sydenstricker. To determine for each disease the relative value of these two forces is one of medicine's major problems, to which this monograph is a contribution of great importance.

The book was prepared under the direction of Herbert Hoover's Research Committee on Social Trends. In the Foreword by the committee it is emphasized that the effort was made to keep the investigation as free as possible of "emotional coloring and unverifiable conjectures." This aim Mr. Sydenstricker has eminently achieved in his valuable work.

The author, who is chief statistician of the United States Public Health Service, presents a statistical study based on data from numerous sources, including government reports, life-insurance tables, and technical theses. He points out the limitations of the methods but at the same time rightfully emphasizes the validity of the data. Environmental factors are arbitrarily taken up as follows: geographic; urban and rural; economic and social status; and occupational.

There emerges first a group of diseases which clearly are the result of environmental factors, for example, simple goiter following insufficient iodine intake in food. At the other extreme are the "hereditary" diseases such as family bleeding or hemophilia, made famous by the former ruling families of Spain and Russia. Most impressive are the data regarding economic and social status. There is a striking inverse relation between the amount of income and the incidence of sickness and death. Infant mortality, where the father has no earnings, is 217.8 per 1,000; where earnings are $1250 or more per year it is 49.2 per 1,000. Deaths from tuberculosis follow the same direction as factors indicating poverty. Good health apparently has its price, out of the reach of a great mass of our people.

The average age at death has been postponed many years in the last century, due mostly to the decrease of mortality in childhood and early adult life. This has raised the question whether the effect is not that of allowing the survival of weaker individuals and thus lowering the vitality of the American people. Mr. Sydenstricker analyzes this problem with great care, and concludes that there is no convincing evidence of such a trend toward lowered vitality.

There has been a remarkable decrease in recent decades in the mortality from such diseases as typhoid fever, malaria, diphtheria, tuberculosis, and the diarrheas of infancy, the old dreaded summer complaint. This has been due to the change in such environmental factors as sewage disposal, mass immunizations, increased knowledge of the biology of etiological parasites, allowing means for their extermination, and also to a less definable but equally important group of factors that come under the head of improved living conditions. Mr. Sydenstricker has restricted himself to the objective presentation of the data, but it would be interesting to know what forces effected these changes, to find out especially how far labor conditions would have been improved without the militant efforts of unionism. The lives of many philanthropists who endow hospitals and medical institutes appear strangely paradoxical when their activities in labor controversies are viewed. The miner in a tuberculosis sanatorium supported by his employer might still be in good health if his earnings had been adequate for his fundamental needs. The funds for this study were supplied by the Rockefeller Foundation, a fact that is, at the least, ironical, if we recall the labor policy of the Standard Oil interests.

DAVID BERES

Counter-Revolution in Russia

The White Armies of Russia. By George Stewart. The Macmillan Company. $4.

COUNTER-REVOLUTION in any country is apt at first to take the form of blind and senseless military aggression. As Malaparte has indicated, no modern state is prepared either temperamentally or physically to overcome a successful insurrection—except by resort to police or military methods and mass slaughter. In Germany the revolutionists came to terms with the counter-revolutionists. Noske hired officers of the old imperial army to help protect the new republic. Thus Germany was spared some of the bloodiest and most extreme features of civil war—if we overlook such events as the “incidental” shooting of fifteen thousand workers by Noske’s reactionary troops—but at the same time the German rebels were sealing their own eventual doom. In Russia the revolutionists elected instead to fight the reactionaries, and not only to fight them but to destroy them if that were possible. For the Bolsheviks saw that so long as a counter-revolutionary force of any size remained in being, the revolution and their own lives would be in constant danger.

The Bolsheviks, moreover, had captured all the essential lines of communication in the country as well as the state machinery. This they had done not by military attack but by insurrection. There were only two ways to overthrow them—by invasion undertaken on a gigantic scale by a foreign army supplied from abroad, or by counter-insurrection. It was impossible for the white armies to defeat the Bolsheviks by purely military measures without adequate outside help. A military campaign based almost entirely on the scanty sources of supply and inadequate lines of communication available to the whites was bound to fail. The author, apparently a military man himself, seems to have understood this, but the white leaders quite obviously did not. Had they spent as much energy in preparing a counter-insurrection in Moscow and Petrograd as they did in trying to recruit armies in the Don, Kuban, Murmansk, and other regions not yet under Bolshevik control, the subsequent history of Russia might have been different. Some of the white leaders realized that they could not win without help from the Allies, but the latter intervened solely with a view to aggrandizing themselves and then only sparingly. The help they actually extended to the white armies was just sufficient to lead some of the reactionary generals into reckless, futile campaigns that cost hundreds of thousands of lives.

The author reviews, from the standpoint of military tactics, the campaigns of Denikin in South Russia, Miller and his associates in the Archangel region, Yudenich in the Baltic country, Kolchak and his murderous subordinates in Siberia, and Wrangel in South Russia (after the retreat of Denikin). He necessarily gives some space to the Allied intervention and the attitude of the Allied countries. But he deals only briefly with the political aspects of the counter-revolution. As a military study his work is commendable. As “a chronicle of counter-revolution” it falls far short of the mark, for while it depicts the weaknesses of the white armies, it fails to analyze or to explain the strength of the numerically small Bolshevik Party which managed not only to resist the military onslaught of the numerically superior whites but ultimately to defeat and demolish them.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

The Frontier of Today

The Land of Feast and Famine. By Helge Ingstad. Translated from the Norwegian by Eugene Gay-Tift. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THE frontier has not yet vanished from modern life, but it demands hardihood to venture into the frozen Barren Lands. For a thousand miles they stretch across the interior of Canada, and over them roam probably five million Barren Ground caribou and a handful of Indians and trappers. Helge Ingstad had just begun the practice of law in Norway when he exchanged it for four years’ solitary adventure in this northern wilderness. His experiences he has put down chronologically in a straightforward account which is neither propaganda for pioneer adventure nor execration of its hardships. It was a life like any other, and the author sets it down as such.

There were months when he and a companion followed an uncharted course up rapids and over portages, burdened by their outfit and harassed by mosquitoes, without being able to win through to the Barren Lands. There were weeks when he accompanied a band of Indian hunters on the trail of the caribou and found none, when, starving and frozen, they pressed on hopelessly with no sight of game. Always in winter there were frozen noses and frost-bitten feet and fingers, and worst of all in summer the clouds of mosquitoes. They were a black mask on one’s face while one’s hands were busy with the paddle or the pack or managing the unruly dogs. One blew a scum of them off one’s tea before one could tip the cup.

But it was a good life. The winter the young Norwegian spent alone with his dog team in the midst of game of every sort, sharing his little sheltered hollow in peace with caribou, ptarmigan, polar hares, and squirrels, was a season to remember. The most vividly described moments in the book always have to do with the dogs. Young Ingstad is not a very observant person, and his accounts of life with the Indian tribe of Caribou Eaters or of his association with the trappers of the Barrens are lifeless and without detail, but in his pages the dogs are living beings. The success of a winter in the Barren Lands depends upon a hunter's dog team, and he must know every twist of their behavior. But the relationship between them is more than this necessary cooperation. In a snow-bound winter when one never comes across the track of another human being, the dogs are comrades and friends. When food is gone it is the dogs one must think of. When one is prostrated by illness, one must crawl out at all costs to feed the dogs. And when night comes after a successful day, it is still the dogs who make a home of the solitary cabin. They are individuals all of whose idiosyncracies are known and loved.

RUTH BENEDICT

Shorter Notices

When Adam Wept. By A. R. Craig. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

Starting out to write a problem novel—the study of a marriage in which the male partner plays an inferior role economically—Miss Craig strays from her original purpose midway in the narrative, and continues with a study of clashing temperaments, pure and simple. In proportion as she abandons the artificial padding of a thesis, and clarifies the conflict between Peter and Clair as a conflict of temperament, her writing gains in power and insight; and in detailing the final solution of their marriage, she is unrelentingly loyal to the logic of character. Miss Craig writes with unusual skilfulness. In a day when so many first novels appear with such a precocious and dreary “expertness” about them that one wonders if an astral Sears-Roebuck is not purveying standardized parts to young writers, the work of this young Englishwoman stands out for its insight and superior craftsmanship.

Monsoon. By Wilfrid David. Harper and Brothers. $2.

Wilfrid David has written in the form of fiction a stinging indictment of the Englishman's rule in India. His book is youthful, uneven, sometimes naively melodramatic, but impressive in its passionate arraignment of complacency, cruelty, and exploitation. The protagonist, Dorian Fence, goes to school in Paris and then to Cambridge; he drinks, gambles, graduates; refuses to fall in line with his family's die-hard traditions; turns to debauchery for a time, and when that fails him goes to India as a journalist. At this point the book widens enormously. We meet imperialists who become rhetorical about the white man's burden while they sell the Indians “Yuvo” pills for “Frail Nerves and Vitiating Manhood”; Indian liberals, national congressists, Marxists, and the millions of nameless Gandhi followers. As a picture of modern India Mr. David's novel is very successful. There are in it no “holy men,” no tales of primitive midwifery, no descriptions of obscene temples, and no sexual aberration. Instead it gives us an impressive and vivid portrayal of the deeper social forces at work in India today.

Thomas Eakins. By Lloyd Goodrich. Published for the Whitney Museum of American Art by the Studio Publications. $10.

Here is a faithfully documented, luxuriously illustrated “critical biography” containing all one may wish to know about the Courbet of American art: his training under Gérôme and Bonnat; his travels in Italy, France, and Spain; his interest in higher mathematics, anatomy, perspective, motion photography (Eakins is said to have invented the “zoetrope,” one of the first motion-picture cameras), and the relation of these activities to his painting; his break with the Pennsylvania Academy over the use of nude models of both sexes in his art classes; his association with the Art Students' League; and a concluding chapter which examines the aesthetic and structural content of Eakins's work. Lloyd Goodrich wisely argues that Eakins's “concern was less with beauty than with the truth of life around him.” It is only within the last couple of years that Eakins's realistically painted plein-air landscapes and his more numerous single and group character portraits have begun to be appreciated widely. Unfortunately, at least part of this recent enthusiasm for his work can be traced to an indiscriminate chauvinism for things American, the result perhaps of our economic nationalism. It is to be hoped that this book will secure a place for Eakins's paintings that is neither more nor less exalted than they deserve.

The German Jew: His Share in Modern Culture. By Abraham Myerson and Isaac Goldberg. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.25.

In the last century the Jews of Germany had the effrontery to play a larger part in the cultural life of Germany than their numerical proportion could justify. It is this perhaps that set the self-appreciative Nazis so much against them. In this book the careful presentation of the Jewish contribution to German culture is so persuasive that it may lead some of its readers to the conclusion that the Jews are a superior race. The presence of so many Jewish names in the honor rolls of science, industry, and the arts has, however, satisfactory social and economic explanations which do not need the help of a hypothesis of race superiority.

Local Government in the United States. By Murray Seashengood. Harvard University Press. $1.50.

These Godkin Lectures by the former mayor of Cincinnati constitute a declaration of faith in the possibilities of municipal democracy by one of America's most successful civic leaders. There is a quaint charm and humor in them together with an abundant practical wisdom. Mr. Seashengood states the case for trained minds and remodeled machinery in America's local governments. Discussing the obstacles to efficient administration in boss-ridden cities, the author outlines the reforms in city and county government—the city-manager plan, proportional representation, economy measures—which changed Cincinnati from one of the worst to one of the best governed of our cities. He shows some insight into the economic sources of city misgovernment, but not enough; for the most part the book is written from the point of view of the “best citizens,” a phrase which expresses both the strength and weakness of American civic reform.

DON'T COMMIT SUICIDE!

FIND OUT WHAT'S WRONG WITH YOU

A staff of eminent psychologists is at your disposal for advice, information, aid, in The

MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST

Edited by DAGOBERT D. RUNES
From Current Issues

Men Without Women.....Frank Stevens
The Superiority Complex.....A. A. Roback
Fears and Their Elimination.....Smiley Blanton
Can the Homosexual Be Helped?.....Paul Donald
How to Adjust Your Personality.....Alfred Adler

25c at better newsstands. Send 25c for sample copy or $1.00 for five-month subscription to The Modern Psychologist, 310 Riverside Drive, New York City.

Name Na
Address

Films

American Exhibit

IT is not often that one encounters a Hollywood film that can give one the feeling that here, despite certain minor slips and infidelities, is an honest attempt to interpret something fundamental in the American life or character. A test to which more Hollywood pictures might be submitted is the following: Is there in the film just made something so essentially, so unmistakably American that it might be sent abroad as truly representative of what we are and what we think as a nation? According to such a test, "Little Giant," "Call Her Savage," and the Farrell-Gaynor idylls might be found, each in its way, to offer too special or superficial or romanticized a version of what we are as a nation really like. A very little reflection would prove that there are actually few pictures which could pass such a test. It is a memorable week, therefore, in which the local cinema palaces throw up two such distinguished candidates for the American exhibit at the international cinema fair as "Stranger's Return" (Capitol) and "Mama Loves Papa" (Paramount).

Directed by King Vidor, the screen version of Phil Stong's second novel is a much more successful treatment of Middle Western farm life than the same author's "State Fair" viewed earlier in the season. The comparison is made because "State Fair" was, for cinema purposes at least, the better book, and because the superiority of "Stranger's Return" illustrates once again the difference that direction and acting can make in dealing with almost identical material. In the first place, Vidor is one of the most imaginative of Hollywood directors—imaginative in the sense of knowing how to relate the particular situation to the general background. His "The Crowd" remains, in this respect, one of the best of the silent pictures. The task involves a nice equipoise of cinematic appeals, a careful distribution of stress between the characters and the backgrounds to which they are being related. In Russian films, for example, the background is more often than not overdeveloped for the sake of a thesis which places little importance on the individual or his situations. In the average sentimental Hollywood picture, on the other hand, the background is either effaced or totally distorted for the sake of what may be called "character." A good example would be the grotesque Parisian sequence in the current "Pilgrimage." In his attempt to reproduce the quality of life and living on an Iowa farm, Vidor follows what we have hoped will be the new trend in Hollywood productions—an intensive exploitation of specific terrains of American experience. And to this he has added his own special talent of extracting the maximum intensity from the individual situation without losing sight of the frame in which it is placed. If he does not perfectly succeed it is because he has in Lionel Barrymore and Miriam Hopkins extremely histrionic performers who cannot be trusted too long at a stretch. With Beulah Bondi and Franchot Tone the task is less difficult. Lionel Barrymore, provided with a long beard and a stoop, gives a rather too theatrical glow to his patriarchal Iowa farmer who drives out the grasping heirs by simulating madness. But he is properly effective for that reason in those scenes in which he is required to exaggerate—the feigned rages and the abusive interviews with Franchot Tone, with whose flat restraint he is set in contrast. To Miriam Hopkins is assigned the burden of the theme, which is sophisticated urban disillusionment finding solace and release in the purer air of the barnyard. While it is true that Miss Hopkins has neither the glamor nor the fatigue that is demanded in her role she brings to it her own quality, which is exotic enough for the purpose. Whatever one feels about the theme of Mr. Stong's story, which has reminded some people of that of "Turn to the Right," one must be glad of the opportunities it gives a director like Vidor to turn the camera on authentic native material.

From the farmyard to the suburban bungalow is a sharp enough transition, but the second is quite as American as the first, and despite its atrocious title, "Mama Loves Papa" is one of the best screen satires of American life that has yet been ventured. It is as American as the Sunday comic strip, and its hero seems like a composite of Caspar Milquetoast, Rea Irvin's Smythe, and the anonymous Mr. of "Mr. and Mrs." As played by Charles Ruggles with all the detailed perception of a trained stage comedian, the small clerk living contentedly in the suburbs under the thrall of his devoted wife (Mary Boland), enduring the insults of his temperamental employer, and expressing himself only by occasional bad puns, is a vivid incarnation of Mr. Roosevelt's "forgotten man." Nunnally Johnson and Arthur Kober have concocted a hilarious and ingenious scenario to illustrate the encroachments on such a type of the American ideal of success, imposed by the wife who listens to the women's club lecturer, and of civic and business corruption, as represented by the playground-equipment manufacturer who tries to make him his stool-pigeon. Incidental satirical elements are plentiful, and, with the exception of a monument unveiling out of "City Lights," freshly handled. Norman Macleod, the director, does his finest work to date and proves himself among the best of the Hollywood directors who have recently turned to satire.

Although "Midnight Club," which is another Oppenheim society-mystery routine, has an English setting, it manages to capture a little American atmosphere in the person of George Raft, who plays the role of a New York policeman who comes to London to clean up a band of thieves. The picture will offer little reward for anyone not already committed to Mr. Raft's charms. Despite good photography in places and some fair direction at the beginning, it fails to be very effective even in its own genre.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

DANIEL ALLEN is a student of labor questions and has done special research on conditions in the steel industry.

HAROLD SEIDMAN is a staff writer for The Nation.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

EUNICE LANGDON is the pseudonym of a former school-teacher.

KAY BOYLE is the author of "The First Lover and Other Stories" and "Year Before Last."

MAXWELL ANDERSON, author of "Night Over Taos," received the Pulitzer prize for his play, "Both Your Houses."

MARVIN LOWENTHAL, a lecturer on the contemporary European scene in the extension department of New York University, is the author of "A World Passed By."

GRACE ADAMS is the author of "Psychology: Science or Superstition."

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN lived for some time in Australia and is the author of "Australian Literature."

DAVID BERES is a practicing physician in New York.

RUTH BENEDICT is in the department of anthropology at Columbia University.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 23, 1933

No. 3555

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	197
EDITORIALS:
Cuba and the Future	199
Sacco-Vanzetti—Six Years After	200
Is Internationalism Doomed?	201
What to Do with Germany	202
CARTOON. By Prentiss Taylor	203
ISSUES AND MEN. ON MAKING FUN OF OSWALD G. VILLARD. By Oswald Garrison Villard	204
STRIKE TRUCE IN PENNSYLVANIA. By Daniel Allen	205
EXIT MACHADO. By Hubert C. Herring	207
THE DRIVE FOR SPOILS. By Mauritz A. Hallgren	208
THE UTILITY CRISIS IN NEW YORK. By Jerome Count	211
THE EDUCATOR AND THE DEPRESSION. II. THE COLLEGE INSTRUCTOR. By William Burl Thomas	213
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	215
CORRESPONDENCE	216
FINANCE. THE EXCHANGE "REFORMS." By Peter Helmoop	217
Noyes	217
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	217
BOOKS:
Sonnet. By Mark Van Doren	218
Salvation Through Charts. By Henry Hazlitt	218
The Evolution of Light. By William Gruen	219
A New Note. By Alter Brody	219
Soviet Justice. By Vera Micheles Dean	220
Twenty Years' Romancing. By Ernest Boyd	221
Toward World Suicide? By Marvin Lowenthal	221
The Animal Sense. By Pierre Loving	222
Shorter Notices	223

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

WITH THE EXIT OF MACHADO the greatest need of the Cuban people is economic recovery. This cannot be had without American help—or perhaps it would be better to say, without a cessation of the economic war that America has been conducting against Cuba. In 1928, when raw sugar without duty was selling at $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound, the duty of $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents on sugar from Cuba, our greatest source of supply, meant a duty in terms of value of about 70 per cent. The Smoot-Hawley tariff raised the duty to 2 cents a pound, and as the price of sugar fell this became, in effect, by May of 1932 a duty in terms of value of 350 per cent. Not content with striking this blow against the Cuban sugar grower, we are now considering the adoption of import allotments which would permit the entrance from Cuba of only 1,700,000 tons of sugar in the coming marketing year, though the average imports of Cuban sugar during the past five years have been only a little short of 2,500,000 tons. While we have helped to bring ruin to Cuba, we have not helped ourselves in the slightest. We have taxed the American consumer about \$300,000,000 a year. But our beet-sugar industry, even with this heavy protection, even with the use of imported Mexican labor and of child labor, has not grown. The growth, instead, has been in the industries of Hawaii, the Philippines, and Porto Rico. By reducing our imports from Cuba we have hurt our export trade by almost exactly the same proportion. By a curious irony we have even directly hurt our capitalists, for the American capital invested in Cuba—mainly in sugar—is estimated at from \$1,225,000,000 to \$1,500,000,000, against less than \$300,000,000 invested in the domestic beet- and cane-sugar industries combined.

IN THE HALCYON DAYS of our republic it was a popular boast that one American, even with his right arm tied behind him, could lick two Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, or nationals of any other country on earth. It may not have been true, but it was brave, red-blooded doctrine which helped lots of youngsters to grow up into hard-fisted business men who, having made sacks of money, were invited to address the local Young Men's Christian Association on "The Spirit of Service." Alas, the depression, old age, or the debunkers have broken our pride, and now the State Department doubts if 120,000,000 Americans can lick one seventy-six year old Communist. At least that seems to be the only possible reason why our consular officers in London should deny a visa to visit the United States to Tom Mann. Apparently our government, our institutions, and our business system are shakier than even the most pessimistic supposed if they would be so seriously endangered by the speeches of this veteran British radical that he has to be excluded from our shores. It may be, of course, that the State Department, or its representatives in London, have misjudged their fellow Americans. Perhaps all of us are not such perfect prototypes of the Timid Soul (and rather an ignoble one too) as it assumes. But unless our diplomatic service is in error, General Johnson made an ornithological and psychological mistake in choosing a Blue Eagle as our modern emblem. He ought to have chosen a yellow eagle with a white feather in its tail.

WE ARE GLAD to note that official Washington is waking up to the need of an unrelenting campaign for unemployment relief and is trying to prevent newspaper ballyhoo about improving conditions from jeopardizing the work of raising funds for the distressed. Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Relief Administrator, estimates that a billion dollars will be needed in the country for next winter and that the States must match the $500,000,000 appropriated by the national government. He is insisting that in order to receive federal aid a State must first do its part. President Roosevelt has gone even further, declaring the other day that the chief cities of a State must also show adequate action before federal funds would be forthcoming. More than 1,000,000 families in forty-three cities were supported from federal, State, and municipal relief funds in July at a cost of $25,000,000. Although for the nation as a whole there was a slight decrease in the number of families on relief in July as compared with June, the condition was by no means general. In New York City the number of families that had to be assisted increased by 10 per cent from June to July, although expenditures decreased by 13 per cent owing to exhaustion of funds and the necessity in consequence of a more niggardly distribution. A sharp protest against inadequate relief has just been made by a committee of prominent New Yorkers organized by the Federal Council of Churches.

Whatever may be the underlying facts about the city administration in its political aspects, or in its relation to the State, the federal government, the bankers, and the taxpayers, we desire to protest in the name of humanity against this continued victimizing of our most defenseless citizens [says the committee]. The unemployed should not longer be tortured on the altar of inadequate management of the affairs of government.

OHIO is one of the States to which federal assistance has been refused on the ground that it was not doing enough on its own account toward unemployment relief. In consequence the situation in the commonwealth is exceedingly bad. In Cleveland the number of families on the relief lists dropped by 3 per cent in June from the number for May, but the cost rose 4 per cent owing to increases in the price of food. The Federated Press quotes the chairman of the county relief administration as saying:

The fact that prosperity seems to be on the way back has created a serious situation, because thousands of people still without jobs are becoming restive and discontented as they read every day of others getting jobs. When they come to the Associated Charities and can't get enough to eat, that doesn't help. I think you gentlemen must realize what it would be like in Cleveland if 180,000 men, women, and children were told they must obtain their food as best they could.

The county budget commissioner struck a similar note in discussing the delay in getting relief for disabled veterans. "I have had committees of soldiers coming to my office in increasing numbers in the last few days, and they are not in any mood to be played with," he said. The Catholic Charities states that since February only emergency cases have been received in the charity wards, which means that there are now hundreds of sick people who have no way of obtaining medical care. Some 3,000 homeless children who are boarded in foster homes will be turned out in the streets if money is not provided shortly for their care.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT made no statement regarding his intentions after calling his new monetary experts into conference, so it seems probable that he has decided to let the currency question drift for the present. It is to be hoped, however, that he will consult a few more monetary experts before going further with Professor George Warren's plan for a "commodity" dollar. Whatever may be said about the merits of a so-called "managed currency"—and all currency must of course be managed to some extent—the overwhelming opinion among monetary experts has for decades been against the plan now urged by Professor Warren. While the ideal of a stable price level should not be lost sight of, the immediate need is to give American business men and the world generally a prompt knowledge of the exact level in terms of gold at which the dollar will in future be fixed. As soon as possible—and without waiting for the resumption of the World Economic Conference, if that dismal conference ever is resumed—negotiations should be begun quietly with Great Britain with the purpose of having both countries return to gold at the same time. Each country should be free to pick its own level of devaluation, although for the convenience of foreign traders and tourists it must be hoped that an even relationship between the two currencies can be agreed upon. When the United States and Great Britain have achieved an agreement, other nations might be invited to participate, but whether they choose to do so or not the two countries should go through with their program.

AS WE ALL KNOW, agreements under the NRA are voluntary. Employers of labor the country over are of their own free will hurrying to cooperate in a general endeavor to increase pay rolls and employment. There is nothing coercive about this plan; it is just a grand, nationwide, volunteer effort. And so, boys and girls, let's all get together and crucify anybody who holds back. Not legally; we really don't dare test the thing in the courts. Perhaps we couldn't get away with it. We'll simply boycott the dirty slackers—though their number, you understand, is negligible—and we'll hire private detectives to spy on them, and committees of housewives and unemployed society ladies will intimidate and report on them, and we'll print their names in the newspapers. And meanwhile good patriots will follow their political leaders blindly, for doing things blindly is the only way to get things done. This is The Nation's abbreviated translation of Hugh S. Johnson's speech on national recovery delivered the other day at the opening of the St. Louis NRA drive.

IN CASE ANYONE THINKS we have altered the sense, if we may dignify it with that term, of the General's words, we confidently refer him to the text of the address printed on Monday, August 14, and meanwhile we quote a few of his phrases in support of our version:

If you see a place where there is none [no Blue Eagle] and you do any kind of business there, you have a right to ask: "Brother, where is your Blue Eagle?" and, if the answer does not seem fair, to take your business elsewhere. . . . A woman in defense of the support of her home is about as safe for triflers as a lioness at the door of a den full of cubs. Whenever an American housewife understands that the Blue Eagle on everything that she permits to come into her home is a symbol of its restoration to security, may God have mercy on the man or group of men who attempt to trifle with this bird. . . .

At this time we ask only that you visualize the rare case of a man who has betrayed the confidence of the President and the people of this nation. . . . What should be done with such a man? As happened to Danny Deever . . . NRA will have to remove from him his badge of public faith and business honor and "tykin of his buttons off an' cut his stripes away" and break the bright sword of his commercial honor in the eyes of his neighbors—and throw the fragments—in scorn—in the dust at his feet. It is a sentence of economic death. It will never happen. The threat of it transcends any puny penal provisions in this law. . . .

This single thing I know—that we are effecting the deliberate plan and judgment of one of the greatest champions of the mass of men that ever walked this earth—that where he leads I, for one, am proud to follow and, in this great crisis in the world's affairs, to follow blindly, for thus—and not otherwise—are human ends attained.

THE ADMINISTRATION is still faced with a wheat-surplus problem. Despite the drought, which lowered the volume of the current crop to the lowest point in forty years, and despite the acreage-reduction plan, by which it is hoped to cut production in 1934 and 1935 by approximately 20 per cent, there will still be a fairly large carry-over of wheat in the country. On July 1 the carry-over stood at 350,000,000 bushels. It may be somewhat smaller by the end of the year. Nevertheless, it will be large enough to continue to depress prices in the domestic market. For this reason the Administration is giving much thought to plans for disposing of the surplus abroad. It has to decide whether it shall or can market the extra grain in an orderly manner or simply dump it. That it may not hesitate to resort to dumping was suggested by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace in a speech in Chicago a few weeks ago. He declared that the United States might elect to "dump its surplus into the world market at a price as low as twenty cents a bushel while holding the domestic price at around $1. It would be deplorable if that had to be done, but I think it is conceivable if necessary to bring down our wheat surplus." Mr. Wallace said this would depend in part on the ability of the international wheat conference to bring about a worldwide crop-reduction agreement. The conference recently adjourned until August 21, but perhaps it never will be any nearer definitive agreement than it was after several weeks of deliberation in June and July. Ultimate failure of the conference might precipitate an international wheat war similar to that which shook the world market in the autumn of 1930.

IN THAT EVENT the United States may have to bear the brunt of the criticism that will surely follow, especially because of its processing tax on wheat. This tax is applied only to grain earmarked for domestic consumption. Wheat destined for export is tax-free. Technically, of course, this tax does not enter into the cost of producing the wheat itself. Nor does it figure in the prices quoted on the grain exchanges. Yet it can and doubtless will be argued that the domestic price is actually thirty cents higher than the quoted price, or the world price, because the processors who buy the wheat to prepare it for domestic consumption are in fact paying thirty cents more for it. Hence the tax-free export wheat is being sold in the world market at a price below the domestic level, and that, in the opinion of many, constitutes dumping. Looked at another way, critics may argue that the subsidies being paid the wheat growers under the allotment plan have the effect of relieving them of a part of their production costs, so that any of their wheat entering the export trade may conceivably be sold at a price below the cost of production. Here again the charge of dumping can be raised. Lastly, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration is now considering ways and means of financing wheat sales abroad. If these financing projects follow the lines of the recent cotton deal with the Soviet Union, or the sale of wheat to the Chinese Nationalist Government, there can be no real objection. But if the transactions are so devised as to reduce the cost of the grain to the buyer, the United States must expect to be accused of dumping. When the Farm Board developed a scheme of this sort in February, 1931, Europe and the Argentine were furious. Their protests caused the board to drop its plan.

Cuba and the Future

MACHADO has fled. But not before his ruthlessness exacted a further toll in the massacre of twenty-one persons prematurely cheering reports of his resignation. Moreover, the chief criminal goes scot-free to enjoy the spoils of his dictatorship, while in two thousand Cuban homes there is mourning for the death at his hands of a husband, father, son, or brother. And beyond these individual tragedies, the damage which his eight years' tyranny wrought on the political, economic, social, and spiritual fabric of Cuba is incalculable. Machado's removal was the prerequisite to any new deal for Cuba and the working out of a new and better relationship between the two neighbor nations. Violent revolution, held in leash only by a well-equipped army—paid by the dollars lent by Broad Street—nearly overtook the evolutionary solution which Ambassador Welles was wisely seeking to bring about. His efforts, otherwise successful, fell short to the extent of the violence which occurred both before and after Machado's flight.

But Machado was after all but the symbol and culminating proof of failure. The task is to work out—on the basis of thirty-five years' experience—an entirely new program for the United States and Cuba. It is impossible to disassociate the two countries; impossible not to recognize that there is a common and overlapping interest involved in their propinquity and in their need for each other's products. And it is necessary for official America to recognize our large share of responsibility for what has happened to Cuba. The United States forced the Platt Amendment on the Cubans against their will. Our various types of interference—however well-intentioned—have neither achieved the objectives specified in the amendment nor promoted the welfare of the Cuban people or of the great body of Americans who have a material interest in Cuba both as consumers and as producers. As for the crowning infamy of Machado, let it be well understood that, despite our recent avowed "hands-off" policy, Machado derived from the United States the support which kept him in office. It was none other than President Calvin Coolidge who at the sixth Pan-American Congress at Havana in 1928 declared that Cuba's people were "independent, free, prosperous" and that they had "reached a position . . . in the genuine expression of their public opinion at the ballot-box . . . that has commanded universal respect and admiration." This was two years after Machado's terrorism had become notorious, after protests against it had been voiced on the floor of our Congress, and when only his suppression of public opinion and of free elections was enabling him to perpetuate himself in power.

Machado has been the servant of American banking and power interests. Between them, with a complacent State Department, they have maintained a government "adequate for the destruction of life, property, and individual liberty" (to paraphrase Article III of the Platt Amendment), have exploited the Cuban people, and have betrayed the good name, faith, and interest of the American people. No program that does not leave the Cubans free to liquidate these long-standing abuses—as Washington is seeking to liquidate corresponding abuses at home—can succeed in making "Cuba libre" other than an empty phrase.

Sacco-Vanzetti—Six Years After

SINCE the execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti on August 22, 1927, it has been the custom of The Nation to recall the event annually not in a spirit of recrimination but as a reminder of the fallibility of our judicial system and in the hope of preventing certain current legal injustices from ending in such a ghastly tragedy as that perpetrated in Massachusetts six years ago. We are aware of no way in which Sacco and Vanzetti can more fittingly be remembered than by making an appeal in behalf of some of the present-day victims of legal oppression.

As we survey the national scene, we are glad to note that all but two of the victims of the Centralia hysteria have been released, and according to a recent announcement another was expected to be freed soon. On the other hand, California's long persecution of Tom Mooney still continues, and in other parts of the country more recent victims of mass fear and hatred call for our assistance. In New York City an Italian, Athos Terzani, has apparently been made the target of the enmity of a fascist organization known as the Khaki Shirts. Terzani was present at a meeting at which his friend Anthony Fierro was shot. The police, it is said, ignored plain evidence of the guilt of another man, and the Italian Assistant District Attorney in charge of the case obtained an indictment for murder against Terzani. Fierro's father has denounced the indictment, and a Terzani Defense Committee, headed by Norman Thomas, has established headquarters at 94 Fifth Avenue with a view to collecting funds and heading off another such miscarriage of justice as that which overtook Sacco and Vanzetti.

But perhaps the most outstanding example of judicial injustice in the country today is that of the continued imprisonment of the Scottsboro boys in the face of the complete demolition of the case against them by Judge Horton, Alabama's own chief participant in the legal proceedings. Nine youthful Negroes have been in jail for rape for more than two years upon evidence which Judge Horton has characterized as improbable and insufficient. It will be recalled that the boys were first convicted and sentenced to death at Scottsboro, Alabama, on the word of two white girls of poor reputation who claimed to have been the victims. The first convictions were set aside by the United States Supreme Court on the ground that the boys had not had proper representation by counsel. One of the prisoners was then retried at Decatur and again convicted, but the verdict was set aside last June by the presiding justice, Judge Horton. At the second trial one of the two girls, Ruby Bates, repudiated her previous testimony, leaving the State's case practically dependent upon the word of one girl contradicted by that of the other. It is worth recalling that in his decision Judge Horton did not refer to Ruby Bates's evidence. He found the story of the other girl, Victoria Price, in itself unconvincing.

Her manner of testifying and demeanor on the stand militate against her [he said]. Her testimony was contradictory, often evasive, and time and again she refused to answer pertinent questions. The gravity of the offense and the importance of her testimony demanded candor and sincerity. In addition to this the proof tends strongly to show that she knowingly testified falsely in many material aspects of the case.

Of other evidence offered by the prosecution Judge Horton said:

It corroborates Victoria Price slightly, if at all, and her evidence is so contradictory to the evidence of the doctors who examined her that it has been impossible for the Court to reconcile their evidence with hers.

In the face of this devastating analysis of the case against the Scottsboro boys, it would be a clear waste of money and an obvious injustice to continue the prosecution, and yet the very judge who made the ruling has so far refused to release the defendant on bail. The least that Alabama justice can do in behalf of the Scottsboro boys is promptly to release them on bail. The people of the State may then decide at a later date whether to go through the travesty of further trials or to dismiss the indictments.

Alabamans have been exceedingly touchy in regard to the intrusion of Northerners in the Scottsboro case. They ought to remember that even greater pressure has been brought to bear on Massachusetts, Washington, and California in regard to the Sacco-Vanzetti, Centralia, and Mooney-Billings cases, respectively, so that no issue of sectionalism is involved. It may be added also that no one of these cases was ever so blasted by its own judiciary as that of the Scottsboro boys has been by Judge Horton in his recent decision.

Also the longer release is denied to the Scottsboro victims the more intent will be the eyes of the rest of the country upon other prosecutions of a similar sort within the State. Indeed the shocking outburst of passion which has just led to a lynching had its origin in the Scottsboro case. Lawyers of the International Labor Defense, believing that three Negro prisoners at Tuscaloosa were about to become victims of a legal injustice similar to that visited upon the Scottsboro boys, attempted to take part in the trial, maintaining that they had an authorization to represent one of the defendants. The parents of the defendant in question denied this in court, but the lawyers say this action was forced upon them. Later the lawyers were "escorted" from the town for their own "safety" by National Guardsmen. Probably the feeling stirred up by the visit of the lawyers was responsible for the subsequent lynching. Tuscaloosa, therefore, is blaming the International Labor Defense for the tragedy. Actually, Alabama justice is to blame, especially the Scottsboro trial, which excited wide fear in the United States—later confirmed by Judge Horton's decision—that Negroes accused of rape or murder of white persons were likely to be convicted by passion rather than by evidence.

We hope Governor Miller is serious in his announced intention to prosecute those responsible for the lynching by the Tuscaloosa mob. The indications are that the officials who released the three Negro prisoners to the lynchers were guilty either of an intentional or a cowardly betrayal of their trust.

Is Internationalism Doomed?

THE outcome of the World Economic Conference was a sad blow to those liberal spirits everywhere who had entertained even moderate hopes of witnessing some measure of international cooperation. It is perhaps wise, therefore, to ask ourselves at this time whether even these moderate hopes were and still are illusory. An increasing chorus seems to be assuring us that they are. John Strachey, in "The Coming Struggle for Power," sounds the death-knell of internationalism writing from the Marxist standpoint; Clark Foreman, in the New Republic, sounds it writing from a fascist standpoint; and J. M. Keynes, in the Yale Review, sounds it writing from a liberal standpoint.

Before resigning ourselves to an era of complete nationalism, however, we might examine the arguments of these prophets more closely. Let us start with Mr. Keynes, the converted liberal. He begins by telling us that he was brought up, like most Englishmen, to respect free trade not only as an economic doctrine which a rational and instructed person could not doubt, but almost as a part of the moral law. What has now converted him appears to be not any belief that his previous logic was false but merely that it was incomplete. First, for example, he considers the question of peace. "It does not now seem obvious that a great concentration of national effort on the capture of foreign trade, that the penetration of a country's economic structure by the resources and the influence of foreign capitalists, and that a close dependence of our own economic life on the fluctuating economic policies of foreign countries are safeguards and assurances of international peace." He is convinced, further, that the growing divorce between ownership and management, serious enough within a country, becomes much more serious when capital moves across foreign boundaries. He has come to believe, again, that under our modern methods of mass production the economic advantages of the international division of labor today are not at all comparable with what they were. At any event, it may be worth paying a certain price to secure the advantages of "gradually bringing the product and the consumer within the ambit of the same national, economic, and financial organization." Finally, one by one the great nations of the world, Russia, Italy, Ireland, Germany, the United States, are turning towards new modes of political economy, and each wishes to try its own special form of national planning. While it is doing this, it cannot afford to leave itself at the mercy of the unrestricted play of world economic forces. Thus, "the policy of an increased national self-sufficiency is to be considered not as an ideal in itself but as directed to the creation of an environment in which other ideals can be safely and conveniently pursued."

This argument cannot be lightly dismissed. Certainly we do not want to return to the kind of "internationalism" represented by our reckless foreign loans in the twenties, nor to a resumption of economic imperialism. Certainly we must learn to work out some direct control of new foreign long-term lending, not merely with the purpose of passing on the nature and quality of specific loans and their possible consequences, but with the purpose of limiting the total volume of such loans. But it is one thing to resolve to avoid new entanglements; it is another to attempt to sever suddenly those that we already have. Americans still own billions of dollars worth of foreign securities, and have sunk hundreds of millions in establishing factories abroad. A sudden policy of "nationalism" now, which would refuse to accept interest or principal on these loans, or would refuse to allow the profits of the factories to be remitted back home, would amount to a free gift of all these billions to foreigners. If we are to follow the genuinely nationalistic policy of making no new loans, and withdrawing from Europe by getting our old ones paid back, or even of trying to get interest on our present loans, then we must let down our tariff barriers and consent to take such payment in its only possible form, an excess of imports. The fears of our pseudo-nationalists that such an excess of imports would ruin American manufacturers are misplaced. For Americans who had invested their money abroad would not be buying these added foreign goods instead of American goods; they would be buying them in addition to American goods and other imports. For Europe in that case would not merely send us the goods; it would send these investors the money to buy them with.

Mr. Keynes does not advocate nationalism without qualification. He still believes that "a considerable degree of international specialization is necessary in a rational world in all cases where it is dictated by wide differences of climate, natural resources, native aptitudes, level of culture, and density of population." He does not wish it to be supposed that he indorses everything done today in the name of economic nationalism. He even wishes that the World Economic Conference had achieved a mutual reduction of tariffs. And he makes this proviso: "Those who seek to disembarass a country of its entanglements should be very slow and wary. It should not be a matter of tearing up roots but of slowly training a plant to grow in a different direction."

Unfortunately, this qualification of four lines will probably attract little attention in an article of fifteen pages. It happens, however, to be of the utmost importance, and this importance Mr. Keynes does not remotely indicate. This "training" is not a matter of months or years but of decades. Fifty-five per cent of the cotton growers of the South, to take but one example, are raising cotton solely for the foreign market; if that market disappears, they must go out of business. Can we continue to support them indefinitely out of subsidies? The same problem arises in different degree in regard to our tobacco and wheat growers, our copper and oil industries, our equipment for turning out automobiles, agricultural machinery, printing machinery, sewing machines, typewriters, locomotives.

And national planning is certainly not in itself a reason for barring imports. To begin with, it is the business of a national plan, certainly at the beginning, to adjust itself to the existing balance of industry within the country rather than to expect the latter to adjust itself suddenly to an arbitrary plan. So far the National Recovery Administration has not attempted to dictate the exact size, absolute or relative, of any industry. It is true that the NRA has somewhat raised our costs of production, but our tariff is already as high that even after a substantial reduction it might not let in enough foreign goods to pay the full interest on our foreign loans.

John Strachey's argument differs from Keynes's in that while Keynes argues that a moderate nationalism is desirable, Strachey merely holds that an increasingly violent nationalism is inevitable. He maintains that under capitalism monopoly tends constantly to increase, and that monopoly and nationalism are closely related, because national monopolies seek and get protection. But even if we grant this argument, the time element is still important, and it may be not unreasonable to hope that even in capitalistic countries tariffs may be reduced below their present preposterous levels during the next decade or two. After all, it is well to remind ourselves that the tariffs of the seventeenth century were worse than those of the nineteenth, and that Adam Smith himself in his day was not much more sanguine over the prospects of free trade than Mr. Strachey is now. "Not only the prejudices of the public," wrote Smith, "but what is much more unconquerable, the private interests of many individuals, irresistibly oppose it." Finally, it must be said that none of the intellectual defenses of nationalism so far written by any economist of standing bear any relation to the insane policies actually prevailing. For it is not national self-containment that most of the statesmen now in power want; it is high-pressure exports without imports. And for this Mr. Strachey has suggested the only solution: the creation of an international dump for commodities somewhere in the middle of the Atlantic.

What to Do with Germany

THE joint French and English offensive against Hitler on behalf of Austria has met with an indignant protest from the Nazi government that this "mixing in the German-Austrian impasse was inadmissible"; that it "failed to see any reason for the application of the Four-Power Treaty in this instance." According to the dispatches, the French and English governments are not dismayed by this rebuff and there is good reason to believe that if the Hitlerite offensive against Austria continues, it will be taken to the League of Nations. At any moment the menace of Hitlerism may force a grave international crisis.

There are, for example, the recurring reports that the French have definite facts as to the secret arming of Germany. Much damaging information, it is stated, has been received from German exiles in France, Austria, and Switzerland. On July 25 the British Under-Secretary of the Foreign Office declared in Parliament that the German Air Minister (the notorious Captain Göring) had expressed to the British air-attaché his ministry's desire to purchase twenty-five to fifty British-built aircraft for police purposes. The British Charge d'Affaires in reply officially notified the German government that "his Majesty's government could not countenance the sale of British aircraft to the German government for purposes forbidden by the Paris air agreement." That the Hitler government intends to arm Germany as rapidly as possible permits of no doubt. The whole Nazi teaching is based upon the principle of an armed Germany for whose military forces the women are being urged and financially aided to bear as many children as possible. What the Allies face is the simple question whether or not they shall sit quietly by while Germany arms in violation of the peace treaty.

If it is a simple question, the answer is extraordinarily difficult, especially for those who are convinced of the futility of force. How, it is asked, can people who opposed the foolish policy of encircling Russia by bayonets evolved at the Peace Conference in 1919, contemplate joint action against Germany in 1933 because of the form and the conduct of its internal affairs by its de facto government? To this the answer is made that Germany is today a far greater menace to the stability, peace, and order of Europe than the Soviets have been at any time. More important than that, it is stressed that Germany has not only given her word in the Treaty of Versailles but is bound by the Locarno treaties and now by the Four-Power Pact, and that, therefore, the case of Germany is far different from that of the Soviets at the time of the encirclement projected by Versailles, when all treaties between Russia and the rest of the world had been abrogated by the revolution.

When all is said and done, however, it comes down to the fact that Germany has a government which is officially teaching its people that it was victorious in the World War and that it must seek by force to regain the German colonies, to seize additional Russian territory, to reconquer the Polish Corridor, and to win back the lost Danish territory, as well as Eupen Malmedy and Alsace-Lorraine. Were Hitler to succeed in adding Austria to Germany, he would be emboldened to attempt other aggressions; he would be able to assure his deluded people that he had bluffed the Allies into yielding on the political union of Austria with Berlin or its control from there, whereas only a few years ago England, France, and Italy had forbidden the economic union of the two countries. Again, should Hitler successfully breach the peace treaties in one place, he would certainly find plenty of excuses for defying or violating them elsewhere.

Facing all these facts, we are inclined to believe that the nations are justified in going far to enforce the disarmament clauses of the Peace Treaty in an effort to stave off the final catastrophe which another world war would spell. No one nation should, however, act alone as France did in the Ruhr. It must be a joint move by all the countries of Europe—whether Italy will go along is one of the vital parts of the problem—together with the United States, acting through the League or under the Pact of Paris, and it should be based upon the provision of the Versailles treaty which prohibits the rearming of Germany. It should and could be enforced, not by marching troops into Germany, but by the use of the economic boycott, the breaking-off of intercourse, and the sending of Germany to Coventry. Such a course offers the only peaceful method of preventing the madmen now in control of the German people from threatening, not only personal and intellectual liberty everywhere, but another worldwide war.

SACCO AND VANZETTI

THE SCOTTSBORO BOYS

TOM MOONEY

Given Under These Our Seals . . .

A Drawing by Prentiss Taylor

Issues and Men

On Making Fun of Oswald G. Villard

SOMEBODY on the St. Louis Post-Dispatch—I suspect that it is a brilliant young Irishman, Ralph Coghlan by name—has been making fun of Oswald G. Villard, “grizzled and battle-worn ex-editor of The Nation.” Perhaps some of the readers of this journal remember who he is? At any rate, it appears that this ex-editor wrote a piece, on returning to this country recently, in which he gave thanks for some of the good things accomplished by the Roosevelt Administration, such as the abolition of child labor, the altered popular attitude toward radical social changes, and so on. So this somebody in the St. Louis office, in search of a topic on a very hot day, dwelt with joy upon the ex-editor’s “bursting into cheers,” “blessing his stars,” and salaaming “respectfully three times to the East” in gratitude to Mr. Roosevelt. This, the Post-Dispatch editor thinks, is an event “comparable with such historical wonders as the conversion of the Emperor Constantine, the fall of the Bastille, and the surrender of Cornwallis.” Why? Because this man Villard usually surveys “the political scene with undisguised unhappiness, contempt, and, on occasion, something approaching despair.” According to his friends, says the “P-D.,” he is “the greatest crusading journalist in this country,” but they have “often privately lamented what they consider his constitutional inability to be satisfied.”

Well, this is delightful and kindly fooling—and complimentary at that. As one who may claim to being deeper in the confidence of the aforesaid Mr. Villard than any one else, I happen to know that he is greatly flattered at being considered an editorial dog-days topic. Furthermore he happens to be one of those men who like a joke on themselves better than one on anybody else. Nevertheless, his laughter having subsided, and his pleased smile faded, he could not help indulging in some serious musings and reflections. Here they are—with the ex-editor’s leave to print.

First, the most flattering part of the charge that he is never satisfied and is always and ever finding fault is that this charge was brought against each and every one of his predecessors in the editorship of The Nation and will be brought against every one of his successors—if they do their job well and live up to this journal’s traditions. It was first heard in 1865, the year The Nation was founded, and it was brought against its first editor, another brilliant Irishman, Edwin L. Godkin by name, during every year of his editorship and never ceased to be heard after he graduated from The Nation to the editorship of the New York Evening Post.

Mr. Godkin was so little satisfied with what he beheld in the American scene that this convinced and confirmed democrat was constantly being admonished “to go back where he came from if he could not find anything more to praise.” “The chronic scold” was one of his usual designations. It was asserted that he “made virtue odious” every evening; that he upheld impossible standards and expected of politicians more than frail human nature in office could possibly give. Widely it was said that he was the despair of his friends who privately thought him a modern Jeremiah and also “constantly lamented what they considered his constitutional inability to be satisfied.” Never did any other editor earn so great a chorus of editorials in this strain. That he never laughed, that he was utterly destitute of humor and never, never praised anyone was also asserted by those who did not know him and read him but superficially. Faith and hope and confidence in the success of the great American experiment were always denied to him in the editorial sanctums of other newspapers.

Yet the facts were that he criticized only commensurately with the extent of his love for the country of his adoption; that he had a superabundance of humor and was forever seeing the humorous side of things: that his nature was essentially cheerful and that he had an abiding faith in the triumph of his ideals without which he could not have carried on for nearly forty years; and that he praised warmly and freely whenever he could. The truth is that he disturbed those people who do not like any criticism of the status quo and irked those who like only a little faultfinding and then only when it pleases them. Finally, people who had few or alterable standards disliked Mr. Godkin because his principles were fixed and immutable and because he set his standards for men in public life as high as possible and kept to them without any compromises or yielding whatsoever. Mr. Villard recalled all this of the man at whose feet he once sat, and wondered, with gratitude to the Post-Dispatch, whether he might by some stretch of the imagination attribute to himself a tithe of the steadfastness of his teacher and predecessor. He could not. He could only “thank his stars” again—this time that the St. Louis paper possessed so kindly a sense of humor.

Next a curious thought came to this “grizzled and battle-worn ex-editor.” It was that of all the long list of his journalistic sins of omission and commission he is nowhere more vulnerable than in the enthusiasms he once showed for certain public men and the praise he then showered upon them—Charles E. Hughes and Woodrow Wilson, for example, the one a Republican and the other a Democrat. To them he once gave a devotion and faith which make curious and rather deadly reading today. And he stumbled not without warning. There was Frank H. Simonds. When he was Albany correspondent of the Evening Post and the ex-editor was its manager and Mr. Hughes was Governor of New York, Frank Simonds constantly warned his chief that the Governor was not the true liberal and reformer he appeared to be and that he would yet prove this. And the second editor of The Nation, Wendell P. Garrison, used to point to Mr. Wilson’s third-rate and unreliable history of the United States, its faulty logic, his lack of detachment on sectional issues, and his often uneven mental processes as proof that he could never be a great and trustworthy leader of the people.

And this is only part of a considerable list in regard to which the ex-editor’s enthusiasms, his eager desire for men whom he could praise whole-heartedly and follow without reserve, have led him astray. He did not forget that the Post-Dispatch was merely joking, but if only people knew how hard it is to be so seldom able to praise honestly!

Some of the ex-editor's critics have attributed these errors to a certain "childish faith in the usefulness of good men"; others to unquenchable optimism, and undaunted faith in the final triumph of his lost causes. Perhaps. But whatever the real reason, it was not a predisposition to dissent and to find fault, but the very reverse! And so, still musing, the ex-editor signs himself once more

Oswald Garrison Villard

Strike Truce in Pennsylvania

By DANIEL ALLEN

Fayette County, August 12

WELL, it looks like it's all over now," people down here are saying. The newspapermen are leaving. The girls are looking around for their regular boy friends now that the departure of the National Guardsmen is imminent. The union leaders are beginning to settle back a bit; they have had a close shave.

It seemed for a moment that the men would go right on striking in defiance of their leaders and even the government. The agreement was no agreement without union recognition. Of course, the Administration got busy and McGrady, a local business man had it, gave the boys song-and-dance. Come back for Roosevelt, the man who'll do right by little labor. When before had a President of the United States sent his personal representative down to talk to striking workers? William Feeney, president of District No. 4 of the United Mine Workers of America, whom the men had a moment before disregarded, was able now to speak of them as having "misunderstood" the agreement. After all, you couldn't blame poor coal miners for misunderstanding official language. The Hearst Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph correspondent was expansively sympathetic. "Hell," he said to a puzzled-looking fellow, "even a lawyer'd have a job making it all out, so where do we newspapermen and coal miners come in?" Newspapermen and coal miners, McGrady and the soot-faced hunk loading the next wagon, Judge Musmano who is running for reelection in Pittsburgh posing in miners' grays "enjoying a snack in the pit," Doc Springer on the radio who "never lies to miners," and that "honest-to-God man, Franklin D. Roosevelt," me, and J. P. Morgan partnership! The men no longer misunderstand, they have been hurrahed into as nice an understanding as anybody could wish.

They have gone back to the mines. Where they have not yet gone back they are meeting to vote the question. Curiously, the H. C. Frick miners who were the first to strike were among the first to go back. The Vesta mines, the Clyde mines, in Washington County, have not, as I write, resumed operations. There are also stray mines in Greene County and certain of the Pittsburgh Coal (Mellon) mines where proper arrangements have not been made for scales and checkweighmen. Last week it was all a matter of the union and union recognition; now, where the men are still out the large issue has simmered down to a pathetically stubborn insistence on small things. Give us those scales, we want those scales, maybe we're crazy to be making such a fuss over scales, but that's how we are, so give them to us. It is not that the checkweighmen and the scales are unimportant, but that the companies have shown in the past that they can get around them. What is needed is a big victory on an all-inclusive issue like that of the union. In 1922 the H. C. Frick Company actually equipped itself with scales, but as soon as the strike had fizzled out on account of Lewis's separate agreement with the closed-shop mines, the scales were put aside. The men know this and they know also how easily scales and checkweighmen can be tampered with. They are making this fuss less because they think the particular cause warrants it than because they have an intense need to be making some sort of a fuss.

"Company Men"

This strike has had a tremendous force back of it. A clerk in a company office put it this way: "In 1922, the men came out for the union. It was something ahead of them which they wanted which brought them out. Now it's not

Drawings by William Gropper

Striking Miners

what they want which has brought them out, it's not what's ahead of them. It's what's behind them, 1922 and these last miserable years. That's why it's going to be impossible to bulldoze them for very long this time." All of this emotional pressure has gone into the demand for the union. But the President and General Johnson will be taking care of that now. So, grumbling, many go back, saying, "Wait, we'll see" to their upwelling indignation. And others, unable to put the lid on quite so readily, pick on the smaller grievances to let off steam. For after all, if you're taking the government's word and are willing to wait for union recognition, you should also take the government's word and be willing to wait for scales. The trouble is, of course, that the men are in no mood to do any waiting at all.

Picket Line

Everyone I have spoken to, with very few exceptions, has admitted that there was nothing particularly cogent in Mr. McGrady's argument, that there was nothing, in fact, in it which when their leaders presented it they hadn't rejected. Why have the men gone back? It was a playing on the mob and a mob response. Corner them individually and all you will get out of them is that there's no use staying out when everybody's going back. Get them together and stick a rah-rah boy from Washington on a box and you can almost get them to agree to Joe Grundy on the arbitration board. I attended a meeting at Colonial No. 4 after the return to work at most mines. Here, too, they had gone back, but Martin Ryan, their leader and elected checkweighman, had not been accepted by the superintendent of the H. C. Frick Company. So they had walked right out again. But three very important gentlemen, rushed down here by Pinchot, had only to pout and the few nays could hardly be heard for the ayes to go back. Were the men going to show Roosevelt that they were as hard to deal with as the companies? That was exactly what the companies wanted him to believe. Striking is good for the companies. Striking is terribly bad for you miners. Just give the Administration a chance.

Pickers Looking for Scabs

The men are giving Roosevelt a chance. That is what lies back of what seems to be their easy credulity. But only a chance, is what I hear everywhere. "We come right out again if code no good. This time when we come out we stay out." The operators are proving recalcitrant in Washington. The men are following the news closely, edition by edition. They are giving Roosevelt a chance because they want to make sure of all possibilities. It is a mistake to think of them as simple men, the easy prey of demagoguery. Men around here who have been accustomed to think of them as dumb hunkies are changing their minds. The big hurrah is to be understood in its time setting. The men had that one hurrah left in their systems. As soon as the immediate intoxication was over, and with many while it was on, critical reservations found expression. Why were two big capitalists like Swope and Kirstein put on the arbitration board? Why should it be necessary to read between the lines when what they want can very well be written in the lines?

The atmosphere is still grim and tense. Official eyes are open for agitators. The National Guardsmen patrol the streets and roads against pickets from mines yet closed. H. C. Frick has again shown its hand in engineering the arrest of Martin Ryan who up to the last minute insisted that the strike continue. The men are waiting for the code, but the discrepancy between the spoken and the written word of the steel operators has taught them cynicism. A new walk-out may occur on almost any provocation. It is sure to follow the adoption of the kind of code which now seems likely.

State Troopers on Guard

Mary Van Kleeck has charged the Administration with being anti-strike. Not the strike but the conference table is to be labor's instrument. Labor, of course, may not see the point right away. It may have to be shown. The rod has never quite lost its place in pedagogy.

Exit Machado

By HUBERT HERRING

Havana, August 11

THERE are lines of men and women on the roofs of the houses along the Malecon. With opera glasses, field glasses, hour after hour they watch the horizon. They are waiting for the gunboats, for the marines who are surely coming from Washington, from the land which forced the Platt Amendment upon the Cuban people, with its solemn pledge that Cuba shall have a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty. . . . A boat appears and a cry goes up. It is only a freighter. All day long, all week, this has kept up. One question is passed from mouth to mouth: When will the gunboats come?

"Tell me something, anything, now," says the wife of an A. B. C. leader who is in hiding. Her face is white, there is terror in her eyes. "Tell me something that will help me to wait through the night. When are the Americans coming?"

Two impressions Cuba makes on me this week—of ineffable dignity and of utter terror. The dignity of Cuba is revealed in the general strike which has been gathering momentum each day for a week. The economic life of Havana and all Cuba is at a standstill. Nominally it is a strike of the bus operators, who refused longer to tolerate the exactions of Machado's straw-boss mayor, José Izquierdo. Actually all of their demands were granted last week, but the strike goes on. No railroads, no automobiles (except the private cars of the intrepid), no street cars, no newspapers, no mails, no telegraph. All shops are closed, save a few drug stores and an occasional bodega where a policeman has kicked open the door and forced the shopkeeper to do business at the point of a gun. Restaurants and hotels serve no meals—with a few solitary and clandestine exceptions. There is no ice, garbage is not collected, even the physicians are on strike. Food supplies are rapidly being exhausted, but the people are quiet. There is elation in the air. The people in their doorways wear a new dignity, for Cuba has asserted itself, Cuba has recovered her soul. The Cuban general strike is a national strike against the intolerable Machado, nothing more nor less, and in the unanimity and faithfulness of the strike Cuba has found new dignity.

Terror walks the streets. Monday afternoon at five, a voice was heard over the radio, "The monster has resigned. Get out into the streets and shout." It was a government agent pretending to speak for the A. B. C. The crowds streamed out, up the Prado, through the Central Park, out before the Capitol, four or five thousand, all shouting under the release of the news. They were met by the police and the Porra. Machine-gun fire was turned upon the crowds. They ran down the side streets. I saw some hundreds turn down past the National Palace headed for the American Embassy. At the palace more soldiers opened fire. I saw this with my own eyes. It was sheer wanton unprovoked murder. At least twenty were killed and a hundred wounded. These are conservative figures. Double them and they may still be within the truth.

For a week the terror has continued. The streets are practically deserted. Each morning one hears of new murders. The deposed but undaunted chief of police Aincart, drunk most of the time, ranges about in an armed car. The Porra adds daily to its toll. The murders are not political. The dead are the common people of the streets, the bystanders, shopkeepers, women who were standing in doorways, children.

Two men occupy the spotlight. General Gerardo Machado y Morales hides on his farm outside the city, heavily guarded. He is a mad man tracked to his last refuge. Angrily he lashes out against the politicians who show signs of abandoning him, and against the American Ambassador. Through the actions of the police and the Porra he is having his last mad vengeance on his opponents. Over the radio he pronounces a panegyric on Cuba's threatened sovereignty, and makes himself the symbol of Cuba's hopes. Chief target for his scorn is the Ambassador.

In the American Embassy, unguarded save by two Cuban police, Sumner Welles is working day and night. Welles has a tenacious faith in the power of conciliation. "There have been no ultimata," he repeats again and again. He has not lost his temper in the face of the president's abuse and double dealing. He has consulted and conferred. The party leaders have come to him as a friendly arbiter. He has refused to give up faith in the possibility of a just and generous solution. At the same time, he has been readily accessible to every appeal for help. At all hours of the day and night he has been called up to intercede for some one whose life was threatened.

The terror of today is Machado's answer to Sumner Welles. Mr. Welles reached Cuba something over three months ago. The situation was desperate. But the new Ambassador did not come with a big stick; he came rather in the role of a mediator. The President of Cuba was given his chance to save his face, to retire gracefully and safely, and to save Cuba from further agony. His mediatorial services were accepted by all sectors of the opposition, save the students and the Menocalistas: they were accepted by the government parties. Machado seemed honest in his willingness to cooperate. A plan was evolved which respected Cuba's sovereignty, which provided a calm adjustment of all issues, which made way for participation by all sectors, and which promised to Machado and his associates a reasonably dignified exit from the stage upon which they had performed so badly. During two months this plan has been developed. Representatives of the various sectors have drafted the constitutional reforms. These were to have gone to Congress this week. Had it not been for the events of this week, the work of mediation would have proceeded without break, the necessary constitutional changes would have been voted, the constituent assembly would have met, a vice-president would have been elected, and by February Machado could have retired to more friendly shores, while the torn fabric of Cuban politics was slowly mended.

The sober counsels of Mr. Welles are for the moment defeated. It is a tragedy, and the responsibility rests squarely upon Machado. Machado has blocked and double-crossed the mediation at every turn. He announced to Congress that the Ambassador was acting on his own initiative, that he did not represent Washington. He boasted that he could rid Cuba of the Ambassador within five days if he so chose. He has deliberately encouraged violence in order to discredit the opposition forces. To the credit of the A. B. C. it should be added that they have refused to be stampeded and have loyally worked for a pacific solution. Machado pledged safety for the returned exiles, but has allowed the Porra to hound them and molest them. Four of the outstanding leaders of the A. B. C. are today in hiding.

Machado is responsible for the strike. He has kept the men in power who provoked the disputes. Machado has broken faith, and the sufferings of the Island are to be assessed against him. He was given his last chance to regain the reputation which he once held of a patriot who honored his country above himself. The last chapter is his final act of treason.

As these words are written, it is impossible to say what the next twenty-four hours will bring. Anarchy is imminent. The food shortage is serious. A solution must be quickly reached. Acting on this conviction, Mr. Welles went into conference with the leaders of the three major parties—the popular, the conservative, and the liberal. With the practically unanimous backing of the first two, and substantial backing from the third, he proposed a plan for the breaking of the deadlock. According to the terms of this plan the mediation will proceed upon the agreement that half of the House and all of the Senate retire next year, allowing almost a clean sweep for a new political deal. Needless to say, the plan provides for the stepping down of Machado.

Machado's going has its sobering aspect. Not that there is reason to regret the inglorious end of a man who has made a shambles of an island where nature ordained so much of loveliness. Not that. But after all what business have we to tell the president of a sovereign neighbor to get out? We are helping Cuba clean house, because the mess is partly of our making. Machado's presidency was made in American counting houses. He was kept in power by the willingness of the Chase bank to pay his bad debts. We Americans must confess our share of responsibility for the bitter years of Machado's tyranny. But that is not enough. Having lent a hand in ousting Machado, we cannot rest nor cry all's well until we have lent Cuba a hand in clipping the wings of those American financial interests which have created an effective slave state in a Cuba which seeks to be free. That is next week's task. Sufficient unto this week is the satisfaction that mad Machado is going.

The Drive for Spoils

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, August 11

IT is a little more than five months since the Democratic Party came into power. At that time the stage was set for a spoils carnival of unprecedented proportions. The Democrats had been out of office since 1921. They saw before them an opportunity to take care of those who had faithfully supported them through the twelve lean years, and they looked upon the vast federal patronage as material with which to create a national machine that would go a long way toward keeping them in office. Under the authority of a resolution sponsored by Senator McKellar of Tennessee, the Civil Service Commission undertook a "federal patronage census." It found that no fewer than 81,000 jobs were at the disposal of the President. Only once before in recent years had a similar census been made. That was in the first Wilson Administration, but then only a few copies were printed and these were privately distributed to Senators. On the other hand, thousands of copies of the McKellar census were printed and broadcast through the country. They were hawked about the streets of Washington at ten to twenty-five cents a copy.

Even 81,000 jobs were not enough for the Democrats. At the recent special session they added another 35,000 to 40,000 by exempting from the civil-service requirements all positions created under the Roosevelt emergency program. There were many protests against this raw exhibition of spoils politics, especially from the federal employees' unions and the National Civil Service Reform League. The latter warned that this policy would lead "to greater waste, corruption, and extravagance." But the Democrats paid no heed. Not only were they under obligations to regular party workers who were hungry for office, not only was each Democratic Senator and Representative anxious to strengthen himself politically, but the party as a whole was under unbelievable pressure to find jobs for Democratic voters because of the nationwide unemployment situation. Since November Washington had been overrun with unemployed men and women who had voted for Roosevelt. Some were taken care of on March 4 by appointment to minor positions, but there were not nearly enough such jobs to go around, and these unemployed Democrats continued to haunt, and have since been haunting, the corridors of the Senate and House office buildings and the several department buildings. Other tens of thousands, lacking the fare to Washington, have been sending their appeals for jobs by mail and telegraph.

Postmaster-General Farley, as chief patronage dispenser for the Administration, has been bearing the brunt of the drive for spoils, a task he clearly enjoys. He has been disarmingly frank in his attitude. In a recent magazine article he declared that he was interested mainly in fortifying the President's political position. He said Republicans would be retained only in those jobs for which no qualified Democrats were available, and that among the qualified Democrats preference would be given to those who had supported Roosevelt before the Chicago convention. He paid his compliments to the merit system by adding that "loyalty is an aspect of merit. One of my chief duties is to pass on the loyalty of the applicants. Politics, the editorial writers hint, enters into my consideration. Of course it does."

The Farley program has alarmed many good people, and surely not without justification. There have been whisperers that the Postmaster-General is overreaching himself and will wreck the party. In other quarters it is charged that the spoils campaign has already doomed the Roosevelt recovery experiment. Too many party hacks, it is said, have been put in charge of vital sections of the recovery program. There can be no denying that there is some truth in these charges. The drive for spoils has been terrific, relentless. A number of incompetents and other persons of questionable integrity have been worked into key positions in the government. It is true, moreover, that many Democrats, particularly those from the Southern States, would like to make political pie out of the whole government from top to bottom. They have certainly been working frantically to realize that end, using every kind of political coercion at their command. And in this they have been going to ridiculous lengths. Their demand that they be given the eight hundred jobs in the Library of Congress, which has always been kept out of spoils politics, offers a case in point.

Yet without in the least apologizing for the Democrats, one must, for the sake of accuracy, point out that the spoilsmen have not had anything like the success the rumor-mongers credit them with. One need only look back to 1921 to obtain a fair comparison. In that year the Ohio Gang took Washington by storm. There was hardly a single government department or bureau that did not fall prey to Daugherty and his henchmen. If any set of spoilsmen ever came close to wrecking the government, it was this plunderbund that invaded Washington after the election of Warren Harding. On the other hand, Farley and his lieutenants, ambitious though they certainly are, have been effectively blocked in all but a handful of government offices by two nominal Republicans, Secretaries Ickes and Wallace. It is possible, of course, as the pressure of the spoilsmen has not relaxed for a moment, that the Ickes-Wallace opposition may yet break down. If that happens, we shall most likely see a repetition of the follies of 1921, and perhaps on a more extravagant scale, for the political jobs and other spoils available today are more numerous and attractive than twelve years ago.

I have no desire to minimize the gains the spoilsmen have scored to date. They have found the situation much to their taste in such branches of the government as the Department of Justice, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The Department of Justice under Attorney General Cummings will certainly bear watching. The solicitor-generalship, after having been offered to Felix Frankfurter, was given to J. Crawford Biggs, who was one of A. Mitchell Palmer's lieutenants and whose name was associated with the oil scandals when it was brought up for confirmation in the Senate at the recent special session. Pat Malloy, a party worker for whom Farley felt a place had to be found and who had nothing else to recommend him, has been appointed Assistant Attorney General. At least one other Cabinet member refused to accept him. J. Edgar Hoover, formerly chief investigator for the department, has been named chief of the newly formed division of investigations. Hoover was originally appointed under Palmer, but found no difficulty in working for Harry Daugherty and his successors. His office was instrumental in preparing the charges, later proved false, against Senator Wheeler of Montana because of the part Wheeler played in exposing the scandals of the Harding Administration.

Cummings himself is an unaggressive and politically minded office-holder.

Jesse Jones, former Democratic national treasurer, is chairman of the R.F.C., which has made room for a number of the party faithful. Among them is Clem Shaver, former Democratic national chairman, for whom a minor post was especially created. Most forward of the lot, however, is William F. Stevenson, chairman of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, who has surrounded himself with political friends from South Carolina. He was asked at a press conference whether appointments in his organization would be based on the merit system. His confused reply suggested that he had never heard of anyone being appointed to a political job because of his individual competence or merit. Later he explained: "Naturally we are not choosing Republicans to carry out the policies of a Democratic Administration." Stevenson has 8,000 to 10,000 jobs at his disposal, or almost one-fourth of those created under the emergency program. I am betraying no secrets, however, when I report that the Administration is showing no little anxiety over the carefree manner in which Stevenson is handing out jobs.

Farley has, of course, tried many ways of keeping his finger on all appointments. He has placed personal representatives in several departments and bureaus. His agent in the Department of Justice is William Stanley, while Emil Hurja represents him in the offices of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and Julien N. Friant in the Department of Agriculture. These men report all prospective appointments to the Postmaster-General. If the men proposed have been good Democrats in the past, meaning primarily good Roosevelt Democrats prior to June, 1932, Farley indorses the appointees. Otherwise he says no—as firmly as possible. His disapproval carries weight with the R.F.C. and the Department of Justice, for example, but not always with other departments or emergency services. In the early months of the Administration the patronage-dealers were confident that they had the Department of Commerce in their grasp, but this, too, seems now to have slipped from them. Senator McAdoo of California had apparently marked out the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce as his special province. H. Russell Amory of California, a McAdoo man, was temporarily put in charge of this office. The bureau was to be reorganized, which meant that a lot of new help would be brought in. With Amory in charge, most of the new officials would very likely have been members of the personal machine McAdoo has been getting together. But before the reorganization took place Amory was removed and Willard L. Thorp, professor of economics at Amherst, was named chief of the bureau. It is understood that he took the job on the condition that his subordinates would be selected on a basis of merit.

Farley was blocked at the outset by the President's policy of holding up appointments until his legislative program had been safely guided through Congress. It was no mean chore for the Postmaster-General to stand off the horde of Democratic Congressmen clamoring for jobs for their constituents, especially when he himself so clearly perceived the necessity of getting as many deserving Democrats into the Administration as quickly as possible. Then the President went away on vacation and once more Farley had to stem the rising discontent among the Democrats. He promised that the delay would be ended as soon as the President returned to town. But in the meantime he began to encounter unexpectedly stiff opposition in the Cabinet.

Secretaries Ickes and Wallace, ably supported by other officials such as Secretary Perkins, Recovery Administrator Johnson, and Relief Administrator Hopkins, refused to bow before the onslaught of the spoilsmen. They accepted a few political appointees, but these appointees, with one or two exceptions, they managed to shift to inconsequential positions where they could do little or no harm. Secretary Wallace even went to the extent of allowing a Farley agent to sit in his office. However, the arrangement he has worked out with this agent is such that he gets the experts he wants upon the single condition that they are Roosevelt supporters. On the other hand, Secretary Ickes did not take kindly to the idea of having a Farley representative anywhere near him. When the man reported for work, Ickes found him a desk far down the corridor, in the office of Louis R. Glavis, chief investigator for the Department of the Interior. He left after a few days, having found the environment just a bit too cold. The spoilsmen seem to have gained a temporary foothold in one of the minor divisions of the National Recovery Administration. Thirty-three clerks were furloughed and told not to report back for work until they had provided themselves with adequate political indorsements. That situation has since been cleared up, partly through the President's order requiring all posts in the emergency services, except those of an executive nature, to be filled from the list of civil-service employees recently dismissed from other departments on the ground of economy.

I mention the few incidents given in the preceding paragraph because they are exceptions rather than the rule. Despite the presence of the Farley agent, Wallace has managed to bring in a number of good men to whom the Democratic Party owes nothing whatever. Among them is Jerome Frank, solicitor for the Department of Agriculture. Moreover, he did not wait upon the White House, but took the initiative in issuing a departmental order requiring all clerical and routine jobs in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to be filled from the civil-service lists. This has saved his department and the agricultural administration from being loaded down with precinct captains and ward heelers. Policy matters and executive decisions in the Interior Department and Public Works Administration are in the hands of men of Secretary Ickes's own choosing. Ickes and his trusted subordinates also keep a careful watch on the routine workers in the department. The same is true of the Department of Labor, the National Recovery Administration, the Relief Administration, and a majority of the other offices. While the heads of these departments have accepted a few political appointees, they have done so for strategic reasons. Their apparent willingness to compromise where unimportant posts were concerned has enabled them to insist upon naming their own people to the jobs they consider important. For example, the Commissionership of Labor Statistics is looked upon as a fat plum—it normally draws a salary of $8,500—and any number of party hacks were angling for it. But Miss Perkins said that she wanted an expert and that her candidate was Dr. Isador Lubin of the Brookings Institution. Dr. Lubin got the job. Farley had to give in here as he has had to give in upon every occasion when a member of the Ickes-Wallace-Perkins group has shown any inclination to oppose his demands.

The richest political pie in the entire government is safely in the hands of Secretary Ickes. Not only has he the normal complement of Interior Department jobs in his charge, to which have been added many others through his appointment as "oil dictator" and Public Works Administrator, but in the latter capacity he has $3,300,000,000 of the taxpayers' money to spend. This is more than the Roosevelt Administration contemplates spending on all other government activities, including salaries, during the current fiscal year. Great was the consternation of the political contractors, as Paul Y. Anderson recently suggested in these columns, when Ickes was named to administer the fund. This was undoubtedly the most severe defeat the political spoilsmen have suffered to date.

Only a few patronage jobs are available in the military and diplomatic branches, and these, of course, have been filled with politicians for political reasons. One need only name Secretary Swanson in the Navy Department, Secretary Dern and Assistant Secretary Woodring in the War Department, and Assistant Secretary Payer in the State Department, and the dozen or so campaign contributors who have been given ambassadorships or ministerial posts abroad. The colonial service, too, is rather limited, but there the spoilsmen have also gotten in several good licks. Puerto Rico especially has suffered. First, Robert Hayes Gore was named governor of the territory, and on top of this the insular school system was turned over to the spoils-hunters. Competent native educators working patiently over a period of years were succeeding in developing a modern school system. The system has been entirely in native hands and has been kept out of politics whether insular or national. Now Farley proposes to undo this work by his designation of the Democratic national committeewoman of the island to be Commissioner of Education for no valid reason except that she supported Roosevelt at the Chicago convention.

One might also condemn the Democrats for attempting to have 4,600 government employees removed from the civil-service rolls in order to make room for deserving party workers. None of these clerks, however, was selected by competitive test. Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover "covered" them with civil-service rating by executive order. Just before he left office, for example, Herbert Hoover placed in the civil service, incumbents and all, about 150 positions in the Department of Justice then held by political appointees who had been trained by the Ohio Gang. I doubt very much that the substitution of Democratic Party workers for the Republican "merit men" in the Departments of Justice and Commerce or in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would appreciably affect the efficiency of those branches of the government.

Still to be considered are the thousands of minor posts spread over the country, the postmasterships, revenue collectors' jobs, and district attorneyships. These also must be considered spoils. Indeed, they make up the bulk of the appointive positions at the disposal of the President. And they are being filled with Democrats today just as they were filled with Republicans in 1921 and with other Democrats in 1913. One may argue with complete justice that all of these jobs should be placed under civil service for the sake of more honest and efficient government. But in taking that position one must frankly indict the party system and not merely the Democratic organization.

The Utility Crisis in New York

By JEROME COUNT

THE universal demand of 25,000,000 electric consumers for relief from excessive rates lends special significance to the widely advertised proceedings now pending before the New York Public Service Commission. Technically initiated by the commission itself, the proceedings resulted from widespread dissatisfaction which that body admittedly could no longer ignore. After an impressive display of gubernatorial conferences and a wholesale summons to all gas and electric companies in the State, rate hearings began again in May, 1933. The case was concluded three months later, after volumes of testimony and scores of exhibits had been recorded, and an expectant public now awaits the commission's decision. A collapse of this nationally publicized attempt to lower rates under most favorable conditions, it is believed, may finally place the seal of failure upon the commission form of regulation.

"After careful consideration, the commission has determined to establish temporary emergency rates wherever the facts relating to a company as set forth in the sworn reports to the commission seem to justify action. It is not contemplated in the establishment of such rates that a valuation of the property as required by the courts for a final determination will be made," said Chairman Maltbie, reading from a prepared statement, at the opening of the hearings. "My Gawd! That's confiscation!" said a horrified utility official who promptly recognized the desperate measure of a desperate commission.

With utility regulation in wide disrepute, the commission suddenly cast off its judicial robes and became the people's advocate. There was something of the bravado in Chairman Maltbie's manner as he read his opening statement—something of the adventurous young advocate, bravely adopting a new theory against an old grievance, for which his seasoned brethren could find no remedy. Significantly, the most active member of the commission's staff that day was the genial Secretary Tanner, a former newspaper man, whose function it is to supervise press contacts for the commission. The daily press hailed the dramatic move and looked forward hopefully to a new era for the consumer.

Undoubtedly, the commission is bent on relieving itself of responsibility for high rates. From the outset it was evident that new schedules were to be fixed, if only on paper, while the commission's theory is tested in the courts. By then, it is hoped, the storm of criticism may have blown over and the responsibility will seem to rest elsewhere. "There is belief," said Chairman Maltbie in his opening statement, "that the utilities have not borne their fair burden of the depression. . . . The commission intends in its investigation to ascertain to what extent the various companies have been affected by the depression, their dividends curtailed, and surplus earnings used up. We shall consider to what extent utilities may fairly be required through reduced rates to assist in escaping from the present depression, unequalled in the history of this country."

Now, considering the generation of rigid orthodoxy behind it, this was rank heresy, coming from the New York commission. To the companies, it was open revolt. But more to the point, will the "left phrases" result in rate relief or is this the final collapse of a regulatory form that has floundered in a morass of failure? If, as the chairman said in his opening statement, the utilities have not borne their fair burden of the depression, what did the commission do about it for almost four years? One of the most enlightening exhibits, introduced in these hearings by the commission itself, shows the rate of return received by the various electric companies of New York City on their net worth since 1922. Profits of 10 to 20 per cent recur frequently in this tabulation. It is ironic for the commission to expect to divert criticism from itself by informing the exploited consumer at this late date that back in 1925, for instance, the commission allowed the Bronx Gas and Electric Company to receive a profit of 21.3 per cent on the year's operations. Other evidence received by the commission showed dividends running as high as 42 per cent as late as 1932—permitted by the same commission which now triumphantly exposes them.

Still another exhibit, which was submitted by the commission itself, was a chart which, using the year 1929 as an index of 100, compares the cash dividends paid on common stock by five national groups of corporations and by the electric utilities of New York. While railroad dividends sank to a low of 13.6 in September, 1932, the New York electric utilities had risen to a high of 123.4 at the end of the previous quarter. A marked rise of almost 25 per cent took place in 1929 in the dividends paid by the New York electric companies. A constant plateau of dividend payments follows and extends well into 1932. The commission now opens its belated blast of publicity just as the curve has started a downward trend and the companies are able to point to declining profits as a bar to rate reductions.

The consumer who had his electric bill increased in 1930—and more than 50 per cent of New York City consumers are found in this class—charges the commission, on its own evidence, with neglect of duty since 1929. Were he to prove this charge, the consumer would proceed in exactly the manner in which the commission is now indicting the utilities. Another item the consumer would charge against the commission is that the National City Company, in the year 1932, was allowed a profit of $3,000,000 on bond issues at the expense of three major electric companies. This means, of course, that in the end the public pays the bill. The bonds immediately thereafter sold above par in the open market and $47,000,000 was realized by the companies on these bonds. A large part of the proceeds were then paid back to the bank in liquidation of debts held by the bank itself against these companies and their affiliates. This is typical of a score of deals not only permitted but authorized by the commission between companies having interlocking directorates with the National City Company and the National City Bank.

While the bankers found regulation so well suited to their needs, the officers and directors of the utilities did not neglect their own nests. It is not without point to observe that the chief plea for the utilities was made before the commission at the first rate hearing by none other than Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the board of Consolidated Gas. Just the day before, he had been exposed as one of J. P. Morgan's "favored customers." It is easy to infer that the bankers must find the utilities highly cooperative in allowing liberal discounts on their bond sales. Matthew S. Sloan, until last year president of three electric companies, was also named in each of Mr. Morgan's favored lists. Upon Mr. Sloan's resignation, the directors of these companies, representing the banking interests, undoubtedly voted him his $155,000 bonuses with genuine enthusiasm. Since 1928 the electric companies have paid honoraria of more than $700,000 to officials and their families.

The hearings brought to light the fact that officials of the companies under investigation had also increased their pay by $130,000 in 1932 alone and that during the depression official salaries had increased by 17 to 77 per cent. Salaries of $25,000 to $40,000 appear frequently in the list, the high spot being the salary of Frank W. Smith who netted $75,000 by holding three jobs with three different companies. Fourteen officials receive pay from more than one company. Their combined salaries amount to $418,000 per annum. This sort of chicanery has been countenanced by the commission for decades and only now is used as a device to divert public criticism from the commission to the companies alone. The commission was officially informed of the salary increases year after year, beginning in 1927. It did nothing about them and is now making capital of its own neglect.

While bankers, stockholders, and officials fattened on the spoils of this monopoly, rank-and-file employees were rewarded only with wage cuts and loss of jobs. Some 8,000 New York utility employees have been laid off and the companies under investigation have effected wage cuts that will net them approximately $5,000,000 in labor savings during the year. It is known that many employees have received wage cuts as high as 50 per cent through the device of transfer from one department to another. Regulation, as administered by the commission, however, can find no principle under which these matters can be controlled unless the consumers' service has actually broken down by means of such policies. The commission deliberately rules, in effect, that it will not lock the barn until after the horse is out.

Chairman Maltbie, romantic and optimistic though he is, knows utilities. "If they do not see fit to cooperate," he said, as the hearings opened, "the efforts of the commission for temporary relief may be fruitless." There is, in fact, little doubt that any substantial reduction ordered by the Public Service Commission will be taken to the courts by the utilities. At the close of the hearing, counsel for the companies made it clear that the legality of the whole proceeding would be challenged. There is faint hope that the courts will uphold the emergency theory upon which the commission has built its case, although they were ready enough to permit emergency rate increases when prices rose during the World War. It is generally believed, however, that the "My Gawd-that's-confiscation" boys will have the better of the argument in the United States Supreme Court.

The Edison Electric Institute, dominated by the New York utilities, recently threatened that electric companies which are 'victimized' by regulatory bodies would appeal to the courts for redress against rate reductions. This threat has special emphasis for the New York proceedings. The president of the Edison Institute, George B. Cortelyou, is a high official of the New York companies and the pronouncement of one is regarded as the policy of the other. With court proceedings imminent, little comfort can be found in the commission's theory of emergency reduction. To the recent special session of the New York legislature, Governor Lehman recommended an amendment to the public-service law which, it is hoped, may fill up the legal hole in the commission's temporary rate case. Unfortunately, it appears that the consumer will again be blocked and the amendment declared unconstitutional if it is tested in the courts. Under prevailing legal concepts, utilities are entitled to their euphemistic "fair return" at all times, temporary or otherwise.

While economic stress was acute and widespread, the commission sat back and permitted these companies to build up gigantic reserves and surpluses of $300,000,000. They were allowed to increase their stock and bond issues to over a billion dollars and their dividends by tens of millions. Meanwhile the purchasing power of the people declined 50 per cent, commodity prices 40 per cent, and employment 50 per cent. While the great monopoly profited with a free hand, the commission pursued a complacent policy of agreeable negotiations for voluntary reductions. After four critical years the commission takes action just at a time when its neat little charts and exhibits are ruined theoretically when their curves are plotted down to date. When we remember some of the successful claims the utilities have made in past rate cases, it seems probable that they will convince the Supreme Court that the emergency is over and rates should stay up.

Assuming that the courts sustain the commission's emergency theory, it is doubtful that this could be finally determined before the late fall or early winter of this year—incidentally, just after the October electioneering is over. The commission will then find itself left with a faded chimera. The companies will maliciously inquire whether the emergency found in June still exists in December. Their logic will doubtless impress the commission—and the consumer find himself back where he started ten months earlier.

After a generation of the commission form of regulation, the people of New York protest in vain against the insatiable utilities. Shifting theories of utility valuation, intended to locate the elusive rate base, have offered the people only a pathetic mirage. With a Statewide gas, electric and telephone bill of $750,000,000, it is positive effrontery for a commission to boast of $12,000,000 in alleged rate reductions obtained by negotiation. Yet the commission intends this as a crushing reply to all criticism. With the consumer of New York State paying for dividends of these three utilities at the appalling rate of $40,000 an hour—$300,000 per annum in critical depression years—the dismal record of utility "control" may have reached its final chapter. Obviously, the pretense of cajoling the utilities into voluntary reductions has failed completely. Frustration also awaits Maltbie's naive attempt to threaten these seasoned privateers into co-operative rate slashes. New York can then complete the cycle of futility by a return to the hopeless valuation procedure or consider some form of public ownership—the answer to the consumers' prayer.

Whether the consumers' prayer will be answered rests with political gods. The Dunnigan bill, introduced in the last regular session of the legislature of New York, proposed to grant municipalities broad powers for the establishment of publicly owned utilities. It failed to pass the State Senate because of a bi-party utility block. To the recent special session, Governor Lehman recommended several innocuous and futile amendments to the public-service law, but refused to recommend the municipal ownership bill which, in the previous session, failed of passage by only seven votes—six of them Democratic and with three Democratic Senators not voting. The necessary votes to insure public ownership will be found, however, when the consumers' prayer becomes an articulate demand. But it is not to be assumed that the utilities' last card will have been played. When public ownership is made feasible by New York legislators, the utilities will hound, harrass, and intimidate every public official or municipality attempting to benefit by the enabling legislation. These tactics are familiar to every town and city throughout the nation which has attempted public operation of utilities. Millions of dollars will be lavished on campaigns to defeat bond-issue referenda required to finance public-ownership projects. Vast utility funds will be placed at the disposal of candidates who oppose public ownership in election campaigns. A municipality lucky enough to run this gauntlet safely will then find itself deluged with so-called taxpayers' suits to enjoin the sale of bonds and later to prevent the letting of contracts to construct utility plants. Finally, suit will be brought to restrain the performance of the contracts after they are let out. At just about this point the disheartened consumer, having declared that "you can't fight a billion dollars," will find his electric bill reduced some 20 per cent by the threat of municipal competition against private utilities.

Confess, Chairman Maltbie. Commission regulation has failed!

[This is the ninth of a series of articles on electric power and the consumer. The tenth will appear soon.]

The Educator and the Depression

II. The College Instructor

By WILLIAM BURL THOMAS

UNTIL a little more than a year ago the tenure of a position on the faculty of an American university was, generally speaking, indefinite. Although many institutions offered no contract to the lower ranking members of their staffs, and a man might be dismissed for too conspicuously radical utterances or "conduct prejudicial to the interests of the university," a teacher who rendered satisfactory service felt his place secure, and even though his rank were no higher than that of instructor he might, in the absence of definite understanding to the contrary, reasonably expect reappointment. Likewise he had reasonable expectancy of promotion or of bettering his situation by securing a higher ranking or a better paid position elsewhere. But within the last year and a half the economic crisis has blighted any such prospect completely. In 1932 the depression caught up with the universities, and they will be suffering from the depression long after business has attained what the swivel-chair economists call recovery.

The tax-supported institutions of the Mid-West, West, and South were the first to feel the effects of adversity, and although most of the Eastern schools managed to maintain their status unaffected or with comparatively little retrenchment until this year, now they are suffering quite as badly. Early in the winter of 1932 portents were to be observed in many legislatures, and subsequently most of the important State universities suffered reductions in appropriations for 1932-33—although a year ago the general calamity which was to overtake them this last spring was only vaguely foreseen. The following table gives an idea of what has happened.* Since this table was prepared, it has been announced that Ohio State University and the University of Michigan, both of which disregarded the author's requests for figures on decreased funds and personnel, are taking heavy cuts in their 1933-34 budgets. The appropriation for Ohio State has been cut $652,057, that of Michigan, $896,414. In both cases, the cuts entailed wholesale dismissals.

Institutions	Amount of funds provided for general operation and maintenance			Percentage decrease 1933-34 under 1931-32
	1931-32	1932-33	1933-34
Maine	$757,289	$707,289	$522,466	31.1
New Hampshire	661,443	661,443	447,600	32.3
Maryland	330,000	330,000	198,000	40.0
Rutgers	1,613,660	1,203,384	1,196,685	26.0
Cornell	2,784,140	2,720,661	2,344,141	15.8
Princeton	2,879,755	2,711,042	2,681,937	6.9
Northwestern	4,716,437	4,061,000	3,788,000	19.7
Illinois	4,934,000	4,934,000	3,905,000	20.9
Indiana	1,800,000	1,530,000	1,490,000	17.2
Purdue	1,825,000	1,530,000	1,450,000	20.6
Minnesota	3,275,000	3,275,000	2,800,000	14.6
Kansas	1,410,500	1,299,500	1,038,750	26.4
Oklahoma	1,418,159	1,418,159	1,066,000	24.8
Texas	1,149,025	1,149,025	923,393	19.6
Wyoming	192,500	192,500	90,500	53.0
Utah	514,500	340,000	340,000	33.9
Montana	376,500	328,500	235,500	37.5
Oregon	1,165,335	900,000	775,000	33.5
Washington	1,767,950	1,767,950	1,168,080	33.9
Stanford	2,478,636	2,356,259	2,135,721	15.8
Kentucky	1,344,517	1,052,306	1,000,000	25.6
Tennessee	749,250	700,000	450,000	38.6
Virginia	2,199,957	1,910,686	1,742,947	20.8
North Carolina	721,000	721,000	420,000	41.7
South Carolina	375,000	312,000	200,000	46.7
Mississippi	200,000	120,000	120,000	40.0

*A part of these data are taken from a tabulation prepared by John H. McNeely of the United States Office of Education. The remainder have been collected by the author.

From this sectional grouping it will be seen that the Eastern institutions which suffered not at all last year have since had greater reductions than those of the Mid-Western schools for the two years together. Two of the State universities of the West, while the average of their appropriation cuts is greater than that of the New England schools, have had the reduction apportioned over the two-year period. On the other hand, Wyoming, the only institution in the whole list with a reduction of more than 50 per cent, is taking its entire cut within the 1933-35 biennium. In general, the disaster has fallen most heavily upon the schools of the West and the South. The plight of the University of North Carolina, which has been widely publicized, is exceeded, it will be noticed, by that of her sister institution. It is difficult to see how Mississippi, with $120,000, and Wyoming, with $90,500, can keep going. Virginia, which has had the least reduction in the Southern group, receives only about one-fifth of its money from the State.

A large proportion of the necessary economy in operating expenses inevitably has had to fall upon the salaries of university employees. Be it justly said that many administrations tried earnestly last year to effect the saving wholly or principally in other ways, and several institutions which reduced salaries 6 per cent or more did so on a graduated scale; but some made a flat cut, which naturally affected more severely teachers in the lower rank—who likewise were first to be dismissed when dismissal was deemed necessary. Both salary cuts and dismissal were employed at certain schools to maintain an approximate ratio between reduction in salary budget and reduction in funds available: the University of Pittsburgh, a privately controlled institution, made a 9 per cent salary cut and dismissed fifty-five members of its faculty, more than one-eighth of the total number.

The schools here tabulated followed various policies. None of the first three Eastern institutions dismissed staff members; and of these three, only Maine reduced salaries—2½ per cent. South Carolina, which made an 11 to 14 per cent salary cut, kept its staff intact, as did North Carolina, Minnesota, and Kentucky. Tennessee made a flat cut of 8 per cent and dismissed four. Oregon cut salaries 5 to 15 per cent and dismissed seven instructors and six members of higher rank. Illinois began its retrenchment policy early; though its funds available were equivalent to those of the preceding year, twenty-seven of its faculty were not re-appointed. However, where salary reductions were made in 1932 they were generally considered temporary. At the University of Kansas, for example, the 10 per cent flat cut was called a "moratorium" measure, and little was said about the seventeen staff members dismissed.

Now, a year later, all pretense at optimism has vanished. At Kansas salaries for 1933-34 are reduced on a graduated scale 5 to 15 per cent and made "contingent on enrollment." But, though many full-time instructors are relegated to a half-time teaching schedule with an annual remuneration of $665 to $735, the number of dismissals at Kansas is insignificant in comparison to the wholesale discharge of teachers from Ohio State and Michigan only a few weeks ago—an event of delectable irony in coincidence with a national recovery campaign. At Michigan sixty-six staff members (including four full professors) were dismissed and 122 others put on a part-time basis. At Ohio those discharged from the academic staff number 184—fifty-seven of the rank of instructor and above and 127 fellows and assistants. Seventy-three were put on part time.

In Michigan also the salaries of all State employees depend upon the amount of money in the treasury next spring. And the faculty of the University of Iowa and the State College at Ames are wondering not how much of a salary cut they will have to take but whether they will get any salary at all next year. Yet the larger schools in general are not so badly off as the small colleges; at the North Dakota Agricultural College deans and department heads will get $1,920 a year and the president $3,000.

These facts demonstrate the tragedy that has overtaken institutions of learning in America; and they do not take specifically into account the notorious examples of political interference in Mississippi and Oklahoma which has utterly crippled the higher educational systems of those States. The present situation is so chaotic that as yet it is impossible to secure complete information about salary reductions and dismissals generally for 1933-34.* The data so far obtainable are tabulated as follows.

Institutions	Per cent salary cut 1932-33 under 1931-32 scale ¹	Dismissals 1932-33 from staff of preceding year ²	Per cent salary cut 1933-34 under 1931-32 scale ¹	Dismissals 1933-34 from staff of preceding year ²
Colorado	8	10	15	8
Cornell	0	0	10	44
Columbia	0	0	0	—
Illinois	—	27	5-15	—
Indiana	8-12½	—	8-12½	—
Kansas	10	17	15-35	14
Kentucky	10	0	15	0
Maine	2½	0	12½	0
Maryland	0	0	10-15	0
Minnesota	2.08-4.16	0	0-20	0
Mississippi	25-45	—	25-45	—
Montana	5-6	—	20-22	—
Nevada	0	0	0-35	0
New Hampshire	0	0	0-10	0
Northwestern	10	31	19	19
Oklahoma	0-7½	—	5-20	—
Oregon	5-15	19	5-30	36
Princeton	0	0	0	0
Rutgers	4-18	—	7-20	47
Stanford	0	0	10	0
Texas	0	0	25	0
Utah	10	1	9-19	7
Virginia	10-12½	0	15-20	1
Washington	0	0	10-46	0
Wyoming	0	15	12-37	20

*By a graduated scale the maximum percentage is applied to none but the highest salaries and usually only to the fifth or sixth thousand dollars and beyond. Therefore the actual reduction would in no case be as great as the maximum percentage shown. A minimum of zero means that the lowest salaries ($1,500 or $1,200 and under) are exempt from reduction.

²These figures, particularly the higher ones, are difficult of interpretation. In general, they include part-time assistants. But in some instances it is likely that the figure is simply the number of faculty less than that of the preceding year, and thus would include assistants whose appointments have expired upon their receiving degrees and whose places have simply been left unfilled. Another means of curtailment is the reduction in teaching load of full-time instructors to a three-quarter or a half-time schedule, which is not indicated at all.

*The author requested pertinent facts from 46 institutions. Iowa, Missouri, Wisconsin, and Chicago either were unable or declined to give the information. Yale, Harvard, Pennsylvania, Ohio State, Nebraska, California, and others did not reply.

In a table such as the foregoing it is not possible to show the rank of staff members dismissed; but by far the greater number of those who have lost their jobs are instructors and part-time assistants—although a startling number of assistant and associate professors have been discharged from institutions which had expanded unwisely and unduly and whose administrations have seized upon the most obvious means of effecting economy. A large proportion of the academic unemployed are Ph.D.'s who have not attained professorial rank or graduate assistants whose employment was terminated with their receiving the degree. And distinctly a problem in itself is the plight of the hundreds of Ph. D.'s who have spent time and money to prepare for teaching and, never having had the opportunity to teach, now find themselves just so much excess baggage in the pedagogical caravan. Approximately 2,000 doctors, it is estimated, were graduated in 1932. If graduate enrollment is a trustworthy index, the number awarded the degree during the spring and summer of this year will be only slightly lower.

In nearly every case the people most severely affected by the retrenchment are those least able to stand it. A professor can readjust his scale of living to 80 per cent of his former salary much more easily than an instructor can get along on the absolute minimum or without any salary at all. But the University of Nebraska last year, reversing the usual scale of gradation, gave its staff members above the rank of instructor a 7 to 8 per cent cut, while it reduced instructors' salaries 14 per cent—and dismissed fifteen. To show conclusively how those in the higher ranks have remained relatively secure at the expense of the "small fry" I quote from the report on "The Economic Condition of the Profession" in 1932 to the American Association of University Professors of Committee Z: ". . . ■ shrinkage of 191 places out of a possible shrinkage of 211 in the thirty-eight institutions reporting to your Committee occurred in the grades of instructor or part-time assistant. Indeed, among professors and associate professors there was no decrease at all, but an increase of two and a half places."

A policy in striking contrast to the "share-the-work" principle so much touted in industry! But it appears likely that with one more spring there will no longer be assistants or instructors left anywhere; and then the professorial nobility will be next to the guillotine. Certainly the brain trust dispensing the New Deal is not distributing any straight flushes to its academic colleagues. From the most conservative outlook it is only sane to say that amid all the present ballyhoo about "recovery" there is absolutely no reason or justification for optimism among the teaching profession. On the contrary, the gravity of the situation cannot be overemphasized or overestimated.

The Universities of Maine, New Hampshire, Maryland, Kentucky, and Washington are conspicuous among institutions which have greatly reduced appropriations and yet have not made inordinate dismissals. But their expedient is in exception to the policy generally prevailing. So college administrations, instead of declaring an emergency salary scale and keeping their staffs intact, continue in the name of economy to destroy what has been laboriously achieved by a generation of educators during many years.

[This is the third of a series of articles on the effects of the economic crisis and the professions. The Lawyer and the Depression by James Gifford will appear next week.

In the Driftway

WHEN Arnold Bennett was twenty-nine years old he confided to his diary that he was seriously behind with his reading. Since the age of twenty he had been devoted to books, and he felt that, except for the current literature which he had been compelled to review, he had confined himself almost exclusively to the best books. Yet he was appalled to realize how many of the works which "everybody has read" were still unknown to him.

I cannot recall ■ single author of whom I have read everything—even Jane Austen. . . . Then there are large tracts of Shakespeare, Bacon, Spenser, nearly all of Chaucer, Congreve, Dryden, Pope, Swift, Sterne, Johnson, Scott, Coleridge, Shelley, Byron, Edgeworth, Ferrier, Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Wordsworth (nearly all), Tennyson, Swinburne, the Brontës, George Eliot, W. Morris, George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, Savage Landor, Thackeray, Carlyle—in fact, every classical author and most good modern authors, which I have never even overlooked. A list of the masterpieces I have not read would fill ■ volume.

He tried to reassure himself with a little calculation which proved that only ■ very old man who had read steadily for sixteen hours ■ day since infancy could possibly have read even approximately all "that the person of average culture is supposed to have read, and that not to have read is a social sin." But he was obviously not satisfied, and was a little ashamed of himself. The truth of the matter is, of course, that few scholars know as much as Macaulay's impossibly erudite schoolboy, and it might have comforted Bennett to know that Matthew Arnold's criticism of Spenser contains irrefutable evidence that Arnold had not himself read "The Faery Queen."

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

BENNETT'S confession emboldens the Drifter to make ■ suggestion which he has long had in mind, namely, that during the next year literary editors be forbidden by one of Mr. Roosevelt's new commissions to publish any more lists of the hundred best books, or the ten volumes recommended for a desert island, and that they be encouraged instead to draw up lists of the world-famous and indispensable books which they have managed somehow to dispense with. Such lists would be instructive and startling, but they would be shocking only to those who refused to consider how easy it would be for them to compile an even more dreadful one. We think also that it would be a good plan for each person making the confession to distinguish with a star those books which he not only has never read but has resolved never to read. Books which have been praised too much or by the wrong people go into a class by themselves. One would resist them on a desert island and, in solitary confinement, one would rather watch spiders than turn their pages.

■ ■ ■ ■ ■

JUST to start the ball rolling the Drifter appends a list which he finds it difficult to confine to merely ten titles:

Plato, "The Symposium."

Dante, "The Paradiso."

Anonymous, "The Song of Roland."

Bacon, "The Novum Organum."
 Scott, "Ivanhoe."
 Cooper, "The Last of the Mohicans."
 Eliot, "The Mill on the Floss."
 Hardy, "Jude the Obscure."
 Wells, "The New Machiavelli."
 Buck, "The Good Earth."

Though short and inadequate, this list is, the Drifter thinks, varied and representative. If he were to extend it as he easily could, it would do very well as the "required reading" for a college course, and if he decided to expand it still further it might be made the basis of a decent public library. Even as it stands, it proves that he is ignorant of many things which every schoolboy knows and unfamiliar with at least ten books which every person of average culture has read. Indeed, the Drifter is beginning to be a little sorry he brought the subject up.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Cry from China

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The International Labor Defense has received the following among several letters from victims of the Kuomintang reaction now held in Chinese jails. We ask you to print this letter in the hope that your readers will protest against this inhuman treatment. New arrests are constantly being made and new murders committed. We have just received word that Yang Chen, an eminent scientist, founder of the Academia Sinica and general secretary of the China League of Civil Rights, was assassinated by the Kuomintang murder squad June 18. Madame Sun Yat Sen, founder of the league, is under constant threat of assassination.

This letter of blood and tears suddenly meeting your eyes may shock you a good deal. We entreat your patient attention; hear us, then expose our sufferings to the world, and seek human help on our behalf. You cannot possibly view our sufferings as unimportant. You cannot carelessly throw our plea into the wastepaper basket. Deprived of our liberty, we have been thrown into the so-called Second Model Prison of Kiangsu of Tsaochoching, and here we have found the depths of a very earthly hell. Half-men, half-ghosts, we sit here drinking our tears. The cavities of still deeper hells yawn before us, and without life we enter them, one after the other.

There is no such thing as a fixed set of regulations in this prison. Everything depends on the temperament of the jailers. When once prisoners are brought here, they are like victims brought to the guillotine, or fish and pork brought into kitchens. We know only shackles and beatings. We hear only the hoarse shouts of the jailer and the sobs of the sick. It is a common sight to see corpses being carried off. We look on enviously.

Cells about ten feet by nine, less than a hundred square feet, often hold as many as seven prisoners. When the sun shines the stink spreads everywhere. When it rains we are all drenched and everything around us is damp and sodden. We eat rice mixed with fine gravel, or just rice, old and rotten, weighing about sixteen ounces, or 30 per cent less than the required allowance. The only vegetables are some yellow cabbage leaves. Oil and salt are infrequent luxuries. Drinking water is served out three times a day—two little cups to each cell! It is supposed to be boiled. Actually it is only slightly warmed.

All prisoners that come here from the military headquarters, that is, prisoners sentenced by the military courts, virtually all political cases, are immediately shackled upon entry, no matter how long their sentence. If the prisoner happens to have some money he can buy himself out of the shackles. If he has none, he wears them until he dies or until by some chance he goes free. Practically nine-tenths of the prisoners are sick. Most of the prisoners suffer from dysentery, beri-beri, skin ailments, and the various diseases that recur each year. Of course the basic cause of all the disease is the insufficiency and filthiness of the food, the shackles, and the impossibility of bathing. A doctor is hard to get. If an alleged "doctor" does come, he looks around awhile and then gives the same kind of medicine to everybody regardless of the different diseases. The "medicine" is cooked in one big filthy pot and a cup is ladled out to each man. This medicine really does have the same effect, whatever the disease. That is why the death rate here is higher than in any other prison in the world. Physical exercise is allowed only once a month, sometimes only once in three or four months. The time allowed is only ten minutes, and even that is at the pleasure of the jailers. As for baths, we can get them perhaps ten times a year. When bath time does come, the prisoners are lined up and await turns at one small pool of water which remains unchanged all day.

Only a few have enough covering. Even the skimpy cotton robes and blankets handed over by the military for use by the military prisoners are not given to them. Sometimes, to deceive an occasional investigator, clothing and bedding are distributed in the morning and taken away at night. The prison factory is supposed to be a place where we are to develop some handicraft talent so that afterward we might do something for ourselves. Actually, it is a source of income for the prison authorities. Long-term prisoners are generally not allowed to work because the authorities are afraid they might not obey orders and be instead indifferent to any punishment. But short-term prisoners must work hard for more than ten hours daily. Otherwise they are harshly beaten. Their only remuneration is a possible few ounces extra food. If they happen to produce less than the fixed quota, they are either fined by having their food ration cut down, or else are beaten or made to kneel on screws.

When this opportunity to write you passes away, another will not come for a long time. Therefore, we must put down here all we can of the brutality which fills our daily lives. We can only hope to bring it to the notice of people outside. We have lost our freedom but we still have the right to exist. We want to live. We want help from human beings!

S. C. B.

In the name of the 1,700 prisoners of the Second Model Prison of Kiangsu at Tsaochoching Protests against this murder and terror should be sent to Marshal Chiang-Kai Shek at Shanghai, China; to Marshal Chang Hsueh Liang, Peking; and to the Chinese Embassy at Washington.

New York, August 10

LOUIS COLMAN

The Other Way Round

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I had not noticed until recently your article of June 28, entitled Chicago: Two Exhibits by Margaret Marshall. We are very flattered indeed by her comments on the Chrysler Building but may I beg to set right one statement which she makes. The Chrysler Building erected is exactly as the original competitive drawings showed it. When the General Motors found that the Chrysler Building design would attain the height contemplated, they increased the height of their tower.

Chicago, July 25

JOHN W. ROOT

Finance

The Exchange "Reforms"

THE self-righteous program of regulation recently laid down by the New York Stock Exchange has indicated significantly what can be expected in the true public interest when Wall Street lifts up the torch of reform. Announced with all the solemnity of which the exchange is capable and ballyhooed in the press with all the fervor which the exchange commands from advertising-minded publishers, the new program promises little more from the standpoint of fundamental self-correction than a somewhat grandiose whitewashing of the status quo in stock gambling.

As a supposed means of restricting excessive speculation, the new rules requiring a minimum margin of 50 per cent on trading accounts of less than $5,000 and 30 per cent on accounts above $5,000 have received chief attention. The first point to be noted is that these minimum requirements are percentages of the debit balance of accounts rather than of their total market value and thus represent in reality minimum margins of 33 per cent for small traders and of 23 per cent for large traders. It is true that in the wild gambling which went on in the recent inflation bull market, many speculators were trading on thinner margins than these by virtue of the simple art of dangling alluring business under the noses of commission-hungry brokers. But restrictions which still permit speculators to carry stocks with a value of from three to four times their own equity can by no stretch of the imagination be profoundly embarrassing to the gambling fraternity, whether on the inside or outside of Wall Street. Furthermore, a sharp break in the market, such as occurred in July, could easily flood the exchange with forced selling from accounts fully protected by what the exchange has now officially designated as ample margin.

These are among the reforms which the New York Times heralded as the exchange's "most extensive and drastic action in its history to curb speculation in securities."

If any possible dynamite is contained in the exchange's new rules, it lies in the requirement for weekly reports from all members disclosing full information on all pools, syndicates, or option agreements in which they are interested or for which they act as brokers. Here the exchange is approaching the bed-rock of Wall Street's exploitation of the stock-minded public. Even if the doubtful assumption could be made that the exchange is contemplating a serious restriction of the time-honored Wall Street technique of letting the public hold the bag for the large pools, this performance would fall into the old category of closing the barn door after the horse is stolen or, as is the case in this instance, after Wall Street has skimmed the cream from the best bull market since 1929. For during all of the frenzied speculation in May and June, the exchange complacently shut its eyes to pool operations which, for sheer blatancy, rivaled anything from the halcyon pages of the Coolidge and early Hoover regimes.

Nevertheless, these regulations, by penetrating the veil of secrecy which is the prime essential for successful pool operations, give the exchange full power to play havoc with Wall Street's most characteristic come-on game. Richard Whitney, president and chief alibi artist of the exchange, has pronounced that this power will be exercised "whenever such activities . . . may be unsound or likely to create prices which will not fairly reflect market values." Whitney's stubborn refusal, while testifying last year before Congress, to admit the possibility of widespread price manipulation on the exchange, and his defense of "legitimate" pools on the same occasion, are both typical of Wall Street's official attitude on this subject and perhaps indicate how rigidly these new rules will be applied.

The point is too self-evident to require much elaboration. Stock Exchange policies are predominately controlled by the large wire houses. These houses require a heavy volume of business to cover the expenses of their large overhead and their branch offices scattered throughout the country. Pools, both because of their own transactions and because of the large public following which they must entice in order to be successful, are the best sources of large-scale business in stocks, entirely aside from the opportunities for handsome side profits which they offer when brokerage houses themselves participate in the operations.

If the Stock Exchange were to make the confidential information it will now receive on pool manipulations a matter of public record, then a real measure of protection would be available to the public against the secretive and double dealing methods whereby pools build up the public following necessary to let them step out at a profit. But to expect such a step would be to expect the Exchange to relinquish voluntarily a large part of the inflated gambling structure from which much of its profit proceeds.

PETER HELMOOP NOYES

Contributors to This Issue

HUBERT HERRING is the executive director of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America.

DANIEL ALLEN is a student of labor questions and has done special research on conditions in the steel industry.

JEROME COUNT is a member of the New York bar, and counsel for the National Committee on Utilities and Labor.

WILLIAM BURL THOMAS was formerly a member of the Department of English language and literature at the University of Kansas.

WILLIAM GRUEN contributes articles and reviews on the philosophy of science to various periodicals.

ALTER BRODY is the author of a book of folk plays entitled "Lamentations."

VERA MICHELES DEAN is a research associate of the Foreign Policy Association.

ERNEST BOYD is an editor of the American Spectator.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL, a lecturer on the contemporary European scene in the extension department of New York University, is the author of "A World Passed By."

PIERRE LOVING is the author of "Gardener of Evil: A Portrait of Baudelaire and His Times."

A PENT HOUSE

THAT WATCHES THE

SHIPS GO DOWN TO SEA

Five Rooms—Living Room, 17 x 22, has wood-burning fireplace, two 6-foot casement windows on South, one on West—Dining Room overlooks Hudson—Two Bed Rooms (each with Bath)—Unobstructed views three sides.

FOR RENT—$175 MONTHLY

OUR COOPERATIVE HOUSE

CHelsea 3-7631 433 West 21st Street New York City

Books

Sonnet

By MARK VAN DOREN

Chasten your fears, I have not been destroyed,
All that was in me once is living still;
Only I know there was this slendor void,
This threading vein through an unconscious hill.
Empty of you, it nourished every part
With nothingness, and I was none the worse.
Filled with you suddenly, it is the start
Of older riches than I can rehearse—
Joy like a hidden river that no stone
Ever is worn away by where it runs;
Peace in the darkest passages of bone,
And buried light as from a hundred suns;
 With tolerance, that sweetens as it flows
 This blood whose red remembers late the rose.

Salvation Through Charts

Debt and Production. By Bassett Jones. The John Day Company. $2.50.

LONG, long ago, in the early days of the Harding Administration, it was my good fortune to act for a time as a Washington correspondent. In the course of my duties I had a long interview with the then Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Herbert Hoover. The tariff, as I remember, had just been raised, in accordance with those policies of normalcy which were to culminate so brilliantly in the bank closings of March 4, 1933, and I happened to express some concern as to the possible effects of this tariff. Mr. Hoover immediately set my mind at rest. The academic economists, he said, were opposed to the higher tariff, but that was because their reasoning was not merely a priori but of a crude qualitative nature. The engineering mind, on the other hand, respected only the facts, and would not rest until it had made an exact quantitative analysis. Mr. Hoover recited the results of his own quantitative analysis for my benefit. Of all our imports, such-and-such an exact percentage—I think it was more than 50—were entering duty-free; in fact, a larger percentage of our imports were entering duty-free than formerly. Of the rest, the duties had been raised on only such-and-such an exact and insignificant percentage. This was, I believe, the first time that Mr. Hoover had used an argument that he was to use constantly throughout his period of office, even in his last months. At the moment, I was impressed by it. Not until a few days later did it occur to me that it was the very increase in the tariff which increased the relative proportion of non-dutiable goods entering. If the tariff on the dutiable articles had been made absolutely prohibitive, then 100 per cent of our imports would have been entering duty-free. I was still young; but I was beginning to see that even an exact quantitative analysis could be misleading, and that the engineering mind could err.

In the person of Mr. Bassett Jones, F. A. I. E. E., member of the A. S. M. E., research associate in industrial engineering at Columbia University, and installer of the elevators in the Empire State Building, the engineering mind once more enters economics, cocksure as ever, contemptuous of everything so far written in the field, serenely confident that it alone talks Science with a majuscule. "Because no one seemed to be able to tell me how our economy worked," writes Mr. Jones in his Preface, "I decided to find out for myself. I tackled the job in a manner I had used successfully in other fields." He warns us in advance that he will ignore all criticisms "based on philosophical, political, or sociological doctrines" as "beside the metrical, or measurable, facts of our economy"; and he announces proudly that his "entire investigation rests on Planck's dictum as to the nature of reality for science—'only that which is measurable is real.'"

At this point it may be well to halt for a few observations. I am not acquainted with the passage in which Planck makes this statement, and therefore I do not know with what qualifications, if any, it is made. What I do know is that in every case in which I am acquainted with the position of a writer cited or quoted by Mr. Jones, Mr. Jones misunderstands or misrepresents—sometimes grossly—that writer's position—and this applies to his treatment of Adam Smith, Keynes, George Soule, B. M. Anderson, and Aldous Huxley. Guided by the law of probabilities, therefore, I cannot place much confidence in Mr. Jones's interpretation of Planck. But whatever Planck has actually said in this connection, it is obvious that his dictum is true only in a very limited and special sense. If only what is measurable is real, then it is not only absurd to speak as if there were a difference between beauty and ugliness; it is even absurd to mention that one has a toothache.

Proceeding confidently, Mr. Jones throws out all "sociological" and "psychological" factors—though these happen to be an integral part of the material with which economics must deal—and concentrates solely on the physical volume of production. He is interested merely in finding the mathematical formulae and charting the curves which portray the laws of growth of this production;—that, and comparing the rate of growth of this production with the rate of growth in the volume of debt. He believes that he is revolutionary in approaching economics from the side of production instead of from that of consumption; and he obviously believes that he has obtained results of explosive and enormous predictive importance.

The late Alfred Marshall knew at least as much about mathematical methods as Mr. Jones does; and in the early part of his career he used them extensively, but he later confined his mathematics almost entirely to appendices and footnotes. "The chief use of pure mathematics in economic questions," he concluded, "seems to be in helping a person to write down quickly, shortly, and exactly, some of his thoughts for his own use." And in an appendix to his "Principles of Economics" he remarks that the mathematician playing with economic figures usually "takes no technical responsibility for the material, and is often unaware how inadequate the material is to bear the strains of his powerful machinery."

Now this last criticism applies exactly against Mr. Jones. He throws out such concepts as "price" and "value" as meaningless, ghosts from the world of "make-believe." ("I think there is excellent reason," he writes, "for the elimination of the word 'value' from any discussion related to metrical orders.") Physical volume of production is the only respectable thing that an engineer can get his teeth into. But Mr. Jones misses the colossal fact that, for the economist, "physical volume of production" does not in the strictest sense exist at all. Man does not "produce" anything; he merely transforms it. He does not create materials; he merely alters, transports, and shapes them for human use. He creates only utilities, i. e., values. Mr. Jones may, if he likes, add a ton of gravel to a ton of fine watches and call the result merely two tons of "production"; this is apparently, in effect, what he actually thinks he is doing, but the result is meaningless for any purpose.

He frequently cites Frederick C. Mills's figures on physical volume of production. Now it is true that Mills does add together iron, gold, and swine; but he is aware of what he is doing and how he is doing it. Mills tells us (in an appendix to "Economic Tendencies in the United States") that his commodities have been "reduced to relatives on the year 1909 ■ base" and "have been weighted by value of product, for raw materials, and by 'value added,' for manufactured goods, weights being based on 1909 values." But obviously this means that his "physical volume of production" figures must be partly hypothetical and arbitrary; because from year to year the values of the individual commodities must vary in relation to each other, though the commodities will continue to be assigned the same weights. For what does the resulting total represent? It represents ■ total made up, strictly speaking, neither of tons nor of cubic feet, nor of any other measure of weight or volume; it is a total of values. The figures of "physical volume of production" are actually, though arbitrarily, based on those intangible and "indefinable" prices and values that Mr. Jones thinks he has got rid of.

It remains to speak of the relation of production to debt. Mr. Jones holds that over ■ long period production has been showing a declining rate of increase, whereas debt has been showing an increasing rate of increase; and this relationship he holds to be the cause of the present crisis and the crux of the whole economic problem. He seems to forget that if production really were considered solely in physical terms, and not in terms of values, there could be no significant relationship between production and debt at all. A $50 watch weighs no more than a dollar watch, probably less, but ■ $5 loan would be moderate against the first and grossly excessive against the second. But even if we grant that Mr. Jones is right in his calculations regarding the relative growth of production and debt, his results have no necessary predictive value whatever. Debt has no inevitable, necessary, or automatic growth. When it becomes excessive on any one thing, like a railroad or ■ farm, it is defaulted; receivership or foreclosure scales down or wipes out the debt, and management continues under other hands. When debt becomes excessive generally, it is scaled down by inflation—to one-fifth as in post-war France and Italy, to the vanishing point as in Germany. These adjustments, it is true, involve some injustice, but this is not the question that Mr. Jones seems particularly interested in. He is interested only in the lines on his charts, that is, in the land of "make-believe."

HENRY HAZLITT

The Evolution of Light

The Universe of Light. By Sir William Bragg. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

WHEN that versatile eighteenth-century dilettante, Count Francesco Algarotti, wrote his "Theory of Light and Colors Made Familiar to Ladies in Several Entertainments," he was assured of a popular reception. He wrote at a time when experimental science was still new. Scientific discoveries were the proper subject of animated conversation in the salon, and the Abbé Nollet could become the life of the party with a few rudimentary electrical experiments.

If modern readers do not find the same fascination in Sir William Bragg's book it is not because they know more about optical theory than the laymen of the eighteenth century, but because their familiarity with workaday scientific appliances has made them a little contemptuous of science. Our professional scientists have so often reproduced and controlled the wonders of nature that we no longer pause to wonder at nature. Only a very naive or a very sophisticated person would ask why the sky is blue or whether there is any connection between the color of the sky and the color of cigarette smoke.

About such facts and the theories which explain them Professor Bragg has written ■ simple and matter-of-fact book. It is the sober work of ■ man who holds the importance of his subject above question and who therefore feels no need to attract attention by the display of the more spectacular aspects of his science. When Voltaire wrote on the nature of light in his "Elements of Newtonian Philosophy" he voiced the general attitude of his time toward the discoveries of science: "Do we not enrich man by discovering new qualities of the matter of which he is formed?" This conviction infused a certain zest and warmth into Voltaire's exposition which is lacking in Bragg's. But if the latter does not write with the French philosopher's verve, he at least writes with greater authority and happily also with greater clarity.

Bragg centers the development of modern theories of light—from the work of Huyghens and Newton to recent studies in X-ray spectra—around the historical conflict between the wave theory and the corpuscular theory of radiation. By tracing the evolution of the concept of light he indirectly discloses the inventive and instrumental aspects of scientific method. Scientists do not discover the objects of science; they invent them. The characteristics of matter and radiation are to a large extent determined by the kind of problems that led to their conception. And as new problems arise, these concepts are modified to meet new requirements very much as ■ tool may be modified to perform new functions. There is nothing arbitrary or fictitious in such inventions and adaptations of scientific objects, for they are always made to retain their relevance and applicability to measured relations among observable things.

Professor Bragg, however, does not inject such methodological nor any metaphysical interpretations into his work. This is ■ book of science and for that reason it should be especially valuable towards the understanding of the philosophy of science.

WILLIAM GRUEN

A New Note

The Wooden Doctor. By Margiad Evans. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THE impetuous current of this first novel which has swept English reviewers into invoking Charlotte Brontë and Katherine Mansfield is indeed hard to resist. There is a directness of utterance in it which cuts through the artifices of fiction like a cry of pain at a well-bred social gathering. It is a failing of contemporary English women novelists that they write altogether too wisely and too well. They are nearly all gifted with an intellectual and stylistic fluency which is always persuasive, though hardly ever constraining. They have the tongues of angels, but one wishes that they stuttered occasionally; it lends ■ certain conviction. They are all such clever sensitive girls, but one wishes they were not so afraid of making fools of themselves. It is written: Except ye be like unto little children ye cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven. Miss Evans was not afraid of making ■ fool of herself and not afraid of stuttering occasionally, and judging by the results it is a risk well worth taking.

"The Wooden Doctor" is the story of the hopeless love of a young girl for her middle-aged family physician. One of those school-girl infatuations which one is supposed to look back upon indulgently when one has grown up, but which, as often as not, is the intensest emotional experience of one's life. It is ■ case of love at first sight, and the girl is twelve when in the semi-consciousness of fever she first casts eyes on the "wooden doctor." In the heat of that fever a bond is fused between them which the gentle doctor in his well-intentioned clumsy way tries in vain to dissolve. The birth of this passion in the starved introverted soul of the child, its unconscious development throughout her adolescence until as a young woman she discovers that her life is hopelessly bound up with his, that she cannot love any other man and that he cannot love her, is told as simply as in a letter. The novel mounts to a muted climax, when after an affair in which she surrenders physically to another man she comes happily to her "papa-doctor" to let him know that his diagnosis was correct, "to thank him for his skilful handling of an infatuated schoolgirl"—only, on confronting him, to be brought to a sharper realization that she will never be able to free herself of him.

Miss Evans has wisely refrained from any psychological analysis which would have broken the subjective unity of her narrative. Freudians may deduce from the data of the novel that Arabella's fatal love affair was a typical father fixation in which the middle-aged family physician usurped the role of her drunken father, and it is also fairly obvious that the "wooden doctor" was the victim of some similar psychological involvement which imprisoned him emotionally. But Miss Evans has chosen to look at the contours of reality instead of its chemistry, at the physiognomy of life instead of its anatomy. It is a form of artistic understatement, and a profound one. For the surfaces of life, the phenomena of things are eternal—the explanation varies from age to age.

But Miss Evans's most original contribution is the prose vehicle of her story. It is a forthright stabbing declarative, untrammelled by mannerism, unencumbered by metaphor or nicety of adjective. It may not have the subtle nuances of Katherine Mansfield's prose but its bold strokes are far more telling. The source of its power is revealed in a stray paragraph of the novel:

Then the cut was dealt to me that divided my life into two parts. The period I approach was one of intense misery to me, I cannot write about it now without trembling; yet I am urged to do it. It is very difficult and must be done with the utmost simplicity, or I shall turn aside to darkness where lucidity is hopelessly lost in the incoherent exploration of sensations.

In the last sentence is embedded a little essay on style which many modern novelists might ponder on.

ALTER BRODY

Soviet Justice

The Case of N. P. Vitvitsky et al. Charged with Wrecking Activities at Power Stations in the Soviet Union. Heard Before the Special Session of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. in Moscow, April 12-19, 1933. Translation of the Official Verbatim Report. Moscow: State Law Publishing House. 3 volumes. (Available in New York at Amkniga. $2.50.)

THE case of six British engineers who, together with a number of Russians, were tried in the Soviet Union last April on charges of espionage, bribery, and "wrecking" of the Soviet electrical industry, caused a sensation in Great Britain, and led to a British embargo on Soviet goods which was not lifted until July 1, when the two Britishers who had received prison sentences were released by the Soviet Government. The controversy which has since raged in Western countries regarding the treatment of foreign experts in the Soviet Union makes the publication of the verbatim report of the trial particularly timely. From this bare record of the prosecutor's pointed and often caustic questions, and the defendants' abject or impassioned answers, emerges an absorbing drama in which individual ambitions, prejudices, and grievances are inextricably intertwined with the gigantic task of socialist construction.

Before us come Russian technicians who held responsible posts in various power plants and who, by their own admission, had once served in the White armies and had always nurtured hostility toward the Soviet regime. Here also are British engineers, employees of the Metropolitan-Vickers Company, a British concern dealing in the manufacture and installation of electrical machinery which has been operating in the Soviet Union for more than ten years. Of these, two—Allan Monkhouse, manager of the Moscow office, and William Thornton, chief engineer—had worked in Russia before the revolution; and Monkhouse had served in the British expeditionary forces at Archangel—a fact which the prosecutor did not fail to stress. Finally, in the midst of these technicians, is the capable Russian secretary, Kutuzova, who was on "intimate terms" with both Monkhouse and Thornton, but who vehemently denied that she could be bought "for perfumes, face powder, and face cream."

The Russian defendants vied in denouncing the Britishers as instigators of a plot to damage the Soviet electrical industry, with a view to weakening the defenses of the Soviet Union in case of war or intervention. That the British engineers, with the possible exception of Nordwall, who had been decorated for shock-brigade work, were not primarily interested in the success of the Five-Year Plan needs no demonstration. The trial also reveals that they bribed some Soviet employees to conceal defects in Metropolitan-Vickers machinery and extended personal favors to others. Nor is there any reasonable doubt that Thornton and MacDonald, at least, collected information regarding the political and economic situation of the Soviet Union, as well as concerning production in armament and other industries served by the power plants in which they installed machinery. Did the Britishers, however, deliberately seek to undermine the economic and military position of the Soviet Union? Was the information they collected merely used, as Monkhouse asserted, to enlighten the directors of the Metropolitan-Vickers Company, which had extended large credits to the Soviet Government, or was it used in such a way as to strengthen the position of anti-Soviet elements in case of intervention? On the face of it, it is rather difficult to believe that foreign engineers would purposely damage machinery they had installed in Soviet factories, even if the responsibility for such damage might for a time be concealed by systematic bribing. Some of the "wrecking" incidents described during the trial, moreover, might easily result from negligence or inexperience on the part of Soviet workers. What is not inconceivable is that some of the information furnished by Monkhouse and Thornton on periodic visits to London might prove of interest to British armament manufacturers and to enemies of the Soviet Union in Great Britain.

The principal difficulty in reaching a clear-cut conclusion regarding the activities of the British engineers is that the case against them was based in large part on pretrial confessions by both British and Russian defendants. In these confessions Thornton made sensational revelations regarding a British espionage organization directed by Richards, export manager of the Metropolitan-Vickers Company and alleged to be a member of the British Intelligence Service, while MacDonald gave elaborate details regarding various "wrecking" operations which he had instigated. At the trial Thornton repudiated his confessions on the ground that they had been extracted under "moral pressure." Questioned by the prosecutor, he admitted that no third-degree methods had been applied, but that he had been frightened, tired, and "brow-beaten," and had been told that if he made a clean breast of it "all would be well." The prosecutor and the president of the court castigated Thornton for his moral cowardice, and clearly regarded him as the most despicable of the British defendants. Thornton's disclosures, however, were relatively dignified when compared with the selflacerations of the Russian defendants who, with Dostoevskian gusto, literally wallowed in their admissions of guilt, and swore that, if their lives were spared by the court, they would expiate their crimes by lifelong devotion to the Soviet state.

For the lawyer this report offers invaluable material regarding Soviet legal procedure. As has already been indicated, the prosecution made extensive use of the defendant's pretrial testimony during the trial. The Russians were more eager to furnish the details of their crimes than to defend themselves. The defense of the Britishers was curiously inadequate; although all of them except MacDonald were at liberty throughout the trial, and presumably could call on the British Embassy for advice, they showed little cooperation in disputing the charges of the prosecution. It must be admitted that they were not materially aided by the defending lawyers, chosen, according to Soviet practice, from the Soviet "college of advocates," one of whom freely confessed that his clients were charged with "heinous" crimes, and that the plea he could make for them was "very limited." Allowing, however, for the fact that the basic concepts of Soviet law and legal procedure differ fundamentally from those of Great Britain, there appears to have been no denial of justice according to accepted international law. The climax of the trial was the speech of the prosecutor, Vishinsky, in which he pointed out that, while the Ramzin trial of 1931 had involved men of real caliber, the Russian engineers who figured in the present case were "second-class wreckers," the "dregs of the technical intelligentsia," from whom the Soviet Union had nothing to fear. The trial, he said, had above all demonstrated "the utter hopelessness of any attempt to hold up the victorious progress of our proletarian revolution." His conclusion, which the court corroborated by an unexpectedly mild verdict, was that the Soviet state is now strong enough to be merciful toward such "insignificant enemies."

VERA MICHELES DEAN

Twenty Years' Romancing

Twenty Years A-Growing. By Maurice O'Sullivan. With a Foreword by E. M. Forster. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THIS work, which has been excellently translated from the Irish by Moya Llewelyn Davies and George Thomson, is an account of primitive life in the West of Ireland. The author hails from Great Blasket, the last inhabited island of the group of that name, which lies off the extreme southwestern coast of Kerry. The dwindling population and the anachronistic conditions which he describes are obviously doomed there as elsewhere in Ireland. He himself leaves the Island, and his destination, as usual, is America. He describes an "American wake," and shows how he was persuaded by one of the translators to remain in Ireland, instead of following that old Blasket custom of going to New York. The value of the book, therefore, is that of a record in which—to quote the translators—"the language, like the life, is largely medieval." In order to preserve the flavor of that language in English, the Anglo-Irish idiom perfected by Douglas Hyde, Lady Gregory, and J. M. Synge has been employed. Those familiar with "The Love Songs of Connacht," "Cuchulain of Muirthemne," and "The Playboy of the Western World" will be prepared to appreciate the style of this translation.

Of the book itself, apart from quaintness of idiom, the translators have said all there is to be said in their preface: "This book is the story of one of the Islanders, written by himself for his own pleasure and for the entertainment of his friends. In the first part of the book, he gives an account of his childhood in the Island; in the second, he goes on to describe how he left his native place and went to Dublin in order to join the Civic Guard, the new Irish police force. It is the first translation into English of a genuine account of the life of the Irish peasants written by one of themselves, as distinct from what has been written about them by the poets and dramatists of the Anglo-Irish school."

To an Irish reader the book suggests a number of reflections which (naturally) have not occurred to Mr. Forster in his lyrical preface nor to the English and American reviewers who have hailed it with vast enthusiasm. In the first place, one is struck by the fact that throughout the entire book no hint is given that the author has lived in a part of the world where rain, dampness, and depression are more than ordinarily the portion of the natives. In the second, one would imagine that Synge had never written "The Aran Islands," and that existence on an Irish-speaking island was now being revealed to the world for the first time—that is, according to the encomiasts. Mr. O'Sullivan's Blasket might be the setting of a Hollywood South Seas idyll for all the book tries to convey of the laborious and melancholy realities of life in the West of Ireland. The much-abused Anglo-Irish school of literature drove out the stage Irishman, but the cult of peasant speech and folklore has saddled poor Ireland with another myth: the charm of life without sanitation, adequate food, and decent housing.

Sympathetic officials who spoke but little, and perhaps knew nothing, of the delights and subtleties of the Irish language, its oral verse and story-telling, saw the actual conditions under which the Gaeltacht lived. For example: "In one room, eleven feet by seven feet, was a family of five. In the other room of the hovel, a family of seven, a loom, a pig, a cow, a donkey, a bed, a spinning-wheel and a cradle. It is beyond belief. And every soul is a gentleman or a lady who entertains you with wit and pathos." Such are the facts which are always omitted in these accounts of the last glories of the Gael.

There also seems to be the impression that Mr. O'Sullivan is unique in being a vivid and graphic writer in Irish. A less deliberately romantic story-teller, a realist full of imagination and humor was Padraic O'Conaire. Two of his books were translated into English, but without success, so far as the reviewers were concerned. Possibly because he would never have worked in all the vaudeville wheezes which the ingenuous Mr. O'Sullivan employs in describing his train trip to Dublin and his first experiences of the Big City. O'Conaire and Mr. O'Sullivan have, however, one point in common: they could never please the pious fanatics who claim to be the sole champions of the Gael. The Publications Department of the Free State Ministry of Education did not find Mr. O'Sullivan's book saccharine enough to publish it in Irish, despite the loudly professed enthusiasm for the language. That task, it so happens, was performed in Dublin by the publisher of Padraic O'Conaire.

ERNEST BOYD

Toward World Suicide?

International Politics: An Introduction to the Western State System. By Frederick L. Schuman. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $4.

PROFESSOR SCHUMAN'S latest book is a long one. Yet it deals with subjects of such magnitude and complexity that, for all its 853 pages, the reader is constantly warned, and perhaps tantalized and wearied, by the author's refrain that the matter is too vast for the space at his command. As one of the tantalized rather than wearied readers, I agree with him, and wish he had made more room for the elaboration of his major themes by eliminating much tedious description of international "forms," such as treaty rights, laws of war, consular offices, state departments, and other diplomatic apparatus.

For the main theme of the book, though nowise novel, is of tragic pertinence; and its treatment is vigorous and gripping. We cannot be told too often or too well that our Western civilization stands on the brink of disaster; that the disaster is bound to follow another world war or series of wars; that these wars are almost inevitable as a consequence of our patriotism and economic nationalism; and that nationalism in politics and economics, though not derived from capitalism, is, under our profit-system, the natural form given to the inborn human greed for power. Professor Schuman prefers to work out the ominous formula in the reverse and historically more logical order. And he supports each clause with a wealth of examples which explain its particular origin and illustrate its probable consequences. The book is at once history, economics, and sociology, all in their bearing on the panorama of international politics.

From the days of Ur of Chaldea, these politics have been a game of power. Throughout antiquity city-states were merged or dragooned into kingdoms, and kingdoms into empires, and empires swept away, by this lust for dominion. Nations in the modern sense arose from the clash of power between the European peoples as they emerged from feudalism into cohesive independent polities. England was born at Crécy, France at Orléans, Spain at Granada, Germany at Sedan—or similar fields of battle. And much as Christianity became the religious expression of feudal Europe, patriotism—which Professor Schuman neatly defines as “ancestor-worship and territorial fetishism”—has become the religion of the modern capitalist world. Just as the old religion furnished war-cries in the way of saints and dogmas whereby the former ruling classes, lords, dukes, and kings, whipped their underlings into war in order to enrich themselves, so our modern religion with its slogans of “flag” and “country” serve the present dominant middle classes for their proposed, if not always evident, enrichment.

Meanwhile the various states have remained what they have always been since the fall of Rome, the last world-empire: “geographically separate communities free to bargain, trade, and fight with one another.” Put more briefly, the Western state system is “international anarchy,” precisely as the prevalent business system is “economic anarchy.” In world politics this anarchy has been given some measure and control by the gradual emergence of recognized rules for negotiating peace, war, and other bargains, and by keeping a balance of power between the states which prevents the absolute hegemony and empire of any one or group of them.

These checks worked decently enough until the rise of machine industry and its capitalistic exploitation. Although, hitherto, the nations might seek an increase of power—according to their age-old wont—through territorial raids and colonial expansion, the casualties in the game were comparatively low and the profits not unduly high. But industrialism, under capitalism, has enormously increased the booty to be gained in the play for power. And the tools it has devised to increase this power and booty, when applied to war as a means of winning them, now threaten to destroy the world. Neither winners nor losers can afford another world war.

Yet how can it be prevented? Professor Schuman is bluntly factual in appraising the means which are currently proposed. The last war has changed nothing fundamentally so far as the game of “international anarchy” goes. It has merely substituted a French hegemony in Europe for a German hegemony. And where previously the French sought revenge and the Russians expansion, now Germany seeks revenge and Italy “a place in the sun.” Elsewhere, most of the nations of the world are suffering as before, either from the discontent at being exploited by a stronger power or from the itch to exploit a weaker one. The truly pacific nations are, as usual, either insignificant or momentarily occupied with internal troubles. The total pattern remains the same.

Diplomacy cannot avert war, Professor Schuman plainly shows, for war is itself one of diplomacy’s integral weapons. Arbitration treaties and peace pacts cannot avail in the future any more than they have in the past, because they do not touch the causes of war. At best, they amount to a truce. The hope of uprooting the religion of patriotism without first uprooting its patron, capitalism, is absurd on the face of it. And capitalism, especially when it assumes the form of economic nationalism and fascism—and the pressure of its own mismanagement and lust is driving it ever farther along that road—cannot be uprooted except at the price of the very war we are seeking to avoid.

Finally, that hope of sentimentalists, the League of Nations, is shown to be floundering in a hopeless dilemma so far as the ultimate preservation of peace is concerned. “If the League does not uphold the existing status quo, it will become worthless to its founders, who will then abandon it. If it does seek to perpetuate that status quo, it will be worthless to all the revisionist states of the world, which will sooner or later resort to force, and destroy the League in the process.”

Perhaps one hope remains—the triumph of communism, which, as we may guess though not absolutely count on from the example of Russia, would destroy the basis of patriotism by destroying the middle classes and their profit motives. But this is a faint hope, which assumes either that communism can capture the imagination and allegiance of the world before our catastrophic war breaks loose, or else, once a world war is declared, that it can seize effective power before irrevocable damage is done.

Some quaint comfort—disregarded by Professor Schuman—may be extracted as well from the logic of economic nationalism, which if carried to the limit would completely isolate the nations—turning each of them into an eighteenth-century Japan; and banish the dogs of war by chaining each one, growling, gnawing, and otherwise relieving himself, in his own kennel.

But Professor Schuman’s book, I should hasten to add, is no prophecy; and only in the final few pages does he reluctantly assume the role of a seer. On the contrary, it is an extensive factual description of things as they are, marred by few inevitable errors. And it is because it deals with the realities—and not the dreams or aspirations—of today, that it makes the outlook seem so gloomy for the morrow.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL

The Animal Sense

Pure and the Impure. By Colette. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

READING Colette, it is not difficult to understand why nature, especially human nature, can be seen as a skein of the animal senses. The opposing concept, the classic view of life, seeks to establish nature as a pattern of reason, whether mathematical or organic. Colette’s invariable theme is: nature, man, and animal are identical. She is primarily the artist of profound and subtle sensations translated into a medium that is a strict expression of what the eye beholds and the hand touches. Even her landscapes are animal in the sense that they are reflected in her style as sensory and ever in instinctive motion. Always in her work there is a longing, as she says somewhere, “to possess the wonders of the earth with my eye.” Her women and her cats are interchangeable; her men can be scarcely told apart except for their oddities of physical make-up. And yet, although she is outstandingly a poet of voluptuousness, she uses no vulgar tricks to bring off her effects.

In this she resembles somewhat D. H. Lawrence, who was also obsessed with man’s diffusive identity with nature. Neither Lawrence nor Colette, however, quite escapes the romantic system contrived by Rousseau; both eke out what they miss in romanticism by drawing exhaustively on their childhood experiences and memories. In her early books, in "Cheri" and "Claudine," and in her animal dialogues, Colette, steeped in her peculiar sense-mirror of nature, gives us a childlike and frequently "savage" poetry of the senses. But, since she is a modern, she has been unable to compel her talent to walk at all times in its earlier path. The delicate shadings of her own style, so vivid and tactile, have now seduced her to the limbo of half-whispers and overtones in dealing with sex. In Colette's case, surely, this marks a kind of decadence.

This decadence is fully spread out for the reader in her present book. I do not call it decadence because her theme happens to be wayward love. After all, many writers have dealt understandingly with pervers, inverts, and what Colette herself calls ternary harmony. Colette's error in her present book, a chronicle of her experiences in the shadowy border-world of Paris where drug fiends, wastrels, and homosexuals hold their traffic, is that she felt the need to abandon her explicit early style and take refuge in innuendo. Even her spinning of paradoxical analysis around her Sapphos and queer Don Juans is not without sophistry. Her talent is, above all, sensual and direct; this gift of hers, although it may sound contradictory to say so, is almost classic in its translucency. It is a pity that she has for the present abandoned it. Gide and Proust are masters of psychological description. We ask for no manifestation of outward sensuality in their Edouards and Barons de Charlus. The reader enjoys groping his way among their paradoxes and epigrams, but these selfsame epigrams in Colette are rather tiresome. They reveal next to nothing. One character in the book, Charlotte, a plump, blonde, unknown woman emotionally chained to a handsome and perverted invalid, betrays Colette's old superb power—power with delicacy, as it may be found in "Cheri" and "Claudine." It is regrettable that she has not seen fit to turn her book into Charlotte's story rather than a case-book of erratic sexual expression.

Dr. Joseph Collins, in his introduction, tries his best to condone, but all he can do is to lapse into a literary gaffe past belief. "I think," he writes, "it was Job who said 'God does things past finding out.'" The translation, too, is unsatisfactory. It is so literal in a number of places that the meaning of the author tends to elude the reader.

PIERRE LOVING

Shorter Notices

Venetian Blinds. By Ethel Mannin. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

In a prefatory note to this novel of outer London's mean streets, and the ordinary people who live in them, Miss Mannin disclaims any intention of writing about actual people, and explains that "there are thousands of Stephen Pendricks struggling up from a house-in-a-row to a semi-detached villa; thousands of lonely old Mrs. Crabbes living alone with their dogs; thousands of unhappily married young Mrs. Mords in love with their lodgers," and so on. Perhaps this austere intention to document only the typical and mediocre may account for the automatism with which her characters seem to move, and the reader's ultimate conviction of the futility of this form of documentation. Miss Mannin writes exceedingly well. She achieves vigor and poetry in her style without affectation, and she is able to convey character in convincing detail. And yet, for all its expertness and sincerity, the novel is disappointing. It belongs to that current school of attenuated naturalism which is without passionate motivation, which trades on the sole truth that mediocrity is legion. But this truth is common knowledge by now, and if one takes the trouble to amplify it in a novel something must be added to it. As in Hans Fallada's novel, there must be some attempt to discover the meaning of this mediocrity; it must be made significant, even, in a sense, heroic.

Carr. By Phyllis Bentley. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A novel cast in the form of a biography of its central character, "Carr" deals with the same locale as Miss Bentley's "Inheritance"—a mill town in the West Riding of Yorkshire; only here the emphasis is on the individuals, rather than on the drama of the rise of the machine in England. In this imaginary biography, the life of Philip Joseph Carr, covering the years from 1854 to 1927, is recounted by his granddaughter, the imaginary biographer who claims that her sources of information are Carr's letters, various notes and diaries, the Hudley News, oral tradition, and so on. It is an altogether delightful performance. The whole biography is written in a light vein, in a style that is an excellent adaptation of Victorian prose. Miss Bentley uses an idiom that seems to be the authentic speech of her characters, and she deals with their loves and hates with just that touch of sly humor that conveys her affectionate indulgence of their Victorian foibles. The prefaces, footnotes, and appendices add a piquant dash of scholarship.

Renascent India: from Ram Mohan Roy to Mohandas Gandhi.

By H. C. Zacharias. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.25.

The purpose of this book is to explain why there is a conflict in India today between Indian nationalism and British imperialism, and to tell what the course of it has been. It does not really deal with "Renascent India" except as that country is renascent politically, and partly as it is renascent socially, religiously, and educationally. Literature, art, and many other

At last • THE TRUTH

THE UNTRIED CASE:

The Sacco-Vanzetti Case and the Morelli Gang

By HERBERT B. EHRLMANN

Counsel, with William G. Thompson, for Sacco and Vanzetti, 1926-1927

This book tells who committed the crime for which Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were executed.

$2 • At Bookstores • VANGUARD
100 5th AVE., N. Y. C.

aspects of the Indian renaissance are outside the author's purview. It is a first-rate presentation of the political situation in India as it appears to a nationalist, almost the one book in the decade on that subject with a similar motivation that deserves any serious consideration. Although it is propagandist in effect and interprets the political history of British and Indian relations during the past century from the nationalist point of view, it is careful in assembling facts to seek for accuracy and does not indulge in epithets or harangues. It is easily read by one with an Indian background, but would perhaps be a bit difficult for a reader having no previous acquaintance with the subject. India is very different today from India a hundred years ago, when Ram Mohan Roy was the outstanding reformer, and the specific aims of Ram Mohan Roy and Mahatma Gandhi, while often similar, seek fulfilment by different means. Dr. Zacharias discusses the change at length; in brief the reason is that a hundred years ago forward-looking Indians had confidence in Britain; even fifty years ago they still had it; today most of India's thoughtful patriots have little, if any, of that confidence. Nevertheless Dr. Zacharias believes that it is still possible to work out terms agreeable and profitable to both parties, according to which India and Britain may maintain their association.

India-Burma. Laymen's Foreign Missions Inquiry. Two volumes. Regional Reports: Volume 1, Supplementary Series, Part I. Fact-Finders' Reports: Volume IV, Supplementary Series, Part 2. Edited by Orville A. Petty. Harper and Brothers. $1.50 per volume.

These two volumes constitute supplementary matter to the general report of the Laymen's Foreign Missions Inquiry "Re-Thinking Missions." The first volume contains a report on different departments of mission work in India and recommendations for the future program; the second volume contains summaries by competent investigators of facts presented to the committee of appraisal. The tone of the two volumes is generally realistic and scholarly, and that of the fact-finders may be considered an authoritative survey of the status of missions, especially Protestant American missions, of India today. There is a tendency in these volumes to emphasize, more than ever in the past, the sociological aspects of missionary work, and the first two subjects considered are those of agriculture and village life and missions and industry; the second longest article is Miss Woodsmall's on women's interests and activities. A reading of these will repay those interested in these subjects independently of missions. The outlook for Christianizing India seems problematic, even with the application of such tactful and sweetly reasonable methods as those proposed in this report.

An Authenticated Contemporary Portrait of Shakespeare. By Tracy Kingman. William Edwin Rudge. $5.

The affidavits by experts of which this handsome volume is largely composed do not prove what Mr. Kingman wants to prove—namely, that the portrait of two men playing chess, which Colonel Ezra Miller of New Jersey bought in 1878 and which now belongs to Frank de Heyman, Jr., is an authentic, contemporary, and from-the-life portrait of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson. If it were any of these things it would be unique and priceless; but most of Mr. Kingman's "proof" is based upon a resemblance between the head of "Shakespeare" here and the Kesselstadt death mask—which, contrary to Mr. Kingman's claim, has not been generally accepted either as a death mask at all or as a likeness of Shakespeare. Then there is testimony to the effect that the canvas beneath the paint is early seventeenth-century canvas. This in all likelihood is true; but many an old painting has been "restored" for a purpose, and this may be such a one. Our desire to know what Shakespeare looked like, obviously unsatisfied by the Stratford bust and the Droeshout engraving, has filled the world with spurious countenances purporting to be his. Mr. Kingman's uncritical monograph will not convince the wary that here at last is the genuine face.

The March of Democracy. Volume II. By James Truslow Adams. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

There is no change of method in Mr. Adams's second volume, but the method benefits by the increasing predominance of national issues of large character from the Civil War onward. The main divisions of the narrative are obvious—the Civil War, reconstruction, the new era of industrial development that merged shortly with a new imperialism, political reform and the Progressive movement, the Wilson regime and the World War, and the calamitous years that have been war's heritage. Interspersed with these political matters is a good deal of miscellaneous but useful information about changes in social habits and economic conditions, the course of literature and science, and the intellectual and moral interests of classes and masses. As in the previous volume, counsel is mixed with history, and we learn something of what Mr. Adams thinks of American political methods at various times and of changes which he would like to see, but his criticisms, although usually of the nature of asides, are timely and his estimates of political leaders just. What is said of the "mad decade" that followed the World War, while necessarily brief, will do little to enhance respect for either Harding, Coolidge, or Mr. Hoover. The more than 250 illustrations merit high praise for their variety and appropriateness.

FOR RENT

FURNISHED AND UNFURNISHED

NEW YORK CITY
687 LEXINGTON AVENUE—57th STREET
"THE DOVER"
A quiet, dignified apartment hotel in a socially correct and convenient location, catering to those who desire complete but unobtrusive service.
1-2 or MORE ROOMS
Furnished with new, well-chosen pieces
Unfurnished if desired
SERVING PANTRIES
Splendid Restaurant on Premises
FULL HOTEL SERVICE
By the month or on yearly lease
AT MODERATE RENTALS
RESIDENT MANAGER—PLaza 3-7692

BEGINNING Sept. 1. Six bright rooms in Greenwich Village. Convenient to subways. Every convenience, including electrolux. Moderately priced. Telephone Walker 5-4939

FOR SEPTEMBER. Completely furnished living room, bed room, kitchen and bath. Call evenings. 61 West 10th St., Apt. 1E.

OPEN SHELF

Henry George's Books
Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men—sent free.
None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

LANGUAGES

RUSSIAN taught by university man, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School. Private lessons or classes. VICTOR PHONOGRAPH RECORDS USED. Michael Jerlitzyn, 2018 Fifth Ave. HARlem 7-8446.

POSITION WANTED

COLLEGE WOMAN, efficient, economical, young, capable assist doctor, care home, children. Drive car. Willing to work with hands and brain at anything. Box 110, c/o The Nation.

PERSONAL

EDUCATED farmer in Sunny South; healthful beautiful climate, pines, oaks, big forests, streams; offers good permanent home, lifetime room and board. Very reasonable. Box 213, c/o The Nation.

YOUNG WRITER working in Philadelphia wants to get out in country. Has found nearby farmhouse (with furniture). Whoever likes poetry, music and hills is invited to rent it with her. $10 month. Box 212, c/o The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 30, 1933

No. 3556

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	225
EDITORIALS:
Fünfergruppen	227
On Helping the Government	228
Politics and Crime	229
More Power Propaganda	229
A Bad Appointment	230
ISSUES AND MEN. FIORELLO H. LA GUARDIA. By Oswald Garrison Villard	231
CARTOON. By Massaguer	232
CUBA CLEANS HOUSE. By Hubert Herring	233
JOHNSON AND THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. By Paul Y. Anderson	234
LAWYERS AND THE DEPRESSION. By James P. Gifford	236
THE AUSTERITY OF GEORGE KELLY. By Joseph Wood Krutch	240
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	242
CORRESPONDENCE	242
BOOKS, ART, FILMS:
The Ecstatic. By C. Day Lewis	244
South American Rhapsody. By Evelyn Scott	244
Literary Trapezist. By William Troy	244
They Had to See Russia. By William Henry Chamberlin	245
Ex-Regulator. By Louis Bartlett	246
San Francisco Sin. By Carey McWilliams	246
Dead Germany. By Oswald Garrison Villard	247
Shorter Notices	247
Art: Modern Art in Perspective. By Walter Pach	249
Films: A, B, C, and D. By William Troy	250
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	252

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE HERCULEAN EFFORTS of Hugh S. Johnson and his associates during the past week have resulted in a large collection of completed codes, chief among them those covering the steel, oil, and lumber industries. A coal code still hangs in the offing as we go to press, but it is certain that, like the codes mentioned above, its final terms will exclude any specific provisions for company unions or any other reservations or provisos affecting the labor guaranties included in the recovery act. This is greatly to the credit of Mr. Johnson and the deputy administrators. The determination of the steel and coal magnates to write their own labor plans into the codes was strongly asserted; they had even supplied themselves with legal rationalizations designed to make their wishes conform with the provisions of the law. But Donald Richberg, counsel for the Recovery Administration, firmly excluded any company-union schemes, however worded, and the administration is standing pat upon the unqualified guaranty of labor's right to organize, to bargain collectively, and to refuse to join company unions. This stand will undoubtedly have the effect not of solving the issue of unionization but of throwing it back into the industry to be fought out through strikes or before the mediation boards set up as a part of the recovery machine. Certainly the steel owners do not consider the matter settled; when they agreed to withdraw the company-union clause from the steel code they announced openly that they would continue to operate under the employee-representation plan described in the deleted clause. Similarly the non-union coal operators may be counted upon to fight the union in the field if they are not permitted to rule it out in the code. Labor's war for recognition under the recovery act has not even begun; but the power of the employers to punish workers for joining independent unions has been definitely and legally denied. The next moves are up to labor itself.

ON THE WHOLE the steel code, while an improvement over the draft originally submitted by the industry, is a disappointing document, especially if read in the light of the criticism made by Frances Perkins at the time of the first hearings. Secretary Perkins proposed that the provisions against the spying by one company upon another be extended to prohibit the use of labor spies; but in the accepted code the original clause remains unchanged. The forty-hour week is established, but is hedged about with so many reservations that it cannot possibly be enforced without further government intervention. Child labor is abolished, although the phrase "none . . . shall knowingly employ" any person under sixteen leaves an unfortunate loophole for evasion—and one to which Miss Perkins strongly objected in her criticism of the draft code. The wage scales were not given in the texts of the code available in the newspapers, but a summary published by the Federated Press quotes rates from 25 cents an hour in the Southern district to 40 cents in the district comprising Pittsburgh, Youngstown, Cleveland, Detroit, Toledo, Chicago, and Colorado. This scale again runs directly counter to Miss Perkins's recommendations. She urged a weekly rather than an hourly rate and a higher minimum, especially in the South. According to a statement issued by Hugh S. Johnson, "minimum wages . . . are estimated to exceed an average of 40 cents an hour. (This results from the fact that higher minimum wages than those fixed in the code are paid to large groups of common labor.)" This statement, published without any accompanying figures, is certainly misleading. A minimum wage rate is the lowest paid in a plant or an industry and is not to be arrived at by lumping the rates for various grades of common labor and getting an average wage. A 15 per cent increase is promised for workers who were receiving on July 14 more than the common-labor rate, provided this increase does not raise wages above those paid by other mills in the same district for "substantially the same class of labor." To achieve any measure of government control over steel is a cause for congratulation; and conditions will doubtless be improved by the standards set in the accepted code, low as they appear. But those who hoped that the enlightened views of Frances Perkins would have serious effect on the final agreements on wages and working conditions between the National Recovery Administration and one of the most important basic industries must be sorely disappointed.

THE ACID TEST of the NRA will be its effects upon employment and total wage payments; but this test will not be applicable with reasonable fairness at least until the August and September figures have been published. Meanwhile the figures for July, though influenced largely by the price rise resulting from the depreciated dollar and by the general recovery that began in March, and only in part determined by the new program (the first of the codes, that applying to cotton textiles, did not go into effect until July 17), are promising as far as they go. Employment in July, according to the official figures, rose 7.2 per cent. While the extent of this increase is hardly remarkable in itself, it must be remembered that July, owing to summer shutdowns and layoffs, is normally a month of declining employment. The Department of Labor estimates that 400,000 factory employees returned to work in July, and that in four months there has been a total reemployment of 1,100,000. How far we have still to go before we can return to the conditions even of 1926 we realize when we find that even at the end of July only sixty-seven men were working in factories for every hundred employed there in 1926, while total factory wage disbursements in July were running at a rate of only 46 per cent of that in 1926. Another factor which must not be overlooked is the relation of rising wage payments to rising prices. While factory pay rolls increased 7.9 per cent in July, food prices throughout the country increased by 8.3 per cent. It must not be assumed from this that higher living costs more than offset even the minor payroll gains made by labor in July, for food is only one element—usually estimated at about one-third—in the total cost of living. But it is obvious that such figures must be watched as carefully as those of the direct payment of wages, if we are to have any true index of the progress of labor in terms of welfare.

By a single stroke the President has revolutionized the economic world that was crumbling and its fragments crashing down upon the defenseless heads of employer, worker, and consumer alike. . . . Our frayed and worn economic system had come to a point where it was infringing on the basic constitutional rights of American citizens—namely, the right to earn their bread by the sweat of their labor and the right to earn enough, not for a bare living, but to engage in the pursuit of happiness which is guaranteed in our basic laws.

WHO UTTERED these dangerously radical sentiments to the students of New York University the other day? We suppose that our readers will guess that it was some dyed-in-the-wool Communist, some very radical Socialist. Not at all. These sentiments came from no less a person than Grover Whalen, lately head of the New York police and now chairman of the New York City Emergency Reemployment Committee, a branch of the National Recovery Administration. Yes, these words came from the mouth of the very man who a few years ago was allowing his police to assail and break up the meetings of those "dangerous reds" whose sentiments were on all fours with those now being uttered by the same head of the police. Had Mr. Whalen said these things on the streets of New York in 1929 or 1930 he would have been run into jail or beaten up by one of his own Red Squad. We know of nothing funnier than this spectacle of the erstwhile defender of the homes of New York speaking the language of Socialists and social uplifters. Nor could we think of any happening which would more clearly illustrate the revolution that is taking place in the minds of some of the leaders of our recent era of rugged individualism.

IN HIS LETTER of resignation from the Consumers' Advisory Board, Professor William F. Ogburn has made recommendations that the Administration cannot afford to ignore. Once the first phase of the NRA has passed, he insists, increasing protection must be given to the consumer. This protection cannot be provided by mere ballyhoo but must rest on the development of careful indexes of prices and of purchasing power. In order to administer the codes without injury to the consumer, a very full reporting service must be provided for in the codes, and provisions for such a service are missing from many of them. There can be no doubt that the tendency of the NRA is toward greater consolidation of industry—that is, toward a closer approach to monopolistic conditions—and this condition can only be offset by increasing governmental supervision in the consumer's interests. The German experience with cartels, Professor Ogburn points out, only emphasizes the need for this type of supervision.

THE TENDER-HEARTED NAZIS, pausing in the midst of their pogroms, and the belaboring of interned political dissenters with Gummiknüttel and Stahlruten, have decreed an end to vivisection in the Reich. As if German medicine had not already received a severe blow at their hands in the recent rule prohibiting many of the foremost practitioners in internal medicine, gynecology, ophthalmology, and other specialties from receiving patients from "Aryan" colleagues, or giving their services in the public hospitals! The great conquests of disease have been achieved chiefly through animal experimentation and would have been impossible without it. Banting's discovery of insulin and the consequent control of diabetes came as the result of experiments with dogs. Schick's antitoxin for diphtheria and the serums to be developed in the attempt to immunize against other microbic infections require the use of living mammals. Indeed, progress in medical research is unthinkable without animals. The dwindling custom of young American physicians—those who could afford it—of spending a postgraduate year in attendance at the clinics of the great German specialists will by this latest Nazi decree receive its death-blow.

IT WAS a foregone conclusion that the paltry reduction of 6 per cent in electric rates in New York City ordered by the Public Service Commission on August 21 would be contested in the courts by the power companies involved. Jerome Count predicted as much in his article in The Nation of last week. But only such a patriotic wizard as George B. Cortelyou could have discovered that the order was "shocking" and "entirely contrary to the spirit and purpose of the great recovery program undertaken by the President of the United States." The same sort of wizardry is apparent in the following series of events: On May 1 the New York utilities inaugurated the forty-hour week and cut wages from $8\frac{1}{3}$ to $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent "to aid unemployment." This is commonly known as the "share-the-misery" plan. When the Blue Eagle campaign opened, on the basis of a thirty-five to forty-hour week, the representatives of the utilities rushed to Washington to ask for a forty-eight-hour code. But now, in terms of outraged patriotism, they assert that they cannot grant the 6 per cent rate reduction, in spite of the mountain of surplus profits at their back door, and still carry out their NRA pledge. The companies will therefore point out to the commission the "impropriety" of its order and ask for its reversal in the name of President Roosevelt and national recovery. It is an up-to-the-minute variation of an old trick. The usual procedure of an appeal to the courts will no doubt be invoked if the new method is not successful. And Wall Street for one, is evidently sure from long experience that one or the other or both will work. When the order for reduction was announced, Consolidated Gas common closed five-eighths of a point higher and its preferred stock and bonds held their previous gains, except that one bond issue advanced another half-point. Meanwhile the consumer will receive one more lesson in the futility of public-service commissions as a means of reducing his light bills.

A GREAT SHIP is a great ship, no matter to whom it belongs. We might prefer to see the transatlantic speed pennant flown along with some other flag than that of Fascist Italy, but we are not disposed on that account to deny any glory to the liner Rex for her magnificent run from Gibraltar to New York in 4 days, 13 hours, 58 minutes, in the course of which she made the highest average speed per hour, 28.92 knots, and the highest average speed per hour for a single day, 29.61 knots, ever attained by a commercial steamship. There is this solace, too, that although we are not over-devoted to the Black Shirts, we are still less enthusiastic about the Brown Shirts, and we can tolerate the sight of almost anybody snatching the pennant from the company flying the swastika flag of the Nazis. The veteran Mauretania has crossed the Atlantic in less actual time than the Rex, but over the shorter course between New York and Queenstown and at less speed. The Rex has bettered the records of both the Bremen and the Europa, but it is unlikely that either of those ships has yet been pushed to the limit, so we may witness some strenuous pennant races in the next year. It should be said, though, that the pursuit of the transatlantic speed pennant is no longer on the almost strictly commercial basis that it was during the many years when honors were held by the Cunard Line. Although called commercial ships, neither the North German Lloyd fliers nor the new Italian liners are quite that, as all are heavily subsidized by their respective governments in the interest of national prestige. The Rex and the Conte di Savoia were built to make money if possible, but in any event to bring renown to Italy. Even so, the exploit is not to be belittled. It takes supreme skill and high courage to go after ocean speed records in these days. The best knowledge must go into constructing the hull and propelling machinery, valuable space must be sacrificed, and staggering costs for fuel must be faced. It is contemplation of all this that has led the French Line to postpone putting into service until 1935 its new steamship, originally planned for next year. The Normandie, of 70,000 gross tons, is not only the world's largest ship but it is hoped she may prove the fleetest. To put upon the ocean this super whale in a time of world depression would daunt even the most dauntless.

Fünfergruppen

IT was inconceivable that the 13,000,000 Socialists and Communists among Germany's 62,000,000 people should submit without a struggle to the brutal domination of Hitler's brown terror. An article by Ernst Henri in the London New Statesman and Nation of August 5 describes with convincing detail the organization and method by which a subterranean revolutionary movement is being conducted in Germany, designed to bring down that "national revolution" of cowards with clubs which now prevails. The German organization is based upon revolutionary cells, this time known as Fünfergruppen, or groups of five. According to Mr. Henri, they are systematically at work in almost every large factory, in all the cities, and even within the ranks of the Nazi storm troops. Their handiwork appears directly in the anti-fascist handbills circulating almost daily in the larger cities, and in secretly printed factory leaflets which appear with such persistence that Nazi newspapers have lately begun to demand counter-measures against them.

The whole fronts of houses in the working-class areas [writes Mr. Henri] are covered with revolutionary slogans in paint which is difficult to wash off. The Nazis have caught dozens of people, especially youths, at this job and have sent them to concentration camps or penitentiaries (the average punishment for such acts . . . has been . . . raised from six months' to eighteen months' imprisonment; but the walls of the houses . . . continue their protest.

The Groups of Five, which honeycomb the whole of German industry, are not known to one another, which makes them extremely difficult to trace, but they are coordinated from above. The various cells in each town or industrial unit are directed by a "subdistrict committee" consisting of a few experienced revolutionaries; and contact is maintained by a revolutionary "workshop inspector" who is the object of a constant Nazi man hunt. He is seldom discovered. When he is, a substitute is always found, so deep is the anti-Nazi feeling among class-conscious workers.

The indirect effects of these groups are much the more important. For the old trade union the Nazis have substituted the National Socialist Workshop Organization (N. S. B. O.), to which every worker is supposed to belong—including the revolutionary Groups of Five. And the Group of Five, Mr. Henri points out, often becomes the most active element inside the N.S.B.O. The settlement of wage rates and of other relationships with employers is in the hands of the N.S.B.O. And the Nazis cannot with grace object if the N.S.B.O. in any particular factory asks for increased wages, shorter hours, and better working conditions in the name of National Socialism and Hitler's promises before he came to power. As a result, many scheduled wage reductions have been postponed, employers are protesting to Hitler, and the Chancellor himself has come into conflict with his own followers among the workers and has even dissolved some of the N.S.B.O. organizations as being "tainted with Marxism."

How persistent the organization will be or whether it can succeed, no one can tell. But it has its basis in a working-class movement millions strong; and the pressure of economic problems which Hitler shows no evidence of being able to solve is on its side.

On Helping the Government

In its own interest, the Administration ought to be cautious in stirring up the passions, the resentment, and the hostilities that a boycott would engender, for the atmosphere so created is the very one most inimical to the industrial peace that the Administration so ardently desires at the present time. Once a hysteria has been created, it cannot readily be controlled. . . . At the present time the nation is solidly in favor of the fundamental purposes of the NRA. Its directors should take pains that popular backing is not destroyed in a wave of resentment that might break all bounds.

WE have taken these words from an admirable editorial in the Hartford Courant because it not only tells the truth but presents its criticism of the administration of the National Recovery Act in so excellent a tone. We also reprint it to show that criticism is continuing, for we are still of the opinion that no friend of the Administration and the purposes for which it is battling can render any greater service today than to criticize where criticism is due. Nothing, we believe, could be worse for the President, and the threatening General who heads the Recovery Administration, than to have all criticism suddenly stilled for any reason, whether on the alleged ground of patriotism, or of "an emergency similar to war time," or because of any other excuse. Hence we are not moved by admonitions such as the one we have received from a friendly California editor, who insists that all liberals should be so grateful for Mr. Roosevelt's move toward the left and for his liberal advisers that they should all be "standing around him with hats off" and "not be barking at him."

Evidently this editor feels that all those who criticize will lose their influence. Well, that is not the point in question. The only issue is whether liberals, when they see dangerous mistakes being made, should say so publicly or not. If ever the vigilance of the press was essential to the preservation of American liberties, it seems to us that the present, next to the period of the World War, is the time. It is not merely because of the threats of boycott which so worry the Courant, or because of General Johnson's threats to "smash"—"God help them"—all those who don't go along with the Administration, or because of the danger of hysteria, that we feel so keenly. These are bad enough, for they spell the methods of fascists and dictators; but what concerns us primarily is the danger of losing our basic liberties, which must be protected now—not after they have been lost. For example, we find ex-Governor William E. Sweet of Colorado, who, like ourselves, has long ardently desired a new industrial order and a largely increased measure of social justice, saying in an interview in Detroit that "labor's right to strike is, of course, inviolate. But it cannot prevail now, while this country is in a state of flux. It will lose nothing by holding that right temporarily in abeyance." On the contrary, once you let down the bars, once you yourself violate what you admit is inviolate because men temporarily in authority think that this is the time to do so, you have breached the very citadel of liberty. If you can once demand successfully that an inviolate right be held temporarily in abeyance, you can do it again and again, and in the end you will have no cause to protest if one by one all the defenses of human rights go by the board in the course of a severe industrial, and not even a political, crisis.

Among other things we feel that it is absolutely essential for the NRA to recognize that there is a fundamental conflict of principle involved in the question of union recognition—not a mere matter of administrative expediency. Is it "sniping" and "petty criticism" to say so now when the NRA is formulating its policies? Is it unpatriotic for such disinterested and patriotic persons as Miss Mary Van Kleeck and Professor William F. Ogburn to withdraw from two separate phases of the recovery work because they cannot any longer in conscience refrain from making this most effective protest? Is it wrong for people to declare that there is a lack of any solid statistical background or basis for the establishment of the various standards, such as the wage minimums, in the numerous codes? Is it wrong to protest against the appointment to a recovery position of so notoriously bad an employer of labor as Matthew S. Sloan, formerly of the Brooklyn Edison Company? Is it wrong for the Civil Liberties Union to demand protection of workers active in unions or the recognition of minority unions? These are not minor or picayune points. They are vitally important, but if they were less so it would still be proper and helpful to criticize any government policy which seemed to overlook them.

But we are told that if we do not swallow the recovery program, hook, line, and sinker, it will be fascism, dictatorship, or what you will. We are not moved by that argument. If fascism comes in America it will be because of treason to democratic ideals, because of stupid despair, and particularly because of mistakes in handling the reconstruction policies. We repeat that the best way to head off fascism is to criticize and warn now in order that deadly mistakes may be avoided. The American people, as the Courant suggests, should be led and not bludgeoned. We deny that there is such haste necessary that we must be rushed into policies without adequate counsel or discussion.

We are frankly the more moved to exercise our right to discuss and to differ because of the obvious surrender of a large part of the corps of Washington correspondents—as some of them have frankly admitted—to the charm and magnetic personalities of the President and General Johnson. One correspondent has stated that many of his fellows are writing only good things and suppressing or soft-pedaling news that is unfavorable to the NRA. Of course the Courant is right when it says that the nation is today solidly in favor of the recovery measures. We too want them to succeed—and with all our hearts. If we did not, we should be at no pains to caution, to warn, to offer such constructive suggestions as we have. We should sit by silently and look on. But we shall never consent to these policies being tried at the expense of our liberties, individual and group, and we cannot be frightened or abused into taking any other position or into remaining silent when it seems to us that their success is being jeopardized by mistaken actions and policies

Politics and Crime

SENATOR Royal S. Copeland, chairman of the United States Senate subcommittee on racketeering, seems to be doing something valuable in that capacity almost in spite of himself. Among those who testified at the hearing held by the subcommittee in New York on August 15 and 16 were United States Attorney George Z. Medalie and Frederic Kernochan, Chief Justice of the Court of Special Sessions. Between them they managed to make some things reasonably plain. One of them was the close connection between the racketeers and the city political machines throughout the country. That connection is not mysterious. The racketeers are very useful to the district leader. They can perform important services for him at election time. They can help to get out the vote. They can contribute the funds to enable him to buy baskets for the poor at Christmas. They can give him a share of the profits they make from direct contracts in the distribution of which he has a voice. And the district leader can perform compensating services for the racketeer. He can give them contracts. He can arrange bail for them. He can pass the word down the line that they are to be let off when they get into trouble. He can make it unpleasant, at the very least, for any policeman or detective or higher police official who pursues his favored racketeers with too much energy or curiosity.

This was the sort of thing at which Mr. Medalie and Justice Kernochan hinted rather broadly. "You are speaking of the occasional politician, are you not?" asked Senator Copeland of Mr. Medalie. The Senator owes his election and his reelection largely to the efforts of the Tammany machine. "No," replied Mr. Medalie, "I mean professional politicians. I could name four of them immediately right here in this county." Senator Copeland replied that New York County was a big one, and that four corrupt politicians "aren't so many." Mr. Medalie retorted that he could name many more, but the four referred to were only those who "stand out in front of our faces and can't be missed." Senator Copeland did not press him to name them.

The New York District Attorney's office showed no more enthusiasm for tracking down these men than did Senator Copeland. Albert B. Unger, the acting New York District Attorney, said that his office had no intention of "embarking on a John Doe investigation of racketeering." This public attitude merely tends to support the frequent charges that indifference and lack of interest have been shown by the District Attorney's office when complaints of racketeering, supported by evidence, are brought before it. Police Commissioner Boland also, in reply to questions by reporters, declared that he was not interested in investigating the charge made by Justice Kernochan that the influence of corrupt politicians reaches into the police department; he had not even bothered to read the newspaper accounts of the charges. Finally, the regular New York County Grand Jury took the matter into its own hands, and ignoring the District Attorney's office, invited Mr. Medalie and Justice Kernochan to present their facts before it.

Senator Copeland has shown his essential unfitness to conduct the investigation that the Senate has appointed him to conduct; and the other officials who owe their present offices to the Tammany machine, by their attitude, lend added weight to the accusations of Mr. Medalie and Justice Kernochan. The alliance of the racketeer with the local politician is the greatest single cause for the reign of the racketeer in this country. Samuel S. Leibowitz, the criminal lawyer whose clients have ranged from city gangsters to the Scottsboro boys, remarked before the Copeland committee that the real trouble is with the detective division, and that the bulk of the detective force of New York City is made up of "ex-truck drivers, ex-plumbers' helpers, and ex-soda clerks." But even if this were so, it is obvious that it would not be so under an honest and efficient political administration. The same power that warns policemen and detectives to "lay off" racketeers and other big criminals is the power that indirectly appoints detectives too stupid to catch the criminals even if they wanted to.

The solution is not a simple one. The cause lies too deep in our national indifference toward corruption, whether it is found in politics or in business. But the greatest single step that we could take would be to break the grip of machine control, and that cannot be done permanently in the cities until they adopt a form of government in which the final power rests in a council or board elected by proportional representation. Only by proportional representation will minority elements be able to take a constant part in city government; only by such representation can the grip of machines, with their solid block of interested votes, be permanently loosened; only such representation will provide constant opposition to the more flagrant forms of inefficiency and corruption. Not until our city governments are reformed can we hope to win anything but temporary and minor victories against the racketeer.

More Power Propaganda

DESPITE various deceptive gestures of repentance and reform, the same old power propaganda continues. Before us is a circular broadcast by the American Security Owners' Association, addressed to "public-utility security owners." It calls their attention "to the present insidious and nation-wide propaganda for decreasing the rates of public utilities for services rendered." "The movement," the circular continues, "is not supported by economic reasons; but is inspired wholly and solely by political expediency." In short, the millions of electricity consumers have turned politicians; they have no economic stake in diminishing their electric bills!

The circular then goes on to repeat the hoary falsehoods that an "ever-increasing avalanche of taxes, federal, State, and local," has "effaced all the advantages of research and technological progress"; that "the public utilities have repeatedly and consistently cut rates and instituted all the economies which could be reasonably effected without detriment to the service." But there is also news in the circular, to wit: "Before adjourning, the special session of Congress took from the consumer and placed on the producer the 3 per cent electricity tax, thereby denying to the electric light and power industry the right enjoyed and followed by every other industry in the country of passing taxes on to the ultimate consumer." How deliciously frank this is!

"As though that blow at security values were not enough, now come many States proposing temporary emergency rate reductions, the savings from which will not enrich the domestic consumer and will leave the public-utility corporation poor indeed." The circular then urges that security owners protest to their public officials against these rate reductions, saying: "The public service commissions . . . are inclined to deal justly in this matter, and not all of the governors are unfair, but both are being subjected to increasing and threatening political pressure and need that moral support which only your letters can give to sustain them." The signer of this interesting document is William H. Onken, Jr. Now Mr. Onken has long been active in behalf of the utilities. In the exposé by the Federal Trade Commission of the utilities propaganda his name appears as editor of the Electrical World, which post he held until 1929. The post has changed, but the person and the propaganda are the same. Protection for utility-security owners, indeed! What did these power propagandists do to prevent the debacle of the Insull, Foshay, and Ohrstrom securities?

We turn to the August issue of Vanity Fair, and find in it an article entitled Public Ownership No Solution, by George E. Sokolsky. With his defense along classic lines of the superior value of private initiative (so admirably demonstrated in recent years!) we shall not trouble to disagree. Nor do we object to Mr. Sokolsky's leveling his attack at that bête noire of the power trust, the Ontario Hydro-Electric, whose magnificent record nullifies so completely the claims of our private utilities concerning low rates and efficient service. We do, however, smile at his selection as his authority of "Professor Mavor, the Canadian economist." For the Federal Trade Commission in 1928 exposed Professor Mavor as having been secretly in the pay of the public utilities when he wrote his book on "Niagara in Politics." This interesting transaction was worked through another individual, who in his vouchers recorded it as "payment to a mutual friend." It was doubly concealed in the National Electric Light Association's accounts and the truth was not disclosed to the public when the book was published in 1925, nor in the years following, when the utilities insinuated thousands of copies of it into schools, colleges, and public libraries, a distribution program for which the N. E. L. A. appropriated $10,000 in addition to the subsidy to Mavor. But the facts have now been of public record for five years. Not only did they appear in more than one place in the Federal Trade Commission's printed reports, but they were further recorded in volumes subsequently published: "The Power Fight" by H. S. Raushenbush; "The Public Pays" by Ernest Gruening; "Confessions of the Power Trust" by Carl D. Thompson.

The leopard has not changed its spots. It is the same old propaganda, designed to maintain in behalf of a few privileged insiders, and at the expense of the American public, the existing financial jugglery, watered stock, padded valuations, and excessive salaries, based on exorbitant rates and totally ineffective "regulation." Samuel Insull may be in Greece, but his spirit and practices still dominate the electric light and power industry in the United States. And day by day the evidence piles up that the American public has no effective remedy against these continued abuses short of the very public ownership which Mr. Sokolsky, on the authority of a paid power-company propagandist, denounces.

A Bad Appointment

THE announcement that Ambassador Sumner Welles will return shortly to his former post as Assistant Secretary of State and be replaced in Cuba by Jefferson Caffery is highly regrettable for several reasons. No more important diplomatic assignment exists at this moment than the Cuban post. To help the Cubans to restore their shattered political and economic structure and to work out a new and better relationship between the two countries is a task requiring major statesmanship. Mr. Welles has made an auspicious beginning. But the removal of Machado is only a first step. Far more complex problems lie ahead. Mr. Welles's desire to return to Washington and begin work on the agenda for the Seventh Pan-American Conference, to be held in Montevideo this fall, is understandable, but nothing he might accomplish through his contribution to better inter-American relations would be comparable to a satisfactory solution of the Cuban tangle. Moreover, the choice of his successor at Havana is highly unfortunate. Mr. Caffery was disclosed, at the hearings of the Senate Committee on Finance in January, 1932, as playing an active part while United States Minister to Colombia in promoting the granting of the great Barco oil concession to the Mellon-owned Gulf Petroleum Company and the Carib syndicate, controlled by the Morgans, and in negotiating directly with the National City Bank for a private loan to the Colombian government. It was brought out that Secretary Mellon had counseled President Olaya Herrera to "settle pending questions on petroleum," and that when Colombia had done that, "there will be opened for Colombia . . . ample ways . . . for its financial restoration." The Colombian Congress had canceled the Barco concession. The Mellon-Morgan interests, having acquired a claim to the 500,000-acre oil-land domain from the Doherty group, were bringing pressure to bear on the Colombian government. Mr. Caffery was the chief implement in their efforts. Meanwhile the National City Bank was finding "technical" excuses for not proceeding with a promised credit of $4,000,000. Here again Mr. Caffery acted as intermediary, personally taking part in the negotiations with the officials of the bank. Francis White, Assistant Secretary of State at that time, likewise active in achieving the results desired by the interested groups, testified that there was no connection between the oil and banking transactions. But the State Department refused to allow Mr. Caffery to appear before the Senate committee for questioning or to submit for its use the correspondence between him and the department, and between him and the National City Bank officials.

The collusion of State Department and bankers in Cuba contains the key to many of the problems that have harassed that island republic. What the United States requires above all else in Cuba is an ambassador who does not by training and tradition tend to view the relations of those two countries in terms of concessions and bankers' opportunities. To solve Cuba's problems in human terms will be more conducive to a new entente between the United States and its southern neighbors than the hollow formalities and resounding verbiage based on unrealities which have characterized Pan-American conferences in the past.

Issues and Men

Fiorello H. La Guardia

WHAT manner of man is this La Guardia who has been nominated for mayor of New York? This is the question I encounter at every turn. Not unnaturally people all over the country are interested in the man whom the local reform forces have picked to head the fusion movement against Tammany in this critical year in our nation's history. What happens in the metropolis in the next two years will be enormously important and may even influence deeply the conduct of other municipalities. The city's financial situation is critical. If times do not improve, the keeping alive of foodless and workless citizens will become a problem transcending every other. Never did New York more greatly need a statesman and a man with tolerance, broad vision, and a kindly heart in the mayor's chair. A bigot, or a reactionary, or just a plain stupid man like the present Tammany mayor, John P. O'Brien, might do infinite harm.

Let it be said at once that Mr. La Guardia, or Major, or Congressman La Guardia if you prefer one of these titles, is not a conventional person. Those who think that the greatest city of America should be presided over by a highly educated and sophisticated person of the type of Seth Low or Nicholas Murray Butler will not be satisfied with the choice of Mr. La Guardia. He is short—quite short—rotund, and his personal appearance shows his Italian origin. If elected he will not shine, as did the last reform mayor of New York, John Purroy Mitchel, in the salon of General and Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt. But Fiorello La Guardia will never for one moment be out of touch with or fail to understand the humble people of New York City and their needs, for he is himself as much a self-made man as is Al Smith. He too was born in New York, but he got part of his limited education in Prescott, Arizona. At the age of nineteen he was employed in the American consulates at Budapest and Trieste. When he was twenty-two he was appointed American consular agent at Fiume, where he served for two years. He then returned to New York and for three years served as interpreter at Ellis Island, where he certainly must have learned many lessons in the way a government should not treat those who enter its doors.

Meanwhile the young interpreter was studying law at New York University, beginning his law practice in 1910. Five years later he became deputy attorney-general of the State and was a member of the Sixty-Fifth Congress in 1917. He is one of the few members of the House of Representatives who, after having voted the country into the war, had the simple decency to go abroad and offer themselves as targets for the bullets to which they had condemned the flower of our youth. It is hard to think of La Guardia as a flying officer. He began as a first lieutenant and was promoted, not for political reasons but for efficiency, to be captain and then major commanding the American flying force which was attached to night and day bombing squadrons on the Italian front. He came back from the war without any illusions, knowing perfectly well that it was not what it seemed and determined to do his best to make the post bellum world a liberal as well as a better one. Since his return to Congress his whole career has been a fighting one. He has been ridiculed, jeered at, lied about. He has been called a little Italian crook and a cheap politician. Big business has hated him as it has hated few men in Congress. But year in and year out he gamely fought his fight, and before his defeat for reelection, after fourteen years of service, won recognition as about the most efficient Congressman in protesting against Hooverism and the sale of government to the big-business interests.

Naturally he made mistakes. Often he seemed to go off half-cocked and then sometimes time would catch up with him and demonstrate the correctness of the positions he had taken. It is frankly to be confessed that he did not do very well when he ran for mayor in 1929 on the fusion ticket. The vote that he got in 1929 was almost the lowest ever polled by an anti-Tammany fusion candidate. But as we said then, so we say now: subject to certain political limitations, he has been a genuine progressive, has usually had the courage of his convictions, has been sound on questions of war and peace, and has repeatedly shown a readiness to sacrifice his career for his beliefs. He once even ran for Congress on the Socialist ticket when the Republicans refused to renominate him because of his independence—and he won.

Personally, it has seemed to me that the best leader for the fusion forces would have been Norman Thomas—I do not believe that La Guardia will quarrel with me for saying so. But I am heartily for the Major's election because I believe that he will bring to the mayoralty what it most needs—a warm heart inspired by the opportunity to serve the common people. I hope he realizes that the city of New York is not going to be redeemed by merely giving it another good reform administration; there must be radical changes in the charter and the form of the city governmental structure, and above all we must have proportional representation, which is now being urged by many who have hitherto failed to see how necessary that change has become. I feel sure he will be a far better candidate this year; for one thing the situation is vastly more favorable.

Finally, let me tell my readers that there would have been no fusion ticket at all if it had not been for a singularly fine, able, fearless, and devoted citizen of New York, Charles C. Burlingham. If any man deserves the title of the First Citizen of this municipality, it is Mr. Burlingham. If there is any good liberal cause which has not had his aid and support, I should like to know what it is. Only his age and his modesty, I believe, prevented his being compelled to be a candidate himself. Isn't it wicked that when there are Americans of this admirable type we get so damnably few of them into our public life?

Quincy Garrison Kilgore

Drawn by Massaguer

"No sir! We're not through yet!"

Cuba Cleans House

By HUBERT HERRING

Havana, August 19

THEY are cleaning house in Havana, and no one is sure what will be found in cellar and attic. The housecleaning began last Saturday when the guns of Cabañas boomed out the presidential salute to Carlos Manuel de Cespedes, provisional President of the Republic of Cuba. The robust crowd sacked the lower floor of the presidential palace, tore up shrubs and trees, paraded the streets, yelling, crying, with the abandon of release after eight dreary years. Crowds sacked the houses of Machado's henchmen, throwing furniture, bedding, dishes, books, pianos, everything into the streets. The offices and plant of the Heraldo de Cuba, Machado's newspaper, were gutted. All day long the crowd surged and roared, laughed and sang. When the sun sank, the name of Machado had been wiped from the city. The Avenida del Presidente Machado was baptized with a new name—Avenida Rubiera, in honor of a student martyr. On the granite shaft erected to Machado's honor students had carved a new dedication—To the Victims of Machado.

It was a housecleaning day, brutal, riotous, violent. Eighteen persons dead, ninety wounded, twenty-eight houses sacked, eight burned. Machado and four accomplices had flown to Nassau in the afternoon. Porristas, members of that terror squad which had become a byword of horror, were tracked down and shot like rats. The sun went down. The real housecleaning had not yet begun.

Carlos Manuel de Cespedes must be a good patriot to accept the job. He did not take it for his own comfort or for his own profit, if I am to judge from my knowledge of the man himself or from the reports of those who have known him for thirty years. I have just interviewed him. Cespedes is modest, unassuming, thoughtful. He has done good service in the diplomatic corps, serving in Spain, Mexico, and the United States. He is the son of the great Cuban liberator, a man of wealth and culture, and a patriot. He comes to office with the support of practically all parties to the conflict. He looks with genuine eagerness to the contribution of the younger men of Cuba—to the A. B. C., to the students. Whether he is strong enough to dominate the situation and to lead all factions, remains to be seen.

The balance sheet, moral and political, is mixed. Certain elements can be counted upon to support a peaceful and constructive solution. First, the army. Dominated by a group of young and imaginative men, its leaders are loyal to the new regime. How far and how deeply this loyalty permeates the lower ranks of the army is another question. Second, the A. B. C. This organization, whose members were hounded and murdered a few weeks ago, is the dominant political factor in Cuba. Stores are decorated with its banners. Its slogans are on everyone's lips. It is credited with a major share of the responsibility for the peaceful overthrow of the Machado regime. Third, the university professors and many students. The professors are an intelligent and imaginative group. The students, vital and headstrong, are a grand lot, and if the new government gives them enough to do and plays fairly with them, they will make a robust contribution to the housecleaning of Cuba. Fourth, the accumulated fury and outraged moral sense of the Cuban people, which will for a time at least back up the new government in establishing order.

Certain elements can be counted as definitely dangerous. First, Menocal and his followers. From the outset General Menocal has opposed the mediation of Mr. Welles. He envisaged a crusade, with himself astride a white horse charging the tyrant. Menocal counts upon the short memories of the Cuban people and believes that they have forgotten how expertly he looted and tyrannized. If the stars do not deceive, he will do what he can to block the development of the mediation so hopefully started by Mr. Welles, and the constitutional reforms which must spring from that mediation. Second, the politicians—good, bad, and worst. The reorganization of the old parties is under way. The conservatives will emerge with considerable strength. The control of the Liberal Party will be fought for by several contenders, among them Alfred Hornedo, wealthy owner of El Pais, sensational daily paper, and Miguel Mariano Gómex, ex-mayor of Havana and one of the more reputable politicians. Cuba is long on politicians and they will have their innings. Third, some labor agitators. The strike of the harbor workers is still on, badly crippling the economic life of Cuba. Unfortunately, Machado's policy made the emergence of effective unions impossible, and what little organizing has been done has been secret. Well-informed observers say there are only a few hundred active Communists in Cuba, but they have positions of trust in the few unions which exist. They are so placed as to create the maximum of confusion. They are doing it today in Havana, Cienfuegos, Santiago, and Manzanillo.

The President has appointed his Cabinet. It represents all sectors of the opposition and is made up of men of honesty and a high average of ability. The chief criticism is that they are for the most part untried men, that they are without political experience. But they are untainted by the bad records of the previous administration and several are men of intelligence and proved leadership. All in all, it is probably the most honest Cabinet that Cuba has ever had. As these lines are written, no indications of a future national program can be discerned. The new Cabinet is busily cleaning out the worst of the Machado deadwood and rotten wood. With the life of the island utterly demoralized, with most of the larger municipalities without legally appointed or elected leaders, it will have its hands full restoring peace.

First and most pressing among the problems just ahead is finance. At this writing no one knows what the balance sheet of Cuba will reveal. It is estimated that Cuba can count on a national income of about $42,000,000. Of this amount almost $12,000,000 is earmarked for service on the external debt. In addition there is a floating debt—unpaid salaries to soldiers, police, and teachers—of not less than $50,000,000. Salaries, current and delinquent, must be paid. This means the necessity of a relief loan if the country is to be saved from bankruptcy and the threat of anarchy. From whom will this loan come? From the banks—presumably the Chase Bank, which already holds the heaviest end of the sack? The leaders of the A. B. C. and others insist that Cuba cannot be further mortgaged. Or will the American government make the necessary advances, and if so, what will be the terms? The new controlling group in Cuba is afraid of loans. They talk frankly of notifying the banks that in line with the spirit of these times Cuba will entertain the idea of scaling down its debts and postponing payments. There seems to be encouragement from Washington for this.

Second, there is the question of relief through preferential tariffs on sugar and quotas for Cuban sugar. Nothing definite has been suggested.

Third, the continuation of the mediation so intelligently launched by Mr. Welles and so wantonly blocked by Mr. Machado. The American Ambassador will use his influence in carrying this process on in an orderly and legal fashion. There is no Congress for the simple reason that most of the congressmen and senators fear to show their faces in the streets. Yet there must be a Congress if constitutional reforms are to be proposed, and if a constituent assembly is to be summoned. Mr. Welles, according to some critics, is overzealous for correct legal machinery, but I question whether Cuba can safely ignore the virtues of orderliness. A republic which has suffered under Machado's bad housekeeping needs the self-imposed discipline of rigorously observed constitutional procedure.

It is too soon to prophesy the course of events for the next few months. The government faces conflicting and merciless political enmities, widespread labor disturbances, a disorganized country. Its new leaders are, by and large, men of intelligence, imagination, and integrity. They may win. It is also entirely possible that the furies now released after the long tyranny of Machado may create new and more serious disorder. Menocal may disrupt the scene by playing the conquering hero, or Gómez and Hornedo may set loose new furies by battling for the control of Havana. There is plenty of powder, and any spark may set it off. There may be a peaceful solution and an orderly restoration of constitutional procedure, or there may be anarchy. At the end of the road there is always the specter of American intervention. Mr. Welles has done conspicuous service in avoiding it thus far. It is to be hoped that he can continue to avoid it. Cuba lies in the lap of the gods and of the American Ambassador. The gods are probably reliable and Mr. Welles has proved his worth, but who comes next? Mr. Welles is scheduled for another post. Appointments to the American Embassy in Havana must be watched.

Johnson and the Freedom of the Press

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, August 19

IF you are tired of reading about NRA, codes, reemployment agreements, and the Blue Eagle, turn to another page. It is true that Frances Perkins, Harold Ickes, Henry Wallace, George Peek, David Lilienthal, and Professor Moley are busy with a number of important matters, but my current knowledge does not equip me to write about them. All my days and too many of my nights are spent on General Hugh Johnson's doorstep, and this letter will be limited strictly to information acquired there. Perhaps it will be proper, first of all, to tell the true story of the "newspaper code," partly because this will be its first appearance in type, and partly because the decent publishers of the country—and there are some—should be interested in learning precisely how they were represented here. The committee consisted of Howard Davis of New York, chairman; Amon Carter of Fort Worth; and John Stewart Bryan of Richmond. Their counsel was Elisha Hanson, a Washington attorney whose firm distinguished itself a few years ago by lobbying against the late Senator Tom Walsh's resolution for a Senate investigation of the power trust, and was conspicuously successful during the Mellon regime in obtaining tax refunds for wealthy clients. A noble representation of the vaunted guardians of our liberty—if you don't believe it look them over once more!

• • • • •

THEY presented to Johnson a proposed "code" which undoubtedly was the most dishonest, weasel-worded, and treacherous document that ever reached his desk. It was loaded with all sorts of exemptions and jokers, all carefully designed to enable the newspapers to escape the obligations which their editorial pages were clamorously urging all other employers to assume. Compared with it the codes proposed by the steel and coal barons were charters of liberty and enlightenment. After reading this masterpiece Johnson was so incensed that he instructed his legal department to draft a code for the newspapers, which was done. Meantime, however, the patriotic publishers endeavored to give Johnson the rush act by publishing front-page stories in hundreds of papers announcing that they had "signed the newspaper code," thus endeavoring to implant a belief in the public mind that such a code existed. For some strange reason Johnson's prompt denial received very little publicity, although the rejection of codes proposed by other industries had been thoroughly reported. The publishers' committee was instructed to return. I am not entirely sure whose brilliant idea it was to have Jim Farley call up Johnson and "give him the works," but it was a perfect illustration of the attitude taken and the methods employed by the committee. There are many officials in Washington who would yield at a word from Farley, but the redoubtable General is about the last who would occur to me in that connection. Actually, as any reporter on the ground could have told them, Big Jim gave the committee the old run-around in glorious fashion. He called Johnson, told of the request which had been made, explained that he wished to be able to say that he had kept his promise, passed the time of day, and hung up the receiver. When the committee returned and found itself confronted with the code drafted here, it immediately raised a howl about the "freedom of the press" being threatened. Personally, I am unacquainted with that section of the federal Constitution which guarantees newspapers the right to engage in unfair competition. The freedom of the press, of course, is that of expression, not exploitation. Patiently, but in vain, Johnson and Chief Counsel Richberg explained to the committee that the Constitution had not been repealed by the recovery act, and that if it had, it could not be restored through a provision in a code. Finally, the official in charge of the job drafted a burlesque provision which asserted, in effect, that nothing in the code should be construed as modifying, qualifying, amending, or repealing the Bill of Rights. The publishers accepted it with solemn expressions of satisfaction, one even remarking that it was better than the provision in their original code. Whereupon, the code drafted at NRA headquarters (actually a modified version of the President's temporary blanket reemployment agreement) was accepted. Whereupon, hundreds of daily newspapers printed announcements stating that they had signed a code which was "along the general lines of" the publishers' original proposal! Thank God for honest journalism!

* * * * *

JOHNSON was right when he prophesied recently that "the air around here will soon be full of dead cats." It is an odd coincidence that they began to fly just about the time he rejected the original newspaper code. It is also interesting to note that the sniping was begun by the Washington Post, recently purchased by Eugene Meyer, and hailed at the time as the future "official organ" of the moribund Republican Party. In the Post the chief sniping assignment apparently has been intrusted to a columnist named Carlisle Barger, who is supposed to be especially close to the proprietor. Barger is a wisecracking clodhopper from the Georgia savannahs, who employs a semi-literate style that is vaguely amusing. Although unknown outside the capital, he commands a considerable following among government clerks and housewives, and he has concentrated his fire on the recovery program with remarkable persistence. His knowledge of economics is simply and fully told by his recent assertion that he was opposed to national planning on the ground that "I don't want no government bureaucrat telling me what I must eat and wear." It is hardly necessary to mention the scurrilous—and wholly fictitious—story in which a New York tabloid reported Johnson in the act of crashing the doors of a Washington speakeasy, accompanied by several men and women. It was promptly and ignominiously retracted. When hearings are begun on a permanent code for newspapers, we may expect to hear renewed yells about the "freedom of the press," but I think they will fall on unresponsive ears. Newspapers have exactly the same right to claim immunity from the provisions of the national recovery act as they have to defy municipal building and fire regulations.

* * * * *

MEANTIME, steel is exhibiting the same invincible stupidity which it has always exhibited; coal has proved, in the fields dominated by Mellon and the Steel Corporation, that it is incorrigible; Henry Ford—who for a time deluded the public into regarding him as a great altruist, although in fact he is perhaps the most ruthless and avaricious of all large employers in this country—is almost certain to be a bad actor; and the President and Johnson have been compelled by the recalcitrance and greed of the oil producers to prescribe a code for that industry. The fight isn't over. Indeed, it probably is just beginning, but there are real grounds for optimism. Through the organizing genius of John Lewis the names of approximately 340,000 coal miners have been added to the rolls of the United Mine Workers in recent weeks—an almost incredible feat. The President's new Labor Board, despite the absence of Senator Wagner, has had remarkable success in settling strikes pending the adoption of codes, and I deem it significant that one of them—the strike of full-fashioned-hosiery workers in Pennsylvania—was terminated by a direct appeal to the employers by Gerard Swope. A labor member of the board is authority for the statement that no one but Swope could have induced the employers to accept the settlement that was made.

* * * * *

LIKE Johnson (and, apparently, unlike the editors of The Nation) I expect to shed very few tears over the poor employer who is about to be boycotted because he is paying less than fourteen dollars for forty hours' work. If he is able and refuses to pay it he is a contemptible chiseler who deserves almost anything that happens to him. If he is unable to pay it he is an economic incompetent who has no place in a sound system. Wouldn't it be a pretty state of affairs if the economic life of the entire nation had to be pitched on a plane inhabited by its most incompetent members? Nobody protested more bitterly than I against the atrocities perpetrated by patrioteers during the war. I have no difficulty in recalling the narrow margin by which I escaped with my life after testifying against the ringleaders of a mob which had lynched a half-witted German coal miner in southern Illinois. Such things were unnecessary and barbarous. This is different. There was never any question about who would win the war after we entered it, but there is a very serious question about whether we can end this depression before revolution breaks out. When ten million men have been without jobs for three years and are asking themselves whether they will ever work again, when they have seen their women fade and their babies wither and die, when they have seen their boys turn to thievery and their girls to prostitution, it strikes me as a poor time to play dilettante over the classical ideals of Jeffersonian democracy. Frankly, as one who enjoys a fairly comfortable place in the present system, I do not fancy the prospect of finding myself out in the woods fighting with the squirrels for acorns this winter. Perhaps it is unfortunate, but the fact remains that a hungry man can derive very little nourishment from the Bill of Rights. I have been present more than once when the troops "took over," and I can assure others that it is not a pleasant spectacle. If anyone wants a difficult task, let him try to persuade an infantryman under company orders that he is violating the Constitution. No, having inhaled my share of tear gas, I much prefer the Blue Eagle. I am willing to waive some of my precious individual liberties temporarily if it will help to feed the starving. And I shall remain firm in my obstinate conviction that Ickes, Perkins, Wallace, Richberg, Wolman, McGrady, Lewis, Berry, and General Johnson have not sold out to the Interests. So-o-o, if a brick is heaved through some window that does not fly the Eagle, don't expect this grizzled old agitator to lead the protest.

EVERY observer with an ounce of perception realizes that only the defeat of Hoover and the promise of a new deal saved this country from much graver disorders last winter. If I know anything about homo Americanus he will not endure another winter like the last without causing serious trouble. The question is not whether we are going to live under a perfectly administered democracy, but whether we are going to live. Therefore counsels of perfection seem singularly inappropriate at this time. It is easy to understand and respect the attitude of the Communist who honestly—and maybe correctly—believes that the success of the recovery program will postpone the revolution another fifty years. As one who not only prefers change by evolution, but believes it is better adapted to the American temperament and American institutions, I simply cannot fathom the mental processes of “liberals” who roost in their ivory towers and throw rotten eggs at the show because they don’t like the color of the leading man’s eyes. Such an attitude seems slightly neurotic. It might do some of these people good to climb down from their gilded perches and take a jaunt through the sordid “shanty towns” of Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, and St. Louis, where thousands of human beings for years have been living like animals on scraps salvaged from garbage cans. After all, I seem to remember that we tried rugged individualism under Herbert Hoover. But why continue? Anatole France put the whole thing in a sentence when he said: “Every man has a sacred right to sleep under a bridge—it is only the poor who exercise it.”

Lawyers and the Depression

By JAMES P. GIFFORD

“I’VE been in practice since 1920. My income has been cut in two but I must keep up a front. The world loves a winner. I’ve made some reductions in overhead but my chief effort has been to reduce my living expenses. We lawyers have been hard hit but we can’t outwardly show our troubles. Even though fees have gone down, I’ll take municipal-court cases now that I’d have scorned in 1928. My real-estate work has disappeared. Other collections are very slow. The lawyer comes in last for payment.” That is the substance of what was told me early in June of this year by a lawyer who has practiced in Brooklyn for thirteen years. It is typical for the entire country.

Although some of the large offices in New York City have continued to pay bonuses and some have given slight increases in pay, others have stopped bonuses entirely and cut pay as much as 15 per cent. But that is a long way from 50 per cent. The most important factor in maintaining income seems to be reputation. The legal unit which is favorably known, be it large office, small office, or individual, is finding itself able to keep fairly close to former levels of income because of the flood of new work which has offset the decline in the old. There is a well-known saying in the profession that during the first fifteen years of your practice clients come to you because they are looking for a lawyer. After that they are looking for you. The individual practitioner who is still “just another lawyer” has been particularly hard hit. His steady clients have less business. They tend to impose on a long-established relationship. The new business, most of it urgent litigation, goes to the well-known lawyer; or the new clients shop around to see who will do the work most cheaply. Lawyers in practice for from five to ten years have to meet the competition of young attorneys just starting in who are willing to take anything for what it will bring. One does not have to surmise this. Although there was no marked decrease in membership in the Association of the Bar of the City of New York during the years 1930 to 1932, and the number of members dropped was negligible, the net gain in membership in the New York County Lawyers’ Association, a group far more typical of the bar as a whole, runs as follows: 1929, 288; 1930, 274;

1931, 191; 1932, 3. Members dropped from the latter association for non-payment of dues numbered 175 (estimated) in 1932 and 523 in 1933. Figures for earlier years are not available. The membership of the other association suffered also, although the figures are not as striking. In 1928, 19 were dropped, 6 were reinstated, and 38 resigned; in 1929, 11 were dropped, all were reinstated, and 25 resigned; in 1930, 5 were dropped, all were reinstated, and 38 resigned; but in 1931, 18 were dropped, none reinstated, and 42 resigned; and in 1932, 16 were dropped, none reinstated, and 88 resigned. When a lawyer is willing to drop out of an association whose annual dues run from $50, in the case of the Association of the Bar, to $15 in the case of the New York County Lawyers’ Association, and forgo the excellent library facilities which they afford, he is doing so because he has to.

The situation is not confined to New York City. The American Bar Association, whose membership covers the entire country, dropped 604 members for non-payment of dues in 1926-27; 780 in 1927-28; 686 in 1928-29; and 629 in 1929-30. In 1930-31 the figure jumped to 2,048 dropped members and continued high in 1931-32, 1,778 members being dropped in that year. This last figure does not lose its significance even in the face of an increase in membership during that year of over 2,200 due to an intensive membership campaign. Figures from various State bar associations reflect the same condition. In 1931 the secretary of the Illinois State Bar Association said in his report: “Unfortunately the economic conditions of the country have been reflected in the payment of dues, and although we have used the same methods as in former years, our collections have fallen down over a thousand dollars from last year.” This was a drop of nearly 20 per cent. In Iowa the dues collected by the State association in 1931 were also 20 per cent less than in 1928. In Kansas the number of members paying annual dues promptly in 1926 was 425; in 1927, 495; in 1928, 522; in 1929, 403; in 1930, 353; in 1931, 372; in 1932, 338. In Massachusetts dues collected dropped over $1,000 from 1929 to 1932, about 19 per cent. The Michigan Association received $900 less in dues in 1930-31 than in 1928-29, a drop of 13 per cent. In New Jersey the loss was 19 per cent. Without further wearying figures, it is apparent that the economic effect of the depression on lawyers has been fairly uniform throughout the country.

No one is surprised that the lawyer's income has suffered. That is universal. What has been the effect of the depression on the kind of work he is doing? Up to 1890, and for many generations before that, the typical lawyer earned most of his income from property transfers, contracts, collection of debts, and the administration of estates with the litigation incidental thereto. As James G. Rogers points out in the American Bar Association Journal, the lawyer's reputation depended chiefly upon his appearance in court in some dramatic case either civil or criminal. After 1890, as Mr. Rogers shows, various agencies began to cut into the lawyer's field. Title companies took over the searching of titles. Workmen's compensation began to eliminate litigation over industrial accidents. Summary trial, probation, and penal boards are removing much of the importance of the defense of criminals. Practice in taxation matters and before the Interstate Commerce Commission has fallen into the hands of specialists. The bank and trust company has threatened to poach on the sacred fields of the drafting and probating of wills. Gilbert said, "The policeman's lot is not a happy one." Neither is the average lawyer's. Every bar association has its committee on the unlawful practice of the law whose energies are wholly devoted to rolling back the tide which threatens what was once a monopoly. Bitter wrath is directed against collection agencies. Banks and trust companies are handled more diplomatically but they are "urged to cooperate" and to leave to the lawyer the field which is "properly" his. The truth of the matter is that this tendency to specialize is a step in the direction of efficiency, and the time is coming when lawyers will in all probability deliberately select a limited field of legal work shortly after entering practice and confine themselves to that.

To offset these inroads on the traditional work of the lawyer, attorneys in the larger urban centers began to assume the role of advisers to large corporations, and their practice became very lucrative. Litigation has never produced the huge sums which trusts, holding companies, utilities, and large corporations have been willing to pay for the legal supervision necessitated by issues of corporate securities. From 1900 to October, 1929, many scores of large offices all over the country were deriving increasing income from this type of work. The crash killed it. These large clients continued to employ the big offices for general business advice, but in many instances the sizable monthly retainer was dropped or materially reduced and the corporation hired some junior lawyer (frequently from the very office which had been its general counsel) and retained the big firm only for important matters where prestige or a large personnel was essential. To many large offices this has been a serious blow. In the height of the good years, 1927 to 1928, they enlarged their staffs and moved into new and more expensive quarters on long leases. It is likely that the partners of many large firms are having a relatively slim time.

Many of these large firms which prior to 1929 were content to operate with small litigation departments have welcomed the great increase in litigation which has followed the crash. Many cases which formerly would have been farmed out as too small are now handled for whatever modest fee they may bring. One large office which in 1929 had a litigation department of four now has eleven lawyers engaged in that field. Litigation has been a life saver not only for many large offices but for lawyers of all types. One specialist in this field with a fine reputation said that his regular office work had dropped off so much that if it had not been for the increase in litigation work which his reputation brought him, his income would have been seriously curtailed. Lawyers everywhere are going to court. Men of experience who formerly left petty cases for their junior clerks to sharpen their teeth on are appearing in the municipal courts, glad to get a chance to do something. Much of the litigation is petty. Although the number of new cases added in the Trial Term of the Supreme Court of New York County increased as follows: 1928, 4,407 new cases; 1929, 5,240; 1930, 6,855; 1931, 7,539; and 1932, 7,486, the cases in the Municipal Court increased as follows: 1928, 406,948 summons issued; 1929, 435,825; 1930, 491,449 (an increase of 55,624); and 1931, 498,685. Many lawyers tell me that the need of money on the part both of clients and of themselves has hastened settlement. Quick settlement means quick cash for the client and a quick fee for the lawyer.

Another lucrative source of income which has dried up for the average lawyer is real-property transfers. No mortgage money is available. Foreclosures have increased but they are not lucrative. Many lawyers whose chief work was in real estate are in desperate straits. All they can look to is foreclosures, summary proceedings evicting tenants, and suits for rent. These are dead dogs. Incidentally, in the Municipal Court of New York City, summary proceedings for eviction increased from 104,048 cases in 1928 to 203,271 in 1931. The 1932 figures are not yet available. The amount of suffering these cases involved is difficult to picture. Assuming four individuals to be affected by each eviction, 814,000 people were thrown out of their homes, a situation which it seems only some sort of cooperative effort can prevent in the future.

Some of the decrease in income is the fault of lawyers themselves. Unmindful of their own best interests, they have allowed court calendars to become clogged with automobile-accident cases. The result has been that it takes from three to four years for a jury case to be reached. Commercial clients with contract cases have become exasperated at the long delay and have resorted to arbitration, usually before their own trade-association boards. Within trades, forms of contract have become standardized and usually contain compulsory-arbitration clauses. A strong movement is on foot to have all automobile-accident cases handled before commissioners. This would clear the courts. But the commercial cases may never return if merchants find that arbitration before their trade associations is both rapid and fair. Although the field of commercial work has been narrowed considerably by the recession in business activity, it seems to have been increasing in recent weeks, and many a thoughtful lawyer must be gnashing his teeth at the inertia of the bar, which has been the main reason for the disappearance of much of this work. Although this source of irritation is not a peculiar manifestation of the depression, its effects are most heavily felt in such times as these.

A time of depression is, of course, a time of business reorganization—and, to make the picture of the situation accurate, one of my colleagues tells me that the past three years have been unusually prosperous ones for many of his acquaintances in the profession. Even bankruptcies and receiverships have brought some measure of prosperity to some lawyers. Some offices have been so active in this field that only recently two attempts have been made in the Southern District of New York to prevent the Irving Trust Company from retaining what one protesting group called "a corporate monopoly in federal receiverships." There is little doubt that the income of many New York lawyers has been greatly curtailed through a natural tendency on the part of the trust company to limit the number of attorneys engaged in this work. A corporate receiver does not retain counsel by parceling out the jobs alphabetically from the telephone book. And if an important law firm gets a lemon the first time, the next good job will be assigned to that firm to average up. Fair enough. But meanwhile the forgotten men howl. These conditions will probably remain local unless the practice of appointing trust companies as receivers and trustees in bankruptcy becomes more general.

The effect of the depression on the morale of the profession is best evidenced by the increase of that unfortunate fringe, relatively quite small, who get into trouble and are disciplined. In the First Department, New York, twenty-nine and twenty-seven members of the bar were disciplined in 1931 and 1932. Only fifteen were punished in 1928. The 1929 and 1930 figures will not serve as a basis of comparison because the high figures of twenty-five and eighty-one during these years represent the result of the drive against ambulance chasing. The grievance committee of the Association of the Bar and the clerks of the Appellate Division concur in the opinion that a larger number of lawyers are in trouble and that they seem to be willing to risk their careers for smaller sums. In order that the lay reader may not exaggerate the extent of wickedness among our brothers let me remind him that there are between 10,000 and 15,000 lawyers in New York City. The percentage of delinquency is very small.

The depression has confronted some of the large offices with a peculiar situation. In times of prosperity the big office could handle the legal affairs of many large clients whose interests were closely allied. In times of bankruptcy and receiverships, interests formerly harmonious suddenly have, in many instances, become sharply conflicting. The chief partner of a large firm may make serious and conscientious efforts to compromise these conflicts, but consciously or unconsciously the interests of the largest client and of the one whose relationship is likely to be of most permanent value begin to dominate the situation. Then professional ethics, conscience, plain common sense, or the client himself requires that a new attorney be brought in to represent each conflicting claim. Many attorneys feel that this is a wholesome situation and that it will be a factor in restoring more independence to the individual lawyer. It may possibly have this effect. I am somewhat skeptical. A return to better times will again bring important groups with allied interests under the same roof. The present situation, even if temporary, is embarrassing to the large firms but a godsend to many an able individual lawyer.

It is extremely difficult to determine whether lawyers in certain regions have been worse hit than in others. In my attempt to discover some facts I used two sources of information. First, I took figures showing the increase in new cases handled by the various legal-aid bureaus. It seems probable that an increase in cases handled by these agencies means that the particular community is having a hard time and therefore the lawyer is suffering also. But it is possible that such an increase means that legal activity has generally increased in that community and that the lawyers are getting an increased share of it. Certainly the latter seems to be true in New York City although the increase in litigation going to lawyers seems to be offset by the loss of other types of legal work, such as real estate, commercial work, and the like. On the whole, to use the increase in legal-aid cases as an index of lawyers' prosperity seems unsatisfactory, yet it is included for what it is worth.

The total number of new cases handled by legal-aid bureaus throughout the entire country from 1920 on shows a fairly normal rate of increase up to 1929, the percentage dropping off in 1924, 1927, and 1929.

Year	New Cases	Percentage of Increase over Year Preceding
1920	96,034	—
1921	111,404	15
1922	130,585	17
1923	150,234	15
1924	121,177	—19
1925	143,653	18
1926	152,214	6
1927	142,535	—6
1928	165,817	16
1929	171,961	3.7
1930	217,643	26
1931	227,471	4.5

The jump of 26 per cent in 1930 tells a story in itself. If, because of the small percentage of increase of 1929 over 1928 (3.7 per cent), we average these two years, we find that the increase in 1930 over the average for 1928 and 1929 is 28 per cent and that the increase in 1931 over the 1928-29 average is 34 per cent. Taking these five percentages, 3.7, 26, 4.5, 28, and 34, as a measuring stick and comparing them with the percentages of increase in legal-aid work in various cities we can say roughly that conditions generally were bad at the end of 1931 in Atlanta, Baltimore, Bridgeport (Connecticut), Cincinnati, Detroit, Louisville, Pittsburgh, Providence, Reading, Rochester (New York), San Francisco, and Springfield (Massachusetts). They were below average in Denver and Philadelphia. They were average in Albany, Cambridge (Massachusetts), Chicago, Cleveland, and St. Paul. They were about average in Boston, Grand Rapids, Michigan, Kansas City, and New York, although trouble seems to have hit Kansas City as early as 1928. By average is meant average conditions for 1931.

It seems that a better check on conditions for lawyers is to be found in the figures showing membership in the American Bar Association in various States during the years 1928 to 1932 inclusive. It must be remembered that the association put on an intensive membership campaign in 1932 which was responsible for a general increase in membership. Yet certain States show a decrease in membership even during that year. The States fall into four groups. The first group includes those in which the decline in membership continued into the year 1932, namely, Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana (which had the same membership in 1932 and 1931), Nebraska, North Carolina, Oregon, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, and Washington. Eleven of these are predominantly agricultural, three are given to cattle raising, one is a mining State, and one a manufacturing State. Group two includes States where the trend in decrease in membership ended in 1931 and includes Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming. The foregoing are predominantly agricultural with the exception of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, which are industrial, and Nevada, whose chief industries are mining and divorces (since we are thinking of lawyers).

Group three consists of States or territories in which the trend was upward in membership from 1928 or 1929 to 1931 and 1932: Alaska, California, District of Columbia, Delaware, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island (slight increase), and Vermont. Missouri is the only predominantly agricultural area in this group. Group four, including Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, and Wisconsin, showed no definite trend one way or the other. It seems obvious that the agricultural regions have been hit the hardest. But that is no news. Most research results in finding out what one knew before one started.

What of the future? Two aspects of the future, which are closely related to each other, seem worthy of emphasis. One is the effect of the depression on the group which is now getting or about to get its legal education. The other is the effect hard times will have on the existing bar. As to whether the bar is at present overcrowded, opinions vary. Dean Young B. Smith of the Columbia Law School, in an address before the New Jersey State Bar Association in January, 1932, said: "Such evidence as is available indicates that there are about twice as many new lawyers admitted annually as are needed." Philip J. Wickser, in an interesting paper published in the April issue of the American Law School Review, concludes that although there are areas in which the bar is congested, the bar as a whole is probably not overcrowded. Even if it is, the effect of overcrowding will probably not be felt in the law schools to any great extent for some time to come. It took several years for the engineering schools to see the results of overcrowding in that profession. The effect of the depression is, however, making itself felt in the law schools. The total registration in the various law schools throughout the country has decreased steadily in the last four years for which figures are available, being 46,397 in 1928, 44,030 in 1929, 40,924 in 1930, and 39,472 in 1931. Yet the registration in the law schools requiring long pre-law-school training has increased during that time from 6,072 in 1928 to 7,453 in 1931. Registration in six of the leading law schools for the past five years was as follows:

1928-29 1929-30 1930-31 1931-32 1932-33

Chicago	460	480	370	340	320
Columbia	638	595	566	555	600
Harvard	1,595	1,640	1,596	1,595	1,509
Michigan	565	568	534	515	506
Pennsylvania	492	514	495	443	415
Yale	339	315	339	318	301

(Figures from the "Annual Review of Legal Education" published by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. See 1932 edition for a complete analysis of the effects of the depression on law-school attendance.)

Moreover, comparative figures for law-school attendance from 1928 to 1931 show a definite trend toward the full-time, approved school. One could doubtless find a similar trend in engineering and medical schools. Young law students or their parents believe in the value of good training. If the present tendency continues, the coming generation of lawyers will be better trained than their predecessors. The change in training has manifested itself most vividly in the leading schools. There the general tendency is to shape instruction in such a way as not only to teach the student what the rules of law are but to encourage him to criticize and evaluate those rules in the light of the effect they have or may have on the general welfare of society. This so-called functional or social approach to the study of law is gaining ground rapidly and will be of tremendous practical importance to the coming generation of lawyers. Each day the news from Washington makes us keenly aware that the New Deal is being, and is going to be, expressed in essentially legal formulas. Persuasion may be the device whereby the business men will be induced to take action, but the final result is to rest on a legal structure far more extensive and far more flexible than anything we have yet seen. The lawyer of the future should be prepared to resume or perhaps assume his place as business adviser. If he is wise he will be more ready to tell his client what the client ought to do than how he can do what he wants to do. The important lawyer of the past generation was a discoverer of loopholes. The great lawyer of tomorrow will more likely be a pilot toward a goal of social strength and harmony. Although this will be the main tendency, we must not forget that every social structure is essentially a compromise between individual liberties and group necessities. This compromise is never static and there need be no fear that individuals will fail to rebel and struggle to maintain their liberties. In that struggle the lawyer, the advocate, will always have a dominant part. The difficulties of the present should tend to strengthen and educate the present generation of young lawyers in self-reliance and independence. The times may breed a group less willing to be subservient to the layman's greedy wish yet equally willing to protect him against oppression and mass domination. It is in soft, fat times that men turn to the worship of Mammon.

Whether older lawyers can adapt themselves to new ideas and changed emphases remains to be seen. Many judges stand as a potential barrier against much that is being attempted. The conservative type of older attorney will continue to carry great weight with the courts. But judges with more flexible minds will write dissenting opinions that will become majority rules in the next twenty years. That is the lesson of the past. Will the generation of relatively young, intelligent, skilful lawyers now in the very thick of things in Washington return in another four, eight, or ten years to cash in on their knowledge and experience as the generation before them did? Quite likely. But the round will continue, and let us hope that the law schools will not lose vision and will not cease to pour into the tide well-trained, intelligent men and women who will continue to work for a better-balanced, more harmonious social order.

[This is the fourth of a series on the effects of the economic crisis on the professions. The fifth, The Artist and the Depression, by Suzanne La Follette, will appear next week.]

The Austerity of George Kelly

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

GEORGE KELLY is something of an anomaly in the contemporary theater. Two of his plays have enjoyed phenomenal runs on Broadway and one of the two won the Pulitzer prize besides. Yet neither of these is as characteristic of the author as others less successful, and it would not be rash to wager that neither is as close to Mr. Kelly's own heart as one or two which the public has classed as failures. Both of his "hits"—"The Show Off" and "Craig's Wife"—richly deserved their popularity. Both were soundly constructed and both were based upon shrewd and honest observation, but each had, in addition, the advantage of belonging to a familiar and popular genre. The first, with a blustering Babbitt for a hero, was a recognizable addition to the growing literature of native satire. The second, which drew at full length the portrait of a hard woman in whom the virtue of being a good housekeeper had become a vice, was typically "modern" in a slightly different way. It illustrated admirably that tendency to "transvaluate values" which Ibsen had introduced into the theater and which, in a somewhat popularized form, one will discover in such typical plays of the recent past as "The Silver Cord" and "Rain." No wonder that Mr. Kelly was set down as a dramatist working in a current tradition and sufficiently of Broadway to find ready acceptance. No wonder, also, that his public was somewhat froissé by the increasing bitterness of "Daisy Mayme" or that it should have been frankly bewildered by the almost mystical tone of "Behold the Bridegroom." Mr. Kelly refused to stay put and was determined to accentuate those aspects of his attitude which were the least familiar and the least acceptable to his audience. He was saying with a calm and cold emphasis: "Make no mistake. I am not of Broadway."

With his latest work in mind it is easy to look back over the earlier plays and to catch in their text ominous hints of this more stern and acrid tone. Even in "The Show Off" there are moments when a certain unexpected bitterness rises momentarily to the surface, as when, for example, the harassed mother hears the remark that her daughter must lie on the bed she has made and replies quite simply: "It's often not the people who make the beds who have to lie on them. It's someone else." A few moments later the observation has been forgotten in the flow of pure fun, but for an instant there has found expression something in the author which would be cynicism if it were not too sternly moralistic to be quite that. Indeed, the whole character of this mother adds to the play an element quite foreign to its dominant tone, for she is a sort of chorus supplying disillusioned comment, prophesying woe, and refusing to enter fully into the easy joy of the rest when good fortune solves all their difficulties.

Even more significant is the one-act play, "Smarty's Party," written long before, during the five years when Mr. Kelly was appearing in vaudeville in playlets of his own composition. Here the story is that of a vulgar adventuress who entangles a young man supposed to be very wealthy, who comes to his supposed mother to enjoy her moment of triumph, and who then is crushed with the information that her victim is not really that woman's son at all. Here Mr. Kelly first delineates with cruel expertness the vulgarity of the adventuress and then, with a kind of savage delight, destroys her utterly. Thus the pattern of the play is exactly the same as the pattern of "Craig's Wife," where another evil woman is analyzed at full length before the author, with an almost sadistic fury, plunges her into a special circle of hell so arranged that her vice will constitute the means by which she is tortured. The heroine of "Smarty's Party" wanted money and got poverty; Craig's wife loved her home so much that she found herself homeless at last.

One cannot help observing that Mr. Kelly's three most bitterly excoriated characters—namely, the two just mentioned and one to be discussed later—are all women. There is in him, therefore, a strain of what one is tempted to call misogyny, but it is not certain that the term would be exactly accurate. He does not seem to be saying that women as a sex are worse than men. He is only saying instead, "Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds," and the key to his temperament is a particular kind of austerity which goes commonly under the name of puritanism. Vulgarity offends him, not only aesthetically but morally as well, and the kind of meanness which he sees most commonly in men and women strikes him always as a sort of vulgarity of the soul. He despises it with a certain cold fury, and his desire is the puritanical desire to see a crushing justice meted out to it. Others may feel that to understand all is to pardon all, but to the puritan that saying is incomprehensible nonsense. To understand all is to hate all—if that "all" be hateful. Each of his most striking heroine-victims is understood with a cruel clarity, but none is pardoned and none, be it noted also, is reformed and then rewarded. All three are cast out instead into outer—and utter—darkness.

It was "Craig's Wife," produced in October, 1925, which won the Pulitzer prize. The next year Kelly produced without great success another acrid study of family life called "Daisy Mayme," but it is "Behold the Bridegroom" (1928) which represents Mr. Kelly's most determined and most nearly successful effort to break completely away from the themes and methods of the contemporary stage in order to give full expression to his underlying attitude.

Drawing by Georges Schreiber

George Kelly

All of Mr. Kelly's other plays are richly overlaid with local color. The immediate effectiveness of all depends in large part upon skilful mimicry and upon the literal realism with which he pictures middle-class American life. Here, however, he departs from his accustomed milieu. Manners are more elegant, characters more self-consciously analytic, and the whole style is more formally literary. But the effect is only to disengage more completely the essential moral problem and to make the discussion of it quite clearly the only raison d'être of the play. Again the hero—if she can be called that—is a woman, but this time her sin is that vulgarity which results from the indulgence of a too facile and too shallow emotional nature. She is smart, sophisticated, and charming. She has moved gracefully from one love affair to another and thinks that she has demonstrated by her success how completely the intelligence may dispense with those simple rules of puritan morality which are never far from Mr. Kelly's mind. But the moment comes when she realizes that she really loves for the first time in her life. And her creator seizes the opportunity to destroy her as he had destroyed Craig's wife. She looks into the bridegroom's eyes, reads there his contempt, and then dies, not so much because of that contempt as because she has realized at last her own emptiness.

Probably most persons were made a little uncomfortable by the mercilessness with which justice was visited upon Mr. Kelly's earlier heroines. Some have even suggested that a more knowing playwright would not have pushed retribution so far as to swing the sympathy of the audience round in the direction of its victim. But it is no mere dramaturgic mistake which is responsible for Mr. Kelly's relentlessness either in the case of "Craig's Wife" or in the case of "Behold the Bridegroom." He must have known very well that the public would not judge the heroine of the latter play so harshly as he did, that there is, as a matter of fact, no sin which this public is more ready to forgive—in fiction at least—than the sin of light love. Indeed, the romantic-sentimental tradition makes it almost the necessary prelude to a grand passion. But Mr. Kelly would not compromise here with his puritan conscience or make any effort to hide his contempt for contemporary morality. His heroine had wasted her capacities on cheap loves, she was not ready when the bridegroom came, and she had forfeited all right to the thing whose value she had come to understand only when it was too late. Hence she awakes, not to be saved, but only in order that she may realize what she has lost. Only thus can the puritan sense of justice be served, for the damned must be given one glimpse of paradise before they are plunged into hell forever.

No other play by Mr. Kelly—indeed, few contemporary plays by any author whatsoever—has, in certain respects, a finer literary quality than this one has. There is a passionate sincerity in the conception and a beautiful clarity in the dialogue which raise it far above the level of merely successful dramatic writing. The author seems to be struggling to free himself from the limitations of mere naturalism, and very nearly succeeds, by his passion and his coherence, in raising it to the level of quasi-poetic tragedy. Yet the fact remains that the play was commercially a failure and, what is more important, that all the respect which one feels for it does not prevent certain objections from arising in the mind of either the spectator or the reader.

One is, to put it briefly, neither quite convinced nor quite sure that one ought to be. "Men have died from time to time and worms have eaten them, but not for love." This we have upon the authority of one of Shakespeare's heroines, and it may be urged against the conclusion which Mr. Kelly has given to his play, but the most serious of my doubts are not of this naturalistic kind. I can accept the physical features of his conclusion and I can respect the moral sincerity which has enabled him to develop an almost pietistic thesis without falling into mere priggishness on the one hand or into rant on the other, but I honestly doubt that nature is constructed upon any plan so in accord with a puritan sense of moral fitness. Perhaps a spoiled and empty woman should die of self-contempt when she sees herself; perhaps she should feel herself forever unworthy of love if she chances at last to meet it; but I doubt that she would actually feel so or that there is anything to be gained by trying to make her. We forgive ourselves more easily and it is as well that we should. Artists and moralists both love to contemplate the irreparable—it helps the one to be dramatic and it helps the other to satisfy his sense of justice. But nature is more compliant. Time cannot be called back, and what has been physically destroyed cannot be found again, but nothing else is irretrievably lost and there are no sins that ought not and cannot be forgiven.

Mr. Kelly has been silent since he produced "Maggie the Magnificent" in November, 1929. In this latest of his plays he returned to the middle-class milieu and the more realistic manner. But here again he is concerned with integrity of character as it is brought out in the contrast between the disorderly soul of an uncultivated mother and the efficient determination of a daughter who lifts herself by her own efforts above the vulgarity amidst which she grew up. But Mr. Kelly seems incapable of making either men or women as likable as they ought to be. There is in the characters whom he admires something stiff and prim and priggish which chills the beholder and seems to suggest that the author hates what is cheap and common with such an all-absorbing fury that he has become incapable of exercising his critical judgment upon anyone who escapes the one vice he cannot forgive. The "bridegroom" in the previous play was not intended to be repellantly self-righteous, but there was a suggestion of repellent self-righteousness in him. Similarly, the Maggie of this piece is actually a good deal less than magnificent. She is neat, orderly, assured, decent, and correct, but only Mr. Kelly would admire her with warmth. We are expected to feel in her an austere nobility, but we actually feel a kind of spinsterish frigidity, and we cannot rejoice as we should in her triumph because we cannot sympathize warmly enough with her essentially negative aspirations.

This suggests, I think, the key to the mystery surrounding the fact that Mr. Kelly's most characteristic and most seriously meant plays do not quite achieve the success that they seem at times about to reach. There is a touch of coldness in his nature, a certain stubborn negativeness in his moral attitude, which lays a blight upon his plays. Essentially they are rather dour and frost-bitten, rather bleak at the very moments when a grave beauty ought to emerge. He wants, like Milton, to express the grandeur of puritanism, but he is somehow earthbound and cannot entirely escape from a certain unlovely rigidity. There is too much realism, too much prose, where a kind of ecstasy is called for. When a puritan is also a poet, the result can be magnificent, but Mr. Kelly is not quite poet enough. He commands respect but he cannot quite inspire a genuine enthusiasm.

[This is the third of four articles by Mr. Krutch on contemporary dramatists. The fourth will appear soon.]

In the Driftway

AUGUST newspapers, as everybody knows, are unlike the newspapers of any other month. In August the temperature rises higher than the melting-point of even hard-headed city editors, and almost anything may happen. The reader, too, contributes to the confusion. Some newspaper headlines are hard to decipher in mid-January, but the haze of heat distorts even those which make sense. For instance, when the Drifter read in the Herald Tribune on August 14 that "Hull's Kin Visits His Frigate," it was quite natural, in view of the recent unpleasantness at London, that he should think of Cordell. What was his amazement, then, to read in the second line that "Granddaughter, 82, Is Shown Over Old Ironsides"!

* * * * *

HE had no sooner got that figured out than he bumped, on the same page, into "Girl, Born Amid Battle, Routs 3 Bandits, Killing 1." Husky baby, thought the Drifter and called for an iced drink. His head cooler, he read on to discover that the Battle Amid which the redoubtable Girl had been Born had occurred some eighteen years before. For a day the Drifter stayed away from the Herald Tribune, trusting neither its head writers nor his own senses. It was not long enough, however, for on August 16 the following story leaped out at him:

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA, AUG. 15 (UP).—Luis and Carola Perez, of San Pedro, in the Bolivar Department, announced in a telegram read in the Senate today the birth of seven children. . . . The telegram . . . was referred to the Committee on Public Works.

* * * * *

IT remained for the World-Telegram, however, to serve up the essence of American culture in August. This may be a misprint caused by melting type and an overheated etiquette editor, but here it is:

YOUR MANNERS

My fiance tells me that it is very bad form to refuse to have a drink on the house, even if you really do not want it. Is this true?—S. K.

Not if you thank the bartender graciously, explain that you have to hurry off, and ask him to save it for you until another time.

The Drifter has resolved to read no more newspapers until frost. Instead, he will thank his newsboy graciously, explain that he has to hurry away, and ask him to save them for him until another time. It is best.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

India Is Tired

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The meeting of the Congress leaders in Poona is now over, and India, or rather Mr. Gandhi, has taken another momentous decision. Mass civil disobedience is to continue. But it will be in name only. For as every provincial leader except a few blind followers of Mr. Gandhi asserted, the country is tired of the struggle and cannot continue it any longer. This statement on the part of the overwhelming majority of the leaders was not, as Mr. Gandhi insinuated, a result of their own weariness, but a true statement well borne out by facts and figures. The ordinances with their brutal clauses have struck terror to the hearts of the people, who are no longer willing to break the laws and go to jail. In the eighteen months of the present campaign, twice as long as the last one, only half as many people have gone to prison. The boycott of British goods, a very potent weapon, is dead everywhere, the Bombay cotton market being the last to yield. Swadeshi, the movement to use only Indian goods, has suffered a severe setback owing to the abnormally low prices of Japanese goods, which have been flooding the markets for more than a year. Financial help from the business community is also not readily forthcoming. The mill-owners and the merchants are looking more and more to the government rather than to the Congress for their betterment. As for labor, it never supported Mr. Gandhi, and its leaders have time and again denounced him for betraying the cause of the revolutionary masses. Even the peasants are showing unmistakable signs of having lost their confidence in him. They are paying the land taxes and are actively cooperating with the government for their own little benefit.

In spite of these telling facts, Mr. Gandhi made a very emotional "no-surrender" speech, appealing to the audience in the subtle manner of which he alone is capable. And the result was that he got his way. The resolution in favor of civil disobedience if the Viceroy did not yield was carried by a majority of 24, 16 voting against and 40 voting for. But this vote did not reflect the true opinion of the conference because out of 150 delegates who attended only 56 voted. The rest either had not the courage of their conviction or did not wish to offend Mr. Gandhi and so did not vote, though most of them in their conference speeches had made out a strong case for the withdrawal of civil disobedience.

This fatal decision of Mr. Gandhi's will go down in history as another of his Himalayan blunders. It will create a split in the Congress Party, and the majority will side with those who decide to withdraw from the Congress of Mr. Gandhi and enter the reformed councils. History will unfortunately repeat itself and the whole episode of the Swarajist tactics will be reenacted. This is exactly what the government wants. With Congress officially not taking part in the coming elections for the reformed councils, the government, with the aid of the liberals, will be able to intrench itself in power for another five or ten years to come.

The outlook for my country is indeed dark today. The only ray of hope lies in the fact that the realization is dawning upon more and more people that the non-violent tactics of Mr. Gandhi will not result in any appreciable betterment of the condition of the people of India. Many people have also realized that his methods will not result in a seizure of power by the Indians. Thoughtful people are therefore turning away from him and going over to the revolutionary side. The worsening of the position of the masses is, indeed, making more and more for a revolutionary situation. But unfortunately the forces of the revolution are very badly organized. The suicidal policy of Mr. Gandhi will no doubt strengthen the hands of the revolutionaries, but the day of their victory is yet far off.

Bombay, July 15

S. K. SHAH

$300,000,000 Not $300,000

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Three important ciphers slipped out of one figure in my article in The Nation, The Utility Crisis in New York. Gas, electric, and telephone dividends in New York State have been $300,000,000 per annum, and not $300,000.

New York, August 24

JEROME COUNT

Look on This Picture—

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I resent most emphatically your attitude toward Germany. Please scratch my name off your subscribers' list.

St. Joachimstal, Czecho-Slovakia, July 4 C. J. GRIMM

Then on This!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Some time ago I addressed a very complimentary communication to The Nation, which may have sounded like flattery but was, nevertheless, meant in all sincerity. The letter did not appear in print. Since then I have noticed that your communicants who insist on burying The Nation with all manner of anathema and imprecation have their communications printed. Is this not carrying your modesty too far?

Of late I have been searching The Nation diligently to find some utterance or attitude I could earnestly decry, hoping that would enable me to break into print. The endeavor has proved fruitless, for I find I am in substantial agreement with everything you have to say. So I suppose I'll have to remain in obscurity for the simple reason that I am in hearty accord with the policies and attitudes of The Nation.

Now, if you don't print this, I won't give a whoop. I just wanted to get it off my chest.

Medford, Oregon, July 19

C. W. KIRKPATRICK

Mad

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In this morning's mail I opened a letter from a professor in the University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa, and read as follows: "This old world of ours is getting madder every day."

The next letter I opened was one from a captain of the British Royal Engineers, now living in Satara City, Bombay, India. His letter began as follows: "Mad is the only word for the state of affairs now existing. You perhaps have heard what Dr. Derloges of Canada has been saying lately just about that." I do not happen to know what Dr. Derloges has been saying, but it seems to me an interesting fact that three educated men as far apart as South Africa, India, and Canada should be saying the same thing about this world of ours.

Los Angeles, California, July 10

UPTON SINCLAIR

Make Everybody Pay

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

A simple way to increase the government's revenue would be to make those who are now exempted from paying a federal income tax share in our financial burdens through a constitutional amendment. The Treasury Department in Washington informs me that no express provision in the Constitution prohibits the federal government from taxing the instrumentalities of a State or vice versa; but in accordance with judicial interpretation there is implied constitutional prohibition against such taxation.

I am a veteran of the Spanish War and lost my hearing as a result of disease contracted in Cuba in 1898. I have always paid an income tax, small as it was. It is irritating to find so many who never shouldered a gun exempt from contributing to our war debts.

An amendment to the Constitution appears to be the only way to overcome the limitation and to permit the taxation by our federal government of the compensation of all officers and employees of States and their political subdivisions.

New York, May 1

AMOS H. BARNETT

For New Jersey Readers

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Will readers of The Nation residing in Hudson County, New Jersey, who are interested in forming a Nation Club, communicate with me at 905 Bergen Avenue, Jersey City, New Jersey. My telephone number is Journal Square 2-2175.

Jersey City, July 15

ABRAHAM LEVINE

UNION OF Soviet Socialist Republics

7% GOLD BONDS (Due 1943)
Interest Payable Quarterly

Interest and principal payable in American currency on the basis of the value of the gold rouble in terms of the U. S. dollar. (A gold rouble contains 0.774234 grams of pure gold.)

This prime security is a direct obligation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and is part of the internal loan issued to further the Second Five Year Plan.

MARKET: On demand of the bondholder, the State Bank of the U. S. S. R. will repurchase these bonds at any time after one year from date of purchase at par and accrued interest.

Circular fully describing this issue will be sent upon request

SOVIET AMERICAN SECURITIES CORP.
30 BROAD STREET, NEW YORK Tel. HANover 2-6955

This is not an offering of new securities. The bonds are the remainder of an offering of 10,000,000 roubles initially made on July 24, 1933.

Books, Art, Films

The Ecstatic

By C. DAY LEWIS

Lark, skylark, spilling your rubbed and round
Pebbles of sound in air's still lake,
Whose widening circles fill the noon; yet none
Is known so small beside the sun.

Be strong your fervent soaring, your skyward air!
Tremble there, a nerve of song!
Float up there where voice and wing are one,
A singing star, a note of light!

Buoyed, embayed in heaven's noon-wide reaches—
For soon light's tide will turn—Oh stay!
Cease not till day streams to the west; then down
That estuary drop down to peace!

South American Rhapsody

Indian Air. Impressions of Travel in South America. By Paul Morand. Translated by Desmond Flower. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THE initial chapter of this book, from which the title is derived, may be regarded as the author's error. This shallow, poetic thesis, in which the Americas, in a division of continents, are allotted principles "in air," attempts to unite, under winged symbols, New York skyscrapers, aeroplanes, Iroquois and Apache headdresses, Patagonian clothing, the down robes of the dancers of Sikuri, and the Wright brothers—all influenced by the "exciting electricity" which is our Western element. There is in this the hint of something which might convince if propounded with a resource and a seriousness absent here, where we have only a jazz rendition of Waldo Frank's "America Hispana": a book which convinces as art because the metaphysical intensity of the writer wins us from a too critical consideration of the superficiality of his acquaintance with the actualities which have inspired him.

One wishes Paul Morand had not, as he admits, read Waldo Frank, and had not introduced us to travel with this perfunctory soothsaying. It provokes the reader to an annoying skepticism, and makes one question the existence of "green toucans" (though there may be such creatures), and causes one to register a quibbling objection to the confusing of parrots with love birds. Let an author of this kind touch on facts one has oneself experienced, irritation will result. From the farewell salute M. Morand offers Buenos Aires, where he first takes off, to the adieu he bids the plane from which he descends in the swamps of Louisiana, his amazing eye-mindedness is given the elaborate and somewhat chaotic support of informational bits hurled into paragraphs which are lyrics of reference; yet of reference we somehow doubt to have been investigated with any earnestness. His spontaneity is charming. Because he sees fit to lard his sentences with cultural allusions demanding substantiation no tourist can provide, the virtues of his style are sometimes lost.

As with all travelers' accounts of lands and peoples remote in spirit, this account is most valid when it is most personal, when we share the writer's physical excitement in discovering below him, as he gazes from his plane, so vast an earth. The visual thrill he had in passing, like a rain cloud, in a few hours, over a nation is one we also may enjoy. As Pierre Loti, with lyric nostalgia, wrote of Turkey, Algeria, Egypt, M. Morand writes, out of a vivid intoxication with space, of soaring where previous generations have ambled on mules or trudged footsore. Sweeping on silver wings above the Andes, plowing through the water of Lake Titicaca, the high lake of the world, on a modern English steamer, communicating with a friend in Paris by a telephone connection established in Chile—such events hold the essence of the drama of modern travel, romantic, exalting.

It is the pretentious generalizing on civilization and racial character which taints an elating impressionism. "Body of South America, a complete organism, of which the Amazons, enlarged like a breast, are the lungs, the Argentine the gullet, the Plate the digestive tube, the rivers the arteries, with towns perched on the confluents like glands." Such facile recourse to the pathetic fallacy, recurring frequently, adds another exasperation.

It is an advantage of the fictional form that it permits a writer to select material for the sake of its emotional importance to himself, but the traveler, skimming above historic sites, is under an obligation to give them their due, though he must resort to a guidebook. M. Morand's own South America is in his rhapsodic response to the spectacular peaks and glaciers he glimpses, to the jungles scarred by the tombs of dead races, and to the empty deserts lying beneath him in an arid hush broken by the rumble of propellers.

Arrived in Louisiana, he falls back on the Abbé Prévost, and realizes little more of the scene today than a man might with the shrillness of Paris beyond his window and "Manon," open at a certain chapter, on his knee. To Morand, Louisiana has "the face of a child suffering from an incurable disease." To this reviewer, the face reflected in swamps, amidst palmettos and sad trees heavy with gray moss, happens to be an ancient, primeval one. The cursory statements of the voyager seem frail substitutes for the fact. M. Morand has tourist exhaustion, and must end his book somehow.

Yet, in "Indian Air," epic moods inadequately purveyed by writers of advertising copy are interpreted by an artist.

EVELYN SCOTT

Literary Trapezist

Orphée. By Jean Cocteau. Translated by Carl Wildman. Frontispiece by Pablo Picasso. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

TELL Jean Cocteau that I adore him," wrote Rainer Maria Rilke, "the only person for whom the Myth opens its gates and from which he returns bronzed as from the seaside." Here it is the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice whose gates are thrown open for M. Cocteau: an Orpheus, it is true, who turns out to bear a striking resemblance to M. Cocteau himself, and a Eurydice who belongs to the period when Dada was the rage of the boulevards and postcard photographs were supposed to possess "a harmony, a harsh simplicity" which made them preferable to the major works of Rubens and Velasquez. There is also a character named Heurtebise, who belongs to "the race of the horse": this means that when the chair on which he is standing is withdrawn he is capable of remaining suspended in mid-air. One gathers (Cocteau himself played Heurtebise when Pitöeff produced the playlet) that with this ingratiating fakir also one may identify, if not the author, at least what is the wish-fulfilment of the author, of this charming, ingenious, and delicately mad little offering. It seems rather foolish, however, to designate "Orphée" as Cocteau's masterpiece, as the translator does in his preface, since "Les Enfants Terribles" is an infinitely more serious and substantial work, and, what is more to the point, Cocteau would consider producing anything so pretentious as a masterpiece as constituting something like a breach of faith. Of Cocteau one may say what Arthur Symons said long ago of Oscar Wilde—that he is "an artist in attitudes." Here the attitude is that of the trapezist, "playing at a great height, and without a safety net." As always Cocteau manages to get through the performance without a fall, although one is not sure from beginning to end whether it may not all be an optical illusion. But that is the essence of the pleasure which everything that Cocteau does is able to provide. It must be added that the book is exquisitely produced, with typography by John Johnson, and with a Chiricoesque frontispiece by Picasso.

WILLIAM TROY

They Had to See Russia

Russia Day by Day. By Corliss and Margaret Lamont. Covici-Friede. $2.

The Tragedy of Russia. By Will Durant. Simon and Schuster. $1.25.

This Russian Business. By E. T. Brown. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

ONE can scarcely read these three books, all written on the basis of comparatively short trips to Russia, without feeling that there is no such thing as objective truth about the Soviet system. There is not the slightest reason to question the good faith of any of the authors or the sincerity of the impressions which they derived from sojourns in Russia which ranged from two months for Mr. and Mrs. Lamont to shorter periods for Messrs. Durant and Brown.

But if one sets down the impressions of the Lamonts side by side with those of Mr. Durant, the resultant effect is something like emerging from a darkened room into a burst of sunshine. One envisages the typical Russian who talks with the Lamonts as a buoyant, enthusiastic young person of either sex who laughs and sings and shouts: "Isn't it wonderful, what we have done? Of course there are a few difficulties with food and housing and coordination, but those will all be swept away in good time." By contrast Mr. Durant's Russian is a gloomy, depressed individual who has long lost all capacity to sing, to laugh, or even to smile, who sidles up to the American visitor, glancing furtively around to see that there are no spies within earshot, and whispers: "Isn't it simply terrible? All hope and joy crushed out of us. And of course we are all starving."

Far be it from the reviewer, because of his own extended period of residence in Moscow, to look with undue superciliousness on the impressionistic works of short-term observers. It not infrequently happens that a fresh observer reacts quickly and sensitively to features of daily life which are overlooked or taken for granted by permanent inhabitants. But there is one distinct peril that besets the casual visitor. The checks which the objective facts of the situation impose upon his personal viewpoint are few and can be quite easily and unconsciously evaded. All the books under review illustrate this peril in varying degrees.

Of the three the work of Mr. and Mrs. Lamont stays best within the limits which a comparatively brief visit should impose. It is in the form of a day-by-day diary in which the authors record the events of a prolonged tour which took them first to Leningrad and Moscow, then down the Volga, through the Caucasus, and out of the Soviet Union by way of the Crimea, the Dnieperstroi dam, and Kiev. They were extremely hardworking and conscientious tourists, especially during their stay in Moscow; and the range of their contacts and interests may be gathered from such headings of individual days as: "Western Art. Anna Louise Strong. Five-Year Plan"; or "Amo Factory. Woman's Prison. Louis Fischer. Izvestia."

Their narrative makes smooth and pleasant reading because they were so obviously enjoying the manifold sights and impressions and discussion topics of what they regard as "the new world of the twentieth century." And if they are somewhat jauntily willing and even eager to learn and credit the ever-ready official excuse for this or that obvious failing, one admires their philosophic good nature in the face of nocturnal insects on Volga boats and of mired buses on the steppes of the North Caucasus, and feels that they would have been agreeable travel companions on the somewhat strenuous tour of Russia. One can scarcely leave unchallenged, however, their easy assumption that "socialism in America could be depended on to improve things at least as much as has socialism in Russia. And since America starts far ahead of the Soviet the results in the U. S. A. would be phenomenal. . . . Socialism in America might in rather short order provide every family with the equivalent of a $25,000 income." Leaving out the complicated and debatable question of how far socialism in Russia has improved things, it would certainly seem inconceivable that socialism on the Russian Bolshevik model could be introduced into a country with America's historic and economic background without provoking desperate and prolonged resistance; and in the process of that resistance the technocratic mirage of a $25,000 income for every family would probably resolve itself into something more like the meager rations of the average Soviet citizen today.

The Soviet Union may well pray to be delivered from ex-admirers, who are almost invariably more bitter and intemperate in their denunciations than conservatives or liberals who were never over-hopeful about the results of communism. Will Durant, as readers of the Saturday Evening Post articles which constitute the bulk of his present book know, is a recruit to the ranks of the disillusioned.

There is no reason why anyone should not change his opinion about the Soviet Union; and certainly varied cases can be made against Bolshevik theory and practice by believers in religion, private capitalism, anarchism, and moderate socialism. Exception, however, can be taken to Mr. Durant's efforts to rear a formidable structure of sweeping generalizations ("Slavery, barbarism, and desolation; this, fundamentally, despite a thousand minor virtues, is what Russia is today") on a narrow base of factual observation. What he seems to have discovered by personal observation is that there is squalor and hunger in Russian provincial towns, that there is a general lack of up-to-date sanitary facilities and a good deal of confusion and disorganization in the handling of railroad passengers, all of which is quite true; also that people never laugh and never sing, which is demonstrably untrue.

His pontifical judgments on the Five-Year Plan, on Communist psychology and methods of administration, on the personalities of Soviet leaders, are based in considerable degree on arbitrary selections from other people's impressions, with the result that his book is studded with factual mistakes and conveys a hasty and superficial impression. To list a few of the varied mistakes: the Nijni Novgorod automobile factory was at no time abandoned; the plan called for 9,500,000 tons of pig iron, not in the first eight months, but in the whole year of 1932; the former head of the trade unions, Tomsky, is not "languishing in Siberia"; the amount of land planted with grain from January 1 until August 25, 1932, was not 7,000,000 acres but much closer to 250,000,000 acres; Lenin, as the slightest acquaintance with his works would prove, never believed that the slogan "From each according to his ability, to each according to his need" could be introduced immediately after the revolution.

Mr. Brown's work belongs in the class of the favorable reactions to the Soviet Union. Its value is diminished by the fact that the author has a weakness for drifting from direct observation to long-winded generalization about this or that ethical or sociological problem involved in the Soviet regime. Some of his generalizations, such as "Persecution and propaganda are in their nature incongruous," may be philosophically unimpeachable; yet the two methods certainly go hand in hand not only in the Soviet Union but also in Germany and Italy, under their present regimes. And one hopes that no discontented English worker, employed or unemployed, will take too seriously Mr. Brown's extraordinary statement that "plain substantial meals for workmen in Russia are rather cheaper than in England," while "meat at a shop is probably rather dearer, although not much." The quality of the meals and the availability of the meat are dismissed with airy unconcern.

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Ex-Regulator

Public Utilities and the People. By William A. Prendergast. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.

WILLIAM A. PRENDERGAST was formerly chairman of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York, and until recently executive vice-president of three large private companies. His book covers the nature and functions of public utilities; discusses the power trust, holding companies, various theories of valuation, rates, and accounting procedure; asks whether regulation has broken down; and discusses public ownership as the alternative. One has a feeling that the categories have all been listed, and that the arguments for and against every controversial question have been presented. Then he evaluates the arguments and resolves every question in favor of the power companies. "We are brought to the conclusion that nothing which can reasonably be called a 'power trust' exists in this country today or has existed in the past," he says, though he lists groupings of power companies covering the entire country, acting politically as a unit through the National Electric Light Association. He minimizes the bad effects of lack of State or national regulation of power sold by company to company across State lines, though he thinks there should be some regulation. While approving the theory of valuation based on present "reproduction costs" less depreciation, as responsive to the changing value of the dollar, he recognizes its futility as a prompt means of making rate changes, and proposes instead that the rate base used be the "book value" of the utilities, revised as to property acquired prior to June 30, 1917, by applying a price-index figure, so that the prices may be given their present-day dollar value, and then adds the actual book costs of "all property installed since June 30, 1917." Since the art of "write-ups" of utility property was not lost in 1917, and has been practiced by operating as well as holding companies, this method would seem to offer little protection to the consumer. While recognizing the bad failure of regulation in many States, due to imperfect laws, control of the commissioners by the companies regulated, and inadequate fact-finding facilities, he prefers to trust to improvement in regulation rather than permit communities to "roll their own" through public ownership. If he had digested some of the basic facts in, say, Mr. Cooke's recent volume, "What Electricity Costs," he could hardly have reached some of his conclusions. But if one reads his book with due allowance for its point of view, it is readable, informative, and helpful.

LOUIS BARTLETT

San Francisco Sin

The Barbary Coast. An Informal History of the San Francisco Underworld. By Herbert Asbury. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

SAN FRANCISCO has inconsiderately failed to erect a monument to the unknown advertising genius who, in the middle eighteen-sixties, first christened the block of dives, concert-saloons, and brothels on Pacific Street between Kearney and Montgomery, the "Barbary Coast." For the fame of the district, which grew with the years and with the expansion of its boundaries, owed not a little to this lurid and barbaric phrase. From 1849 until 1914 the Barbary Coast flourished as one of the most celebrated acres of iniquity on the North American continent. Long prior to 1914, however, it had become, in Mr. Asbury's melancholy phrase, merely "a slummer's paradise." The period of its robustness and vigor, like that of many other San Francisco institutions, was brought to a close by the earthquake and fire of 1906; from then until 1914 the vice of the Barbary Coast was largely synthetic. Although the Barbary Coast has been luridly depicted in innumerable Sunday-supplement melodramas and feature stories, Mr. Asbury has written the first semi-historical account of the district. To the task of chronicling its tumultuous history he has devoted himself with commendable seriousness and even a sort of scholarly piety. He has not been abashed by the gruesome or intimidated by the vicious. With an admirably disciplined sobriety and candor, he writes quite as respectfully of the Galloping Cow and Cowboy Maggie as Trevelyan describing the early life of Queen Anne or Macaulay the features of Warren Hastings.

The one weakness of Mr. Asbury's volume consists in its discursiveness. For the subtitle of the volume is really more descriptive of its contents than the title. A large part of the book is devoted to such familiar phases of the history of California as the discovery of gold; the boisterous character of early San Francisco; the Chinese, with their tong wars, lotteries, and struggles to maintain their queues and hand laundries; the doings of the venerated vigilance committees; and such romantic characters as the bandit Joaquin Murieta and the Emperor Norton. These passages form no part of the history of the Barbary Coast, although they make interesting reading no matter how often they are rehashed.

There is much material in the volume, however, that will startle even the collector of Californiana. Of particular interest is the chapter on the "Sydney ducks"—ticket-of-leave men who escaped from the prison camps of Australia and terrorized San Francisco for a decade. There is also an amusing chapter on the lost art of shanghaiing sailors. The fabulous characters that Mr. Asbury vividly presents in this chapter, notably Mother Bronson, Shanghai Kelly, Miss Piggott, Patsy Corrigan, Calico Jim (who once shanghai'd three policemen), the Shanghai Chicken, and Cowboy Maggie, are figures from the murky underworld of Fagin and Sykes. While not another Dickens, Mr. Asbury gives life to these amazing figures and exhibits their peculiar virtues with great skill and obvious affection. There is also much erudite stuff in the volume on the harlots and harlotry of the Barbary Coast, with graphic and technical accounts of the organization, economics, personnel, and paraphernalia of its innumerable cowyards, cribs, and parlor houses, all done with appropriate seriousness and an innocent and casual irony. While Mr. Asbury writes learnedly of the madame, her function and characteristics, he makes no mention of the professor, as the morose and fragile piano-player in such establishments was invariably called. Such an omission is remarkable in a historian otherwise so scrupulously exact about even the most minute and, shall I say indecent, details.

Mr. Asbury has evolved an admirable technique for the type of Americana in which he takes such obvious relish. His research is confined to the inexhaustible riches of oral traditions, police records, and newspaper files. He shuns secondary sources, and perhaps wisely so. But in this case he erred in neglecting the fiction of the Barbary Coast. He makes no mention whatever of the numerous novels that have described the scenes and characters of the Coast. Charles Caldwell Dobie wrote an excellent novel based on the life of Mammy Pleasant; Gelett Burgess in "The Heart Line" referred to many Barbary Coast characters, as did Charles Tenney Jackson in "The Day of Souls."

The enthusiasm for American erotica has apparently not abated. Such material has, of course, great interest to an "emancipated" generation which takes delight in the coarse and uncouth vagaries of another age. At times I suspect that the popular interest in this type of work is a product of self-deception. Vice is seldom amusing if graphically described. What has delighted a later generation in the doings of Calamity Jane and her kind has been the charming casualness of their depravities. In the inherited gossip of their heroic adventures and the gorgeous frankness of their misbehavior investigators have discerned the materials of a pseudo-folklore. And so in Mr. Asbury's book it is not surprising to find that he frankly acknowledges the apocryphal character of many of the tales which he relates and that he has given to his favorite characters the exaggerated proportions of the figures of myths and legend. In fact, by endowing his characters with legendary qualities and accepting the traditions by which the memory of them has been sustained, Mr. Asbury has rescued the Barbary Coast and its strange denizens from oblivion. For already I have overheard Californians retelling many of his choice episodes. Is it a confession of innate sinful propensities, or merely an admission of the character of the age in which we live that the present generation should be wistful over the Barbary Coast?

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Dead Germany

Modern Germany: A Study of Conflicting Loyalties. By Paul Kosok. University of Chicago Press. $3.

THE title of this book is misleading, but that is no fault of the author. For Modern Germany was slain while the volume was being revised and put upon the press. In its place we have the ruthless, despotic state erected by Hitler; it is really appalling to see in how short a time it is possible to tear down completely a democratic structure, install complete reaction, and deny to every individual the right to think and speak according to his own beliefs.

Professor Kosok's study is really the story of the Dead Germany which collapsed so readily and entirely without resistance when put to the touch of Hitler. It is a careful and conscientious recital of the background both of the monarchy and of the ill-fated republic, and as such it contains factual material of value to everyone who desires to find some explanation for the German disaster. But it cannot be said that Professor Kosok's style is bright or entertaining; it smacks too much of the doctor's thesis. He places his chief emphasis on the economic factors and forces in the political system, but he neither develops new theories of the struggle between the contending forces in the republic nor throws fresh light upon the facts.

It is a pity that the book could not have been recast after Hitler's ascendancy. We read in the author's account of the Stahlhelm, for example, that it "now claims a membership of over a million, and is the mainstay of the much weakened mon-archistic Nationalist Party," when we know that it has been taken over by Hitler after enlisting large numbers of the disbanded Reichsbanner. So in an excellent chapter on National Symbolism contributed by Isidor Ginsburg, dealing with the role which symbolism has played in the development of German loyalties, we learn that it is doubtful whether Hitler "can with these new tactics [the legality announcement of 1930] keep his party intact." A footnote explains that the "national resurgence" of 1933 has "not affected the validity of the principles" laid down by Mr. Ginsburg. But the net effect upon the reader is naturally depressing.

Especially valuable are Professor Kosok's chapters on the army and the church. In that on the latter he makes the interesting point that the revolution of 1918 and the period of the republic resulted in an increase rather than a decrease in the power and influence granted to the church by the state—another evidence of the fatal weakness of the leaders of the republic. Today the Hitler state makes and unmakes bishops. Throughout Professor Kosok identifies patriotism with submissive loyalty to the state and acceptance of the war policies of 1914-18. It is sad, too, to find that he has only this to say, in a final paragraph, of Hitler's accession to power: "Hitler and Fascism have triumphed in Germany . . . Civic training of a super-nationalist character . . . is the order of the day! The effectiveness of this training will depend upon whether the Nazis can solve the economic crisis which brought them into power. If they can do this, well and good." (Italics mine.) Well and good indeed! Only a completely superficial mind can see in the Nazis' record to date anything good which can offset its horrible cruelty, its deadly menace to civilization everywhere.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Shorter Notices

Mrs. Egg and Other Barbarians. By Thomas Beer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Mr. Beer, with a diffidence which perhaps veils an impulse to disclaim altogether a serious paternity for these eight stories—six of which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post—refers to them himself, in a forenote, as "frivolous tales." They recount episodes in the lives of two groups of semi-rural characters, one group revolving about the obese figure of an amazing matron named Mrs. Egg, of Illium, Ohio, the other about an equally astonishing Dutch patriarch, with a fraction of Iroquois blood and a wooden leg, named Carolus Van Eyck, of Couveris, New York. Both these characters are paragons of homely sagacity. In the episodes, most of which concern the mating adventures of children and grandchildren, they figure as shrewd powers behind the scenes, after the manner of Kelland's "Scattergood," directing the course of events to the wise conclusion. The stories sheathe a core of sentimentality in a slick surface sophistication, according to the familiar formula of the "smooth paper" magazines. To this artistry Mr. Beer contributes a curious impulse to make his rural world cognizant of the catchwords and themes of the intelligentsia—"the lost generation," the Left Bank, and even Lesbianism—with the result that both the innocence and the sophistication are suspect. The volume will hardly add to the reputation of the author of "Stephen Crane" and "The Mauve Decade."

The Autobiography of a Liverpool Irish Slummy. By Pat O'Mara. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

During the past ten years the "true confession" story has run its full length: through various jails in America, through the World War, through New York slums—each with its separate documentary value. Among these, Pat O'Mara's story of a boyhood spent in a Liverpool slum deserves special attention. The horror of poverty is revealed with genuine emotion, and the brutal conduct of its victims is made convincing by O'Mara's complete sympathy with them. In these slums drink and the more violent form of bloodlust seem to be only an escape from filth and economic nightmare; children's shoes are bought to be pawned on Monday morning and redeemed on Saturday night for church on Sunday; wife-beating is a daily exercise; and all forms of petty thievery and swindling are a means of livelihood. For O'Mara the movies and a stay at a charity hospital were the only calm moments in a childhood where disease and frequent beatings were listed as the common destiny of his generation—only the hardest members of a large family had any hope of survival. O'Mara at last ran off to sea, where even the rough duties of a mess boy on a freighter seemed like a vacation away from the terrifying experiences at home. O'Mara's prose, though crude, has warmth and color, and his autobiography is told with a hearty earnestness that is lighted from time to time by flashes of grim humor.

The Traipsin' Woman. By Jean Thomas. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

The traipsin' woman of these stories is Jean Thomas herself, who, as court stenographer to a circuit judge, enjoyed a rare opportunity for collecting material on the life of her native Kentucky. The sketches and stories in this volume, however, do not add anything of note to the regional studies of life in America. They hark back to the period of genre pictures, and have all the quaint humor and sentimentalities of the obsolescent local-colorist school in Southern fiction.

Business Is Business. By Basil D. Nicholson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

This attempt at a modern picaresque novel fails from a sheer excess of villainy. Fundamentally, devils are romantic creations, as ethereal, as humorless, and as colorless as angels. Art for art's sake is readily conceivable, but villainy for villainy's sake requires much more documentation. There are some perfect saints in literature who are almost credible human beings, but no perfect villains who are not abstractions. Villains usually have ulterior motives. In "Business Is Business" the author has grafted a nominal motive on his villain—money—but it has not taken root psychologically. As a result the hero's tedious recital of his murders and betrayals, which is meant to be both shocking and diverting, sounds no more exciting than "another Indian bit the dust."

Tapestry the Mirror of Civilization. By Phyllis Ackerman. Oxford University Press. $4.75.

Dr. Phyllis Ackerman, an outstanding tapestry authority, has written what to our knowledge is the most comprehensive and best single volume on this subject in the English language. The specialist may complain that she has laid too little stress on iconography, too much on the ethical, mythic, religious, social, and economic currents from which the artisan, whether he is an anonymous Minoan, a Flemish guildsman, or a Boucher, draws the themes, as well as the decorative and linear conventions, for his textiles. But the "common reader"—which most of us are on all but very few subjects—with only an elementary knowledge of the role that tapestry has played during the past five thousand years, will welcome rather than regret Dr. Ackerman's omission of scholarly documentation for its own sake. In a prose style that is both vigorous and vivid the story of tapestry is traced from its remote origin among the ancient eastern Mediterranean civilizations to its culmination in Europe in the seventeenth century with the tapestries designed by Rubens, Jordaens, and Teniers and in the eighteenth with Goya's cartoons for the Santa Barbara looms; the art scraped bottom in the nineteenth with the sterile medievalism of the Pre-Raphaelites. The appendices contain three additional chapters: one on The Technique and Aesthetic of Tapestry; another on Guild Regulations; the last on Some Collectors and Collections. Ninety-eight pages of valuable reference notes and a useful bibliography complete the text, which is supplemented by forty-eight full-page illustrations in half-tone, many of them of tapestries and cartoons for tapestries that are reproduced here for the first time.

Mrs. Barry. By Frederick Niven. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

It is hardly fair to call this book a novel, for it is rather a character sketch, a full-length portrait of mother and son with, for background, a few hasty strokes to indicate people who enter their lives. In trying to build it up into something more, the author has introduced several unrelated episodes which, however pleasant as reading, are more repetition than development. Mrs. Barry takes lodgers and barely makes ends meet even when she has lodgers. In another section of Scotland she was once a girl of means, but hard times have left her with a son to provide for, and with pains somewhere which grow through the story until she takes them to a doctor, hears his verdict, insures reception of her boy at an orphan's home, and dies. That is all, but with the exception of the padding referred to the story is told competently and with a quiet and convincing directness.

Shakespeare. By John Drinkwater. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

Short though this biography is—it is hardly 30,000 words long—it is too long for the meager data of Shakespeare's life. Mr. Drinkwater makes a well-nigh overwhelming case for the reality of Shakespeare as the writer of Shakespeare's plays and poems; but in the biographer's art of making a real man of his subject he is less successful. His book is more interesting as a fresh and vigorous contribution to the Shakespeare controversy than as a work of biography.

Hitler's Reich. By Hamilton Fish Armstrong. The Macmillan Company. $1.

We have been flooded with monographs, tracts, pamphlets, and full-dress books about the new Germany under Hitler. A few of them have been excellent, more have been emotional outpourings of dubious value, while most, it would seem, have been written solely with a view to getting something published on a subject that happens to be in the news. There can be no doubt that "Hitler's Reich" falls into the first category. It is brief, clear, and to the point. It presents a succinct and understandable account of the uprooting of the short-lived republic, the passing of virtually all the great men of contemporary Germany, the "conversion" of the Stahlhelm, the trade unions, the church, the universities, and the press. The Jewish problem, German foreign policy under the Nazis, the relation of Danzig and Austria and the Polish Corridor to the new Germany, the influence of Mussolini, the possible sources of weakness in the Nazi regime—these and other questions are discussed with equal brevity and clarity. One may not always agree with Mr. Armstrong's interpretations, for he inclines to old-fashioned democratic conservatism, and one cannot accurately measure the various phenomena now sweeping the world with the liberal standards of Spencer or Mill. Happily, Mr. Armstrong does not force his interpretations upon us. They are more in the nature of asides. His book is mainly a straightforward reportorial account based on first-hand observations—he went directly to Berlin, Vienna, Danzig, and Rome to get his story immediately after the Nazis came into power. "Hitler's Reich" is well worth reading.

Art

Modern Art in Perspective

"I HAVE no sympathy with the present time; the ideas which stir the passion of my contemporaries leave me absolutely cold, my memories and all my predilections are for the past, and all my study turns toward the masterpieces of bygone centuries." Such words, read by a person uninformed as to who had uttered them, might well seem those of a man living within the walls of a museum and oblivious to the value of the art of his time, if such value existed at all. But the quotation is from a letter written by Eugène Delacroix in 1853, when Ingres, Corot, Daumier, and Courbet were at the height of their powers, and when everything pointed to the splendid new talents that were rapidly preparing masterwork worthy to continue that of the men in middle life. What is even more to the point, it was masterwork specifically based on that of the great innovator and renovator of modern art who, in the sentences above, turns his back on it so resolutely. We know that it was only for a time, since, to cite but a single instance, we have his words of admiration for the young Courbet—whose art is so much the contrary of his own.

Yet the fact remains that precisely at periods of intense and original production men have a nostalgia for the past, a need to get away from the turmoil of modernity. Doubtless many who will see the magnificent exhibition of works from American collections at the Museum of Modern Art in New York have had their moments of impatience with the confusing movements of our time and have sought the repose of some earlier century—a repose, be it said, that we may enjoy today but that the period itself saw as the privilege of some other Golden Age behind it. Our own will be a time of miracles for, let us say, the twenty-third century.

We of today cannot wait till then, which is the reason for the founding of the Modern Museum (and I am still of the opinion that it should be part of the Metropolitan Museum). We want the people of the twenty-third century's Golden Age to enjoy the expression which their artists—the ones who most intimately represent them—give to their own thoughts and sensations. Delacroix and his great contemporaries did that for their time. The present exhibition, which begins with pictures produced just after the death of Delacroix, does the same for the seventy years since then. To see the glorious works of Cézanne and Renoir, Redon and Degas, is to be convinced that there is no break with the genius of the earlier time (indeed, given genius, there is never a break—the later forms always agreeing in essentials with the earlier ones). One continues with the three splendid canvases by Seurat, and again one feels that the complete range of painting, from a profound constructive plan at the start to exquisite control of nuances at the finish, remains open to modern men. The two phases of the work are seen again in the sculptures of Maillol and Brancusi, with—between them—the wide variety of externals that makes our time particularly rich.

That phase of it is again apparent in one especially happy feature of the exhibition, its inclusion of what amounts almost to one-man shows of Rouault and Bonnard. The tragic magnificence of the former and the colorful optimism of the latter—so unassuming as to have come only in later times to recognition here—contrast strikingly, and emphasize the breadth of mood conveyed by modern art.

One proceeds to the work of Derain and sees that breadth in firm hands, under the direction of a powerful mind. And having regained our composure after what once seemed the

Youth IN SOVIET RUSSIA

By Klaus Mehnert

There are 100 million people under 25 years of age in Soviet Russia today, a group that is utterly different from any other younger generation in education, ambition, social experience. This lively description of their life is by a Russian-born writer who is himself under 30 years of age. Trotsky—and Trotsky's opponents—have praised it in the foreign press for its disinterested point of view and well-informed presentation. It should be eagerly read in America by those who are interested in the Youth Movement and its prognostications for the future.

Just out. 270 pages, $2.00.

RED VIRTUE By Ella Winter

One of the essential books on Russian life. "If you really want to know how the Russians live and what the fabric of their social relations is, you'll find it remarkably illuminating. 'Red Virtue' is a kind of Moscow 'Middletown'."—R. M. Coates, New Yorker. Ill., $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO., 383 MADISON AVE., N.Y.

"The greatest piece of debunking to appear since the days of Ida Tarbell and Lincoln Steffens."—Philadelphia Record.

MELLON'S MILLIONS

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A FORTUNE

The Life and Times of Andrew W. Mellon

By HARVEY O'CONNOR

Mr. Mellon says:

"... the book is obviously a travesty of truth and appears in the nature of literary racketeering... it is a serious injustice that such false statements in respect to private affairs... should have to be submitted to." In N. Y. Herald Tribune—August 11, 1933.

The author replies:

"Mr. Mellon's designation of my work as 'literary racketeering' is a flimsy reply to a book based almost entirely on public records and a careful attempt to appraise Mr. Mellon's significance to our civilization."

... and THE CRITICS say:

"This amazing tale of The World's Greatest Money Bag ought to be read by every American who wants to know what is the matter with his country."—JOHN T. FLYNN.

"An amazing case history."—N. Y. Evening Post.

Second Large Printing $3.00 a JOHN DAY book mere audacities of Matisse, we realize that his art is what he wrote, twenty-five years ago, that he wanted it to be, a thing of calm and harmony. We can still feel excitement in the discovery of his untried balance of form, his never-before-tasted combination of color, as in the "Tea Party," and then we feel that its innocent-sounding title is right, not for the gossipy little gatherings it can suggest, but for the rich and yet simple ceremonies of the Orient which are also evoked by the words.

And so, with more time than I have here, the visitor will go on to the superb works of Picasso, of Braque, of Léger, de La Fresnaye, and Juan Gris. So far, he, like the organizers of the exhibition, is on firm and well-trying ground. The test comes when we reach the younger men. There has been at least one failure in this respect, throughout the museum's American exhibitions, that of not recognizing the man who, in his generation, gives our country its nearest approach to the European artist last mentioned: I refer to A. S. Baylinson, and do so with the corroboration of men too important to let the criticism be dismissed as merely personal judgment. Despite this, despite the inclusion of men like Pascin who represent a weakening of the modern effort, despite what must be concessions to the idea of showing "what is going on" rather than risking a decision as to what is essential, and despite certain omissions, the representation of men like Pierre Roy, Berman, and Tchelitchev clearly indicates in the museum a sense for the art which shall keep up the creative tradition. Even better evidence on that score is supplied as one is about to leave the building, for just beside the door are the elaborate reproductions the museum has made of the frescoes by Diego Rivera. They gain each time one sees them—which is about the best thing one can say for any art. The people at home, who should go to the exhibition as often as they can, and our tourists returning from Europe (where they have almost certainly seen no better show of modern art this summer), should be reminded that the date of closing is September 30.

WALTER PACH

Films

A, B, C, and D

IT would be a great help for the motion-picture critic if the standards in his field were so solidly established, his hierarchy of values so well defined, that he could make his judgments with even a little of the confidence that characterizes writers on other fields of literature and art. What a help it would be, for example, if he could make use of such a system of evaluations as Mrs. Q. D. Leavis uses in her study of the contemporary novel, "Fiction and the Reading Public," published in England last year. According to Mrs. Leavis that branch of current literature may be tentatively classified with respect to its readers as:

- A. "Highbrow."
- B. "Middlebrow" read as "literature."
- C. "Middlebrow" not read as literature, but not writing for the lowbrow market.
- D. Absolute best-sellers.

Mrs. Leavis of course offers some explanation for the terms employed in each of her categories; but these terms involve further terms requiring definition; and in the end everything depends pretty much on the assumption that critic and reader understand what is being talked about. It is not possible to make use of such a system with the same certainty in discussing the current cinema because there does not as yet exist such an easy understanding between critic and reader. And it is of course by no means likely that a system which is appropriate for the modern novel will also be appropriate for the motion picture. But assuming that the basis of the method would be the same—namely, a classification based on the different levels of audience response—it may be interesting to see what happens if one applies Mrs. Leavis's A, B, C, and D to a few recent pictures.

A. "Another Language" (Capitol) is not a "highbrow" film in intention or appeal; but it is very much better than most highbrow pictures turn out to be and better than a great many highbrows deserve from Hollywood. It is a faithful version of the stage play by Rose Franken which played on Broadway through two seasons and which was as highbrow as anything in the theater nowadays not written by S. N. Behrman. Its subject is the old conflict between youth and the older generation, as represented in the efforts of an intelligent young woman to survive in the hideous atmosphere of an American domestic matriarchy. (Although the characters are not Jewish, it would have been very much better if Miss Franken had had the courage to come out honestly and admit they could not be anything else.) There are reminiscences of both "The First Year" and "The Silver Cord," but Miss Franken's play is neither so sentimental as the first nor so tediously explicit in stating its thesis as the second. The dialogue is naturalistic dialogue at its best, the development of situations dramatic without becoming melodramatic. In the screen version prepared by Herman Mankiewicz and Donald Ogden Stewart none of these virtues is lost and some additional ones are created. In the first place, the casting, which is so important in such a picture, is pretty close to perfect. The late Louise Closser Hale is superbly restrained as the mother jealous of her youngest son's wife, and Helen Hayes, as the wife, is freer from exaggerated charm and eager wistfulness than she has appeared so far on the screen. Even Robert Montgomery, under Edward H. Griffith's suavely modulated direction, shows an ability to adjust himself to the demands of an unsympathetic role. Honors for the male acting, however, go not to Mr. Montgomery but to John Beal, a young actor who appeared in the original production and who gives the most authentic portrayal of inarticulate passion that the recent screen has seen. It will be interesting to see what Hollywood will do with this fine actor, who is suited for so many roles and who seems too sincere to be very easily corrupted. The thoroughly adult level of its story, acting, and direction makes "Another Language" a picture which any highbrow can admire without loss of taste. There is in fact one scene which only the real highbrow is likely to appreciate to the full: the scene in which the young wife and her lovesick nephew are forced to dance with each other against their will before the eyes of the assembled clan. The movements of their dance, set in contrast with the rigorous line of the watching family, produce an effect almost like that of ritual: a formalization of action and posture which intensifies the tragic emotion. But, at the same time, Variety is already able to report how many "grand" the film is earning in the provinces.

B. This is what Mrs. Leavis has to say of the pseudo-literary "middlebrow" novelists: "A representative criticism from the high-level reader would be that they bring nothing to the novel but commonplace sentiments and an outworn technique . . . echoes of the Best People of the Past." Substitute picture for novel, vulgar for commonplace, and Best Directors for Best People, and you have a pretty fair notion of what is the real trouble with Rouben Mamoulian's "The Song of Songs" (Criterion). After Dwight MacDonald's strictures against this director in the Symposium, it seems hardly necessary to insist again on the tawdriness, triteness, and almost total lack of originality of his directorial style. He is the cinema equivalent of the Thornton Wilders and the Edna Millays, the master of the faux bon and the speciously artistic. There is not an effect

RESORTS

RESORTS

RESORTS

We Planned For Your Labor Day Week-End Months Ahead!

... and now in the earthly paradise of KENT, CONN., not a thing has been omitted to make this holiday a merry one for you. Sport tournaments... exhibitions... carnivals... delightful cuisine and accommodations. Make your reservations in advance, if possible.

Friday Supper through Monday Dinner $16.50
Complete

Special Week-end Excursion Ticket from New York—$3.70 Round Trip

Write for Descriptive Booklet and Road Map

"MICKLEY" MICHAELS, Mgr.

CAMP MILFORD

1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C. PENNSYLVANIA 6-7842

FOREST AND STREAM CLUB

An Ideal Adult Camp with Ideals
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.

Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.

RATES REDUCED TO 1/2 PER WEEK AND UP
Eleven Years of Highly Satisfactory Service

55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C.

Penn. 6-7964

SPEND YOUR VACATION

Where you get the best rates:—August $18 to $25

All Indoor and Outdoor Sports. Excellent Food. Write for Booklet.

TROUT LAKE CAMP

At Trout Lake in the Heart of the Adirondacks
LAKE GEORGE, N. Y. Tel. Bolton 96
N. Y. Office—11 W. 42 St., Tel. Penn. 6-6625-6477

Walden

formerly SCOPUS

The GLORIOUS VACATIONLAND

in the Adirondacks
for

LABOR DAY

Special rates are in effect for the Labor Day week-end at Walden. Every facility for sport, fun and comfort at the Adult Camp of Distinction. Communicate now, for reservations.

Camp Walden

P. O. LAKE GEORGE, NEW YORK

New York City Office:

11 WEST 42nd ST.

Penn 6-8569

Come
THE WEEK-END OF AUGUST 26th for the

HALL JOHNSON CHOIR

Stay a Week at Regular Rates

ENJOY

LABOR DAY WEEK-END

GIANT MARDI GRAS PROGRAM!

Fiesta, Fireworks, Confetti, Favorite

Artists of the Season

THREE FULL DAYS OF FUN—$16.50

UNITY HOUSE

FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA

New York Office
3 WEST 16th ST.
CHelsea 3-2148

Village of ARMONK BREEZEMONT NEW YORK
A charming old country home on 110 acres of beautiful rolling country.

35 minutes from Broadway
Private Lake—Tennis—All outdoor sports
Cuisine by Ray Davidson Rosenbaum formerly of the Russian Inn

Reasonable Accommodations Reasonable Rates
Ideal for long or short vacations Telephone Armonk Village 111

THE GROUP

Has arranged for a series of talks by outstanding speakers beg. Sept. 5, at

TIMBERLAND

For Information
and Booklet

In The Adirondacks

Address: Timberland, 33 West 42 St., N. Y. C.
Telephone: PENnsylvania 6-7663

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y.

Phone: 111

Formerly a millionaire's estate. 150 acres, most beautifully landscaped. Private lake. All sport facilities on premises; saddle horses and nearby golf. Many attractions. 1 1/2 hours Erie R. R. or Route 17.

OPEN ALL YEAR

A Modern Camp
for Adults

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group

Sept. Rate, $21.

Beg. Sept. 5th

Superior Cuisine
Golf

Booklet on Request

33 W. 42nd St.

Penn. 6-7663

Round Trip Fare $7.85
In De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND

In The Adirondacks

Pottersville, N. Y., Warren Co.

ESTHER R. KESSLER, Dir.

Cooks Falls Lodge

COOKS FALLS, N. Y.

(Railroad Station, Roscoe, N. Y.)

- An IDEAL recreation spot. Spacious Lobbies, Luxuriously fitted Card Rooms, Bohemian Tea Room and Indian fitted Writing Room.
- Excellent Cuisine. Dietary Laws Observed.
- Private Swimming Pool. Private Lake.
- All Outdoor Sports, including Horseback Riding, Golf.
- Trout Fishing in the Famed Beaverkill River.
- REDUCED RATES.
- Our Beautiful Beer Garden.

Your Vacation can't be spent to better advantage than at

Cooks Falls Lodge

Reduced Railroad Fare to Roscoe, $5.50 Round Trip

WRITE FOR ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONN.

A charming, unpretentious modern camp and old fashioned New England farm—an ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- *Private twin lakes
- *Clay tennis courts
- *Saddle horses and golf nearby
- *Unexcelled cuisine
- *Socials, Theatricals, Comedery

NEW LOW RATES:

One week, $36 Two Weeks
N.Y. Phone: PResident 3-9824

"Send for Booklet"

DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

in his new picture which does not remind us of some other director—from the black-out à la Pabst to the soft-focus apple orchards which Von Stroheim introduced twelve years ago ("The Merry Widow" with Mae Murray) to a camera world which apparently never forgets. The only difference is that in Mr. Mamoulian's orchards there are more blossoms than Von Stroheim ever dreamed of: thus the cinema world progresses. The story of "The Song of Songs" is based on the once very popular play by Sudermann which served as a vehicle for Duse and others. As a vehicle for Marlene Dietrich it permits several radical changes of wardrobe, an opportunity to sing two or three songs very badly, and a pretext for showing her body more completely, by means of a life-size marble statue, than is legal in celluloid. The grotesquely long artificial eyelashes which she wears throughout are emblematic of the palpable falsity of everything in the picture. "The Song of Songs," because it is insincere "highbrow," will succeed, if at all, only with the lowest levels of the "lowbrow." For, oddly enough, it is more difficult to be persuasively meretricious in the films than in either poetry or fiction.

C. "Three-Cornered Moon" (Paramount) offers an example of a picture which was distinctly more "highbrow" on the stage than it is on the screen. (This, to be sure, is the more common phenomenon.) The reason lies principally in the casting: Mary Boland is not able to communicate quite the same quality of mad distraction as Cecilia Loftus, and Claudette Colbert is certainly a less skilful purveyor of the neurotic humors of the time than Ruth Gordon. Miss Tonkonogy's tenuously nuanced application of the Chekhovian technique to depression troubles in a Brooklyn household suffers from a certain bluntness in the direction as well as from the acting. The "mad Rimplegars" are too well provided with motives; their Brooklyn stronghold takes on too many features of Californian splendor. Moreover, the artist who refuses to work is made an unrelievedly despicable person—which is perhaps the most definite of the sops it offers to the "middlebrow" public. "The Big Brain" (Roxy) is a much more clean-cut specimen of the class: it is unmarred by any higher pretensions. With George E. Stone as the barber-shop assistant who rises to be head of a shady stock corporation, it is reminiscent of Robinson's "Easy Money" and other studies of the little man with an inferiority complex. But it is too carelessly put together to make much of an appeal even on its own level.

D. If Mr. Burroughs's Tarzan books are not beyond the reach of an eight-year-old mind, the movie versions of them may be said to reduce the age limit by three or four years. In fact, even an intelligent child of five might find something embarrassing in the manner in which an unfortunate young athlete named Buster Crabbe is required to jump about from tree to tree, caress synthetic Hollywood apes, and make hideously inhuman noises. In such a picture as "Tarzan the Fearless" (Roxy) we reach what Mrs. Leavis calls the "absolute" on the lower end of the vertical scale of democratic art. We touch the depths, and there is a certain satisfaction in the realization. For to have such an absolute is to make possible such a scale as we have just employed. And the existence of such a scale is a helpful aid in preserving at once our faith in the movies and our sanity after attending them.

WILLIAM TROY

Contributors to This Issue

HUBERT HERRING is the executive director of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is a Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

JAMES P. GIFFORD is assistant professor of law and assistant to the dean of the Columbia University Law School.

C. DAY LEWIS, an English poet, is the author of "The Magnetic Mountain."

EVELYN SCOTT, author of "The Wave," "Escapade," and "Eva Gay," lived in South America for several years.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN, Russian correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, is the author of "Soviet Russia. A Living Record and a History."

LOUIS BARTLETT is a San Francisco attorney who has represented various cities in public-utility cases.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS lives in California and is the author of "Ambrose Bierce," and "The New Regionalism in American Literature."

WALTER PACH, painter and critic, is the author of "The Masters of Modern Art" and "Ananias: or the False Artist."

□ POSITION WANTED □

GRADUATE Princeton, also Columbia Law School, 36, unmarried, Virginian, desires position. Trained in law, finance, economics. Familiar with governmental procedure and practice. Ability to write forcefully and succinctly. Box 214, c/o The Nation.

HIGHLY EDUCATED TEACHER, Ph.D., grown somewhat deaf, would like opening in special or private library work, encyclopedia or dictionary compilation, or the like. Especially interested in the Classics and Elizabethan Literature. Write Box 216, c/o The Nation.

□ HELP WANTED □

POWER and light employees wanted as union organizers for nation-wide NRA campaign. Splendid opportunity. Write qualifications. Brotherhood of Edison Employees. 128 E. 16 St., N.Y.C.

See Pages 251 and iii for Labor Day Resort Advertisements.

To Nation Readers

For intelligent employees advertise in The Nation.

You reach fewer readers than through a large newspaper, but those you reach are worth while.

18 words $1.86

Each additional 6 words,
$.62

Cortlandt 7-3330

20 VESEY STREET

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

□ PERSONAL □

FOREIGNERS, advanced, wanted to open joint Music Studio with pianist. West Bronx. She'll share rent. Box 215, c/o The Nation.

"VAINLY EMULATING DIOGENES!" wrote a prospect of his predicament in being mentally marooned in Moronia. After joining Contacts, only correspondence club for the intellectually isolated, he now has attained the gift of the gods, intelligent friends! Unusual books loaned free. Send 3c stamp for particulars to Contacts, Box 91, Station D, New York, N. Y.

WANT to rent a small house, vicinity of Peekskill, residential section, furnished or unfurnished. Must have sleeping porch. State price. Box 217, c/o The Nation.

SHOPPERS CORNER

INDIVIDUAL DRESSMAKING—dresses, suits, coats, alterations carefully made. Fittings in your own home. Very moderate charges. For appointments phone HOneywood 6-1179 or STuyvesant 9-8910 (evenings only) Natalie Gomez.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1933

No. 3557

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	253
EDITORIALS:
Liquor Control	255
The Reichstag Fire	256
Diego Rivera at Work	257
Back to the Bicycle?	258
ISSUES AND MEN. THEY WILL NEVER LEARN. By Oswald Garrison Villard	259
SPAIN'S UNFINISHED REVOLUTION. By Paul Blanshard	260
HIGH FINANCE IN BOSTON. By Henry W. Harris	262
THE ARTIST AND THE DEPRESSION. By Suzanne La Follette	264
HOME-OWNERS IN REVOLT. By James Steele	266
WHY THE MILK FARMERS STRUCK. By Robert Whitcomb	267
THE NAZI HEXENKESSEL	269
SONNET. By Mark Van Doren	270
AFTERNOON AT HYDE PARK. By Margaret Marshall	270
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	271
CORRESPONDENCE	272
BOOKS:
Before the Summer Goes. By David Morton	274
A Note on Gertrude Stein. By William Troy	274
Can Cuba Recover? By Leland Hamilton Jenks	275
The Giants of Wall Street. By Peter Helmoop Noyes	276
Brilliant and Tedious. By Erskine Caldwell	277
"Then I Saw the Congo . . ." By Melville J. Herskovits	277
A Dated Liberal. By Lawrence Dennis	278
Shorter Notices	278
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	280

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IT MAY VERY WELL BE that Mr. Moley's resignation as Assistant Secretary of State really was made mainly for the purpose of assuming the editorship of the new national weekly to be published by Vincent Astor. The editorship of the weekly apparently carries with it a salary substantially larger than Mr. Moley was receiving in his official position, and if the new organ is generally regarded as offering a quasi-official reflection of the Administration's views, it may continue to give Mr. Moley great influence. In spite of these considerations, however, Washington will probably persist in seeing the resignation as the logical outcome of the conflict between Mr. Moley and Mr. Hull at London. Mr. Moley, officially subordinate to Mr. Hull, was unofficially, because of his close friendship with the President, Mr. Hull's superior in influence. This anomalous position was in itself almost certain to prove embarrassing to both men even if their political and economic views had been substantially the same, and even if they could otherwise have got along together personally. But Mr. Hull's pronouncements in favor of international cooperation were being constantly repudiated by Mr. Moley's in favor of economic nationalism, and this conflict came to a head, of course, at the London conference. The President's curt rejection of the currency-stabilization plan agreed to by Mr. Moley was his first public repudiation of the latter's advice, and the quick transfer of the professor to an investigation of racketeering shortly after that seemed merely another step in rejecting him as an economic adviser, but whether his resignation will mean that Mr. Roosevelt will once more turn to policies of international cooperation rather than of "intranationalism" it is too early to say.

THE AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS succeeded where the steel industry failed in inserting into their code a statement which protects the open shop against the forays of organized labor. The phraseology is innocent, and ostensibly impartial. It is merely stated that "employers in this industry may exercise their right to select, retain, or advance employees on the basis of individual merit without regard to their membership or non-membership in any organization." But labor knows quite as well as the automobile manufacturers that the privilege of hiring, firing, and promoting on the basis of "individual merit" is the historic weapon with which American employers have broken up union after union in this country. It may be argued that since labor unions have never been able of their own efforts permanently to organize workers in the automobile trades they should not now be given a legal advantage over the employers. But this argument overlooks the power of the industry—highly organized and thoroughly familiar with American industrial history—which has exerted every pressure within its command to keep unions out. In Detroit, particularly, this power has been backed by a press which has advertised the open shop as Detroit's greatest claim to fame. That the government should now, in however innocent terms, give its blessing to that claim is a blow to organized labor not only in Detroit but wherever it is not already strongly entrenched. It will tend to keep the unorganized out of unions, and, unfortunately, that term covers the great majority of American workers. The government has denied that the statement in the automobile code is to be regarded as a precedent, but precedents cannot be so easily ruled out.

GROVER WHALEN has invented a new crime. Its name is "disorderly interference with the NRA" and to commit it consists in picketing an NRA employer. This is not a joke. Mr. Whalen, who is in charge of the NRA drive in New York City, is seriously planning to prosecute a picket on the charge quoted above, and to attempt to prove in court that the right to carry on even orderly picketing has been suspended by the NRA program. His contention that it has is ardently sustained by Chief Inspector O'Brien of the New York police force, who unhesitatingly and unblushingly asserts that "any interference with the recovery act" is "in the nature of a conspiracy against the United States." Without wishing to exaggerate the importance of these manifestations of local ebullience we believe that they demonstrate beyond any argument the likelihood that absurd and abusive methods will be employed under what Heywood Broun has called "the stress of hoopla." As usual, repressive measures are first threatened against the extreme left-wing opposition. So far The Nation has not been had up in court for questioning the methods or rulings of the NRA. But when officials begin inventing new offenses and talking about conspiracy, the mildest of us had better look to our liberties. Heywood Broun objects to The Nation's insistence upon the value of criticism even in time of dire national recovery. "There is nothing in the law," he says, "which even dimly suggests that anybody in the government has the right to go down to 20 Vesey Street and confiscate The Nation's putty blower." You wait, Heywood; after Grover Whalen has arrested all the anti-NRA pickets, he may get round to us bourgeois liberals, even those who, like you and us, support the general aims of the Recovery Administration. The charge will probably be "editorial trifling with that bird." Meanwhile, we shall continue to support the right of workers to strike and picket against low wages and bad conditions even when they occur under the wings of the eagle.

IT IS DIFFICULT at this time to gauge the precise importance of the international agreement on wheat control reached at London. Its reception by the world's markets was cool and guarded. On the day following the agreement wheat rose in price about 2 or 3 per cent, but it is quite possible that so moderate a rise might have occurred even if there had been no conference. At the moment what seems most cheerful and most important is the fact that more than twenty nations have been able to reach any agreement at all. If this means that at last a step has been taken away from economic nationalism and toward international cooperation, it would be gratifying not only for itself but as an omen. But even a brief consideration of the text of the agreement and of the obstacles still in the way compels one to take an attitude as guarded as that of the markets. The agreement has still to be ratified by the legislatures of all the nations involved, and this obstacle alone may prove insuperable. The Russian delegates have already refused to say by how much they would be willing to limit their exports. The agreement as it stands fixes a general export maximum for all exporting countries for the current crop year—August 1, 1933, to July 31, 1934—of 560,000,000 bushels, and in the following crop year exports are to be limited "to maximum figures 15 per cent less in the case of each country than the average turnout on average acreage sown during this period of 1931-33, inclusive, after deducting the normal domestic requirements." The Balkan countries agree to restrict their exports of wheat both in the current and in the next crop year to 50,000,000 bushels a year. The importing countries agree not to encourage the extension of wheat acreage, and even to relax import quota restrictions and reduce wheat tariffs if the price of wheat for four months running averages higher than 63.08 cents in gold a bushel—about 90 cents at current exchange rates.

THIS AGREEMENT leaves innumerable loopholes. The importing countries promise, in effect, to do nothing at all to help wheat until wheat has first shown its ability to help itself. If the price falls, so that conditions become worse, the importing countries will help to prolong that situation by retaining their tariffs and quotas. But even if the price rises, the importing countries have promised nothing very specific. An importing country could technically fulfil its promise merely by reducing, say, a tariff of 100 per cent to one of 99 per cent. It has, in addition, the saving provision that "the degree of protection adopted should be primarily dependent upon domestic conditions within each country"—which means, in effect, that each country can do what it likes. On the side of the exporting countries, it is still not clear what is to become of the wheat not exported. Is it to pile up for two years so that it can smother the market at the end of that time? If there is to be reduced production, how is that to be administered and enforced? The problem is baffling enough within a single country, and the difficulties increase enormously as between rival countries.

THE REMOVAL from the Chicago Board of Trade of the restrictions aimed at setting a minimum price for wheat marks the end, we hope, of a foolish policy. That policy was not justified either by general considerations or by the special situation that had developed. In four months wheat had registered the almost unparalleled rise in such a period of 150 per cent—ten times as great as the advance in the general average of commodity prices—and then had broken 30 per cent. The Administration seemed to regard the rise as normal and the break as the result of speculative manipulation, whereas a sharp break was only to be expected after so excessive an advance. Apart from these special considerations, it is obvious that the fixing of arbitrary minimum prices can in the long run only be harmful. If the prices fixed by the forces of supply and demand are higher than the official minimum prices, then the latter are unnecessary; but if market prices would otherwise have been lower, then the only effect of the minimum prices must be either to drive trading to other markets or to bring it practically to a standstill, so that sellers cannot get rid of their supply at the minimums fixed or at any other figure. Neither the wheat growers nor any other class of producers can be helped by this means. Such criticism does not apply to the regulations governing the maximum fluctuations of wheat and other grains in any one trading day. These can do very little harm, for they can bring trading to a standstill only for a day or two; whereas, on the other hand, they may to some extent check purely speculative drives. The new regulations raising the margins necessary on any wheat held in excess of 6,000,000 bales are a sound means of reducing excessive speculation by individuals and should do much to protect the market against forced liquidation.

UNDER COVER of the public excitement attending the NRA campaign the State Department is slipping rapidly back into its old ways. The permanent officials of the department are clearly bent on resurrecting the dollar diplomacy of Philander C. Knox and Frank B. Kellogg. Nor does the Administration seem to be greatly concerned. The appointment of Jefferson Caffery as Ambassador to Cuba, discussed in these columns last week, is a case in point. No less ominous is the British-American ultimatum delivered to Liberia on August 25. In this note the State Department and the British Foreign Office bluntly told Liberia that it must accept the infamous League "plan of assistance" without further delay. It must also release certain unidentified political prisoners. Who these prisoners may be we can only guess.

Presumably they are Liberian politicians who have sided with the Firestone interests. The penalty to be meted out to Liberia if it refuses to yield is only hinted at in the British-American note. Yet there can be no doubt about the nature of this penalty. Among them the Firestone interests, the bankers, and the diplomats can quickly reduce Liberia to utter destitution. They need only turn the screws a little tighter, for the Firestone people, with the help of the State Department, have already brought the African republic to the verge of bankruptcy. Naturally the ultimatum was delivered in secrecy. The State Department had difficulty in concealing its consternation when it learned that the news of the ultimatum had reached friends of Liberia in this country.

ONCE MORE the British government has released Gandhi from Yerovda jail in order to avoid the consequences of his death in prison. At the time of his release, which was unconditional, Gandhi was in the eighth day of a "fast unto death" which he undertook when the government refused to allow him the privileges he thought necessary for his work for the untouchables. So the contest between Gandhi and the British raj goes on. And the government, so far, has made all of the concessions. It will make a great many more if necessary rather than let Gandhi die in its custody. As we write, he has made no announcement of his plans. Some correspondents have taken his characteristic statement that he will seek peace more eagerly than imprisonment as an indication that he will abandon civil disobedience. In a world of human fallibility it is not surprising that the correspondents, like the British government, have never found it quite possible to believe, in spite of endless lessons, that Gandhi does not compromise, but it is very probable that the accustomed round will shortly begin again and that Gandhi will be in prison once more after another attempt at civil disobedience.

THE PENNSYLVANIA SWEATSHOP received a good deal of publicity in May when Mrs. Gifford Pinchot joined a "children's strike" and a joint legislative committee was appointed to investigate the charges of starvation wages, intolerable working conditions, and enforced immorality made against the employers by fifteen- and sixteen-year-old girls and boys. The testimony before the committee, particularly the tales of immorality, were given much space in the daily press which knows news when it sees it. But the press has a habit of leaving the denouement of some of its best stories to the imagination of its readers, and the end of the sweatshop tale was told either very quietly or not at all. From a correspondent we learn that at the conclusion of the investigation the majority of the committee decided to do exactly nothing. "Any hasty actions or recommendations for minimum-wage laws at the present time," said State Senator G. Mason Owlett, who was chairman, "might conflict with the smooth functioning of the NIRA." The mill owners, needless to say, were quick to agree. In fact, they had expressed the same opinion shortly before, when Franklin Spencer Edmonds, appearing as an attorney for numerous owners at the final hearing, urged that the committee adjourn for six months without taking any action or making any recommendations. "In that time some of these things will work themselves out," he said.

CHAIRMAN OWLETT not only heartily agreed that it would be best not to "muddy the waters" but went on to say with an impartiality that might well become a mill owner that sweatshops represent merely "abnormal conditions existing in some industries." His final claim to impartiality is to be found in his additional remark that "it is unfair to suppose that the industrial establishment, generally speaking, is other than wholesome and decent." This remark was uttered following a month of hearings at which children testified that they had received wages of eighteen cents to three dollars for a week of fifty to seventy hours; and that girls had been forced to accept the attentions of their employers or lose their miserable jobs. So far the only result of the "children's strike" and its widespread publicity is the arrest of one mill owner on charges of violating the Mann Act. There is, however, one bright note to be recorded. An enlightened minority of the committee, including Mrs. Pinchot, Judge Horace Stern, and Clarence J. Moser, will probably issue a report of their own which will spare neither the industrial establishment nor the mill owners. And an even brighter spot is visible on the Pennsylvania labor horizon. It is the figure of Charlotte Carr, former colleague of Frances Perkins, who has recently been appointed Secretary of Labor for Pennsylvania. The sweatshops are likely to find her a more vigorous opponent even than the Blue Eagle of the NRA.

Liquor Control

ON the assumption that the result of the vote in Washington—which will be known before this issue of The Nation reaches its readers—will follow that in Texas, every one of the twenty-four States that have so far held a referendum on the Eighteenth Amendment has voted to repeal it. The ratifications of only twelve more States are needed, and as fourteen more States will vote between now and November 7, it seems almost certain that the amendment will be repealed in three months from now. Yet curiously little attention is being paid to the formidable problem of liquor control which will then immediately confront us. At the insistence of Governor Lehman the New York legislature has passed a temporary control bill that will be effective between the repeal of prohibition and April 1 next; but the overwhelming majority of the States have taken no action whatever.

Congress will probably be called upon to act on liquor control as soon as it meets in December. Its action must, of course, be quite limited in scope. Some reformers have suggested, for example, that the federal government itself take over the manufacture and sale of liquor, but obviously Congress will be unable to consider this. It will not merely lack any constitutional power to do so, but any popular mandate. The popular mandate, on the contrary, in so far as we have been given any direct knowledge of it, is precisely the opposite: the federal government is being ordered, in effect, to return the larger control to the States.

Congress will, however, have at least the same powers that it had before the Eighteenth Amendment was passed: it will still be able to regulate liquor in so far as it can do so under its general powers of controlling interstate commerce, and it will retain the tremendous power of taxation. The principles that should control this taxation are clear. The excise tax on liquor should be designed to raise close to the maximum possible revenue. This does not, of course, mean the highest possible tax rate, for a rate beyond a certain point may discourage consumption or provoke evasion to such an extent that it will lead to a smaller total revenue than a lower tax rate would induce. But liquor is a commodity of which it is desirable to discourage rather than encourage the production and consumption. Further, although the rehabilitation and erection of breweries and distilleries is rapidly getting under way, the federal government is still in the rarely fortunate position of dealing with a liquor industry that has not yet reached the full growth that it would attain if given free rein. The government, therefore, need not hesitate lest its action threaten to injure or destroy an already established industry or to throw legally employed men out of work.

One further qualification must be made, of course, concerning the excise-tax rate on liquor. It should not be so high as to furnish too strong a motive for evasion. It is not merely, as we have already remarked, that so high a tax might lead to the collection of a smaller total revenue—for it is possible that a high total revenue might be obtained even with fairly widespread evasion—but it is of the utmost importance not to perpetuate or to raise up again an army of bootleggers and their allied lawbreakers and criminals. It would be better to lose considerable revenue than to put on successful evasion a premium so high that ordinary means of law enforcement cannot adequately cope with it.

A still further principle should guide the federal government's liquor-tax policy. The tariff rates on imported liquor should in no case be higher than the excise duties on similar kinds of domestic liquor. We recognize that politically it will be extremely difficult to put such a principle into effect. The attempt to enact it would instantly confront a powerful and determined opposition; the brewers, the distillers, the California grape growers, and possibly even the farmers who raise the grains from which beer and whiskey are ultimately made, will be represented by energetic and perhaps none too scrupulous lobbyists. If this plan were seriously discussed, they would talk ruin; they would be astounded at the lack of patriotism shown in throwing the rich American market open to foreign sellers, and they would of course allege that we were preventing the creation of jobs for thousands of American workmen, and even that we were throwing those already in jobs out of them. But every rational consideration dictates that the tariff on liquor should be solely for the sake of revenue and not for "protection." In the present case not one of the usual arguments for protection has any force. Above all, not the principle of "self-containment." There is not only no peacetime or military need for a great liquor industry in America; it is of the highest importance that we should not create one. The constant and sinister power and influence of the liquor interests in American politics in the old days were not the least important of the evils that brought the demand for prohibition. That power and influence must be kept to a minimum, and one way of keeping them so is to hold the domestic liquor industry itself to a minimum. Even with foreign and domestic liquor competing on equal terms, there will be plenty of room for all the grape growers, brewers, and distillers already established. The contention that American labor will be hurt is the exact opposite of the truth. For imports of foreign liquor will provide the necessary purchasing power for foreign nations to begin taking imports from us again, so that our desperately crippled export industries—of which cotton and wheat are not the least important—can win back part of their markets and restore the Americans engaged in them to employment and a decent livelihood. Further, the opening of a good market, for example, to British whiskeys and French wines, is almost certain to lead to a lowering of the British and French tariffs against us.

So much for the federal-government program. All other regulations will of course come within the power of the States. At the very least the States and municipalities should adopt regulations similar to those prevailing in England, where the number and neighborhood of the "pubs" are controlled, and limitations on the hours during which liquor may be served by them are strictly enforced. For example, in some districts no liquor whatever may be sold in the morning, and only, say, between the hours of twelve and two at midday and between five and twelve in the evening. It is to be hoped, also, that at least some of the States will themselves take over the sale and perhaps even the manufacture of liquor. The result of the two systems operating side by side might provide us with a real basis of comparison.

The Reichstag Fire

THE trial of the five men charged with the burning of the Reichstag has been set for September 21. Preliminary hearings will be held in Berlin, in the Reichstag building, to inspect the scene of the crime. The trial itself will take place in the Reichsgericht building in Leipzig.

Five men have been indicted for this incendiary crime: the Communist, Torgler, deputy and leader of his party's Reichstag group; Dimitrow, Tanew, and Popow, Bulgarian Communists; and the Dutchman, Van der Lubbe, who was discovered in the building immediately after the fire and confessed to the deed. But what of the other four? "While certain details remain mysterious," writes the Manchester Guardian, "for example, the part played by the Nazi agent, Van der Lubbe, the complicity of the Hitler Government in setting fire to its own Parliament must now be taken as an established fact." "While Dr. Ernst Oberfohren was still alive," the article continues, referring to the leader of the German Nationalist People's Party, the publication of whose memorandum on the Reichstag fire in the Guardian immediately after the fire resulted in the alleged suicide of its author, "his connection with the memorandum had to remain secret, but since his death there is no reason left for secrecy. It was his wish that the memorandum should be published, for he was a man of high principles and strongly disapproved of the methods employed by the Hitler dictatorship. He considered the Reichstag fire and the connivance of the Nazi leaders Göring and Goebbels an unpardonable outrage and believed that this outrage should be exposed." With these words the great liberal newspaper merely confirms what has long been public knowledge, that the author of the sensational articles it published immediately after the Reichstag fire was none other than the chairman of the German Nationalist People's Party, the intimate friend of Hitler's Minister, Dr. Hugenberg. Dr. Oberföhren's memorandum has now been published in its original form. It shows not only that he was convinced of the complicity of the Nazi Cabinet members, Göring and Goebbels, but that this conviction was shared and openly expressed in the Cabinet by the Nationalist Ministers, Hugenberg, Krosigk-Schwerin, Seldte, and Neurath. Because they hesitated to endanger the government of which they were still a part, perhaps, too, because they feared the vengeance of the Hitler desperadoes, they did not expose the connection of their Nazi colleagues with the incendiary outrage. Their reluctance cost Dr. Oberföhren his life. By their silence they themselves have become partners to the affair and can no longer be counted on as witnesses for the innocence of the accused.

The facts of the case are quickly told. On February 24 the Karl Liebknecht Haus in Berlin, the national headquarters of the German Communist Party, was raided by the police. On February 26 the official National Socialist press service announced that evidence unearthed in underground chambers of the Liebknecht Haus proved that the Communist Party maintained a secret organization in the same building. The police, in the announcement stated, also found detailed plans for a revolutionary uprising in the near future. They promised immediate publication of these documents but none has as yet been released. In his memorandum Dr. Oberföhren insisted that this material was smuggled into the Karl Liebknecht Haus to furnish the desired incriminating evidence against the Communist Party. On February 27, just before 10 p.m., the Reichstag building went up in flames. The police, who were immediately summoned, discovered a seedy-looking individual in the cellars of the Reichstag who was identified by a passport and a Communist membership card found in his trousers pocket as Marinus Van der Lubbe, allegedly a Dutch Communist. The passport, it has since been proved, was forged, as was the membership card of the Dutch Communist Party, from which Van der Lubbe had been expelled two years before because of insubordination and subversive criticism.

He confessed his guilt at once and charged not only the executive of the Communist Party but the Social-Democratic Party also with having incited him to commit the crime. On the following day Deputy Torgler, who had—according to his usual custom—remained in the Reichstag building until late in the evening, was arrested. The Bulgarian Communists were held because foreign Communists living in exile in Germany "are under suspicion in any case of standing in the service of the Communist Party and of serving that party in its terroristic work." Moreover, Van der Lubbe had stated that he was "hired to set fire to the Reichstag by men with a strong foreign accent." It has been asserted, by the way, although this is not yet established, that Van der Lubbe had delivered National Socialist speeches four weeks before.

According to a statement in the Reichspost by Fire Chief Wagner of Vienna:

It would have been impossible for a single person to lay the fire that partly destroyed the German Parliament. Without helpers it would have required hours of undisturbed work to prepare for the conflagration that followed. This was impossible, since groups of deputies met in the building until late in the afternoon. . . . But even more important, how would it have been possible for anyone to transport the required amount of benzine into the building past the guards that stand at every gate? A large number of good-sized cans were undoubtedly required and no trace of them has been found. It seems highly improbable, therefore, that one person, as it is officially reported, could have laid the fire.

Dr. Oberföhren in his memorandum explains what would otherwise remain inexplicable. He shows that the incendiaries, Nazi storm troopers, gained admission to the Reichstag through the heating plant that connects the building with the official residence of the Reichstag president, Göring.

The chiefs of the Hitler Government are undoubtedly the real incendiaries of the Reichstag. They committed the crime to force the suppression of the Communist Party and to justify its suppression before the world. The trial before the Nazi court in Leipzig will be a bloody farce. But the highly qualified international tribunal of noted jurists which is sitting in The Hague has already brought to light so much that proves the guilt of Göring, Goebbels, and their companions that the German government will probably not dare to carry out its murderous intentions.

Diego Rivera at Work

THE best show in New York at the moment is on view at the New Workers' School at 51 West Fourteenth Street. The New Workers' School is an extremely modest institution situated over a store as shoddy as the neighborhood itself. One climbs three flights of stairs, almost vertically, for there is no turn at the tiny landings; one goes past some partitions that break up the loft into schoolrooms; one pays an admission price (minimum) of ten cents; and suddenly one is back in the Florence of the fifteenth century. Or at least the decorations which Diego Rivera is painting on the wall there are in the fresco buono of the old Italians, that sovereign method of painting which Michelangelo, mannerless old anti-feminist that he was, called the work of men, while oil painting, he said, was for women. Few artists since his time have taken up the challenge to use the difficult medium; indeed, it had been so nearly forgotten that considerable experiment was needed to recover the old tradition. It is in respect to the style of painting, its absolute permanence, and its sober and powerful effect, that one may speak here of Florence and the Renaissance. Otherwise, in respect to the ideas expressed, one is in the full tide of modern life and, what is especially notable considering that Rivera is very Mexican even among Mexicans, it is safe to say that most visitors will find themselves plunging deeper into the history of our country than they have done for a long time.

The first scene he has painted is of New York at the time of its colonization; the second is of the Boston Massacre; the third gives us Shay's Rebellion (with a scroll bearing Jefferson's glorious words that the tree of liberty must be watered from time to time with the blood of martyrs and of tyrants); the fourth shows Margaret Fuller, Emerson, Thoreau, and Samuel F. B. Morse, the intellectual leaders of their time, and at the same time the country's material expansion through Hamilton's banking system, the trading of the Astors, and the drive for more territory under James K. Polk. Other scenes from American history are sketched on the panels which Rivera will complete before he goes to Mexico at the beginning of October in order to decorate there the School of Medicine, formerly the Palace of the Inquisition, an assignment which will give full scope to his sense of dramatic contrast and—for all the traditionalism of his medium—his sense of the triumph of our modern time over the dogma of the past. As for his rendering of our own history, the most sluggish and indifferent person must be stirred to pride in his country, even if its darker aspects are recorded with an unsparing hand.

For a month more, then, anyone may watch one of the greatest living mural painters at his work. The admission charge goes toward a fund for preserving the frescoes, which are so made that the separate panels may be detached from the wall whenever the school can move to better quarters. P. T. Barnum, could he come back to earth, might see the chance for showmanship here, but the press has almost ignored it so far, and the New Workers themselves have failed to capitalize the event.

And these paintings are for the public. If the appeal of the ripe development of modern art and of the sight of the man at work are lost for us, we may at least profit by the reminder that the great frescoes of the past, perhaps the supreme testament of the European races, were created for the eyes of all men.

Back to the Bicycle?

IT started in Hollywood, they say, and quickly spread East. In the national capital it is reported to be going strong, and has broken out virulently in New York City. We are talking, of course, about the bicycle fad, which, like that for roller skates, represents one of those familiar swings of the pendulum which continually are bringing back into the present segments of the past.

In Washington even the tandem bicycle, that incomparable first aid to courtship of the Gay Nineties, has reappeared. That Washington should be quick to revive the bicycle is natural, because in the heyday of the "wheel"—as it was then called—the broad, smoothly paved streets of the national capital, comparatively free from commercial traffic, made it a cyclists' paradise. The streets of Washington were practically all paved with asphalt in an era when those of New York and other cities were largely laid with "Belgian blocks" or just cobblestones.

But in spite of congested traffic, New Yorkers are not to be denied their chance at a fad. A firm dealing extensively in articles for sport reports that sales of bicycles are 50 per cent higher than a year ago, and in secluded parts of Central Park intrepid young women are practicing a (to them) new art. Newspapers told the other day of New York twin brothers who returned from the Chicago fair on bicycle back. One of them rode out alone, because the other was a cripple. The parents gave the boy at home enough money to go out and back also—by bus. In Chicago the boys had a second seat fitted over the rear of the bicycle, and hitched on a trailer with a camping outfit. Then they started home, the brother with the whole legs doing the pedaling, and camped out nights along the way.

Of course the bicycle never went out—quite. A good many boys have continued to use it for work or play, and a few men even have ridden bicycles to and from their jobs right through the Dark Ages of the "wheel." But women have hardly been seen on bicycles, in this country at least, for twenty long years. The Gay Nineties were the years when the bicycle was the ruling passion. And rule it did as few means of transportation or methods of sport have ruled before or since. It was the coming of the "safety" bicycle to supersede the old high-wheel model that made the regime possible. The "safety" bicycle made the machine fool-proof and therefore adapted to the multitude. Gradually the adjective "safety" was dropped; for the model soon became the only one. Not that the new model was much easier to ride than the old, but it looked a whole lot easier; and when you fell off you didn't have nearly so far to go.

What a brave cavalcade it was! There were "Saturday-and-Sunday" riders then just as there are "Saturday-and-Sunday" drivers nowadays. The smooth streets of the cities and the fairly passable roads into the country hummed and whirled with wheels; riders went forth alone, in couples, or in groups and companies; there were thousands of bicycle clubs—a few still survive—with all the glamor and prestige of golf or yacht clubs today. Bicycling was a far more sociable and gregarious sport than automobiling ever has been or can be. Women fell captive to it almost to the same extent as men, and the craze for speed on the roads—say fifteen frightful miles an hour!—was as rampant then as today, though not as dangerous. The man who turned his handle bars low, bent down his face almost to meet them, crooked his back like a camel's hump, and then pedaled for dear life, regardless of scenery, pleasure, or the rights of pedestrians or other cyclists, was a "scorcher." The "scorcher" of the bicycle age was the same kind of fool—though less of a menace—as the driver who races his car through the public streets today. Means of transit change, but human nature and the percentage of fools remain fairly constant.

The tandem wheel was the ne plus ultra of the bicycle age. There was romance even in the Gay Nineties—little as the younger generation of today believes it—and many a sedate matron of 1933 took her first ride down Lover's Lane on a tandem. Naturally the bicycle was introduced into many of the popular songs of its day, but it was the tandem which inspired the greatest ditty, the single one perhaps which any number of persons can recall today:

Da-a-isy, Da-a-isy,
Give me your answer true!
I'm half cra-a-zy,
All for the love of you.
It won't be a sty-y-lish marriage;
I can't afford a carriage;
But you'll look sweet upon the seat
Of a bicycle built for two.

Yes, it was a brave cavalcade, the bicycle parade of the Gay Nineties—and almost a decade after. Can it come back—in any other, that is, than a sporadic, partial, and temporary way? No, not unless the new devotion to the old sport should be strong enough to produce special paths for bicycles along our roadways. The bicycle and the automobile can't live on the same pathway. At least the bicycle can't.

Issues and Men

They Will Never Learn

I HAVE never been of those who have admired the intellectual powers of the great bankers and captains of industry, so long the masters of our national fate. They have usually seemed to me extraordinarily narrow and shortsighted, owing their dominance to luck and influence or to talent along one single line; just as Henry Ford owed his phenomenal rise to the creation of a single motor and to a single idea—cheap mass production to put the horse and buggy out of business. We newspapermen are ourselves very largely responsible for the American habit of regarding successful rich men—and for leading them to regard themselves—as omnipotent and wise beyond their generation. Our great newspapers toady to wealth and rush off as often as possible to a Gary or a Kahn or a Myron Taylor for an opinion on any subject. Only a few of the magnates, like the present J. P. Morgan and Andrew Mellon, deny themselves to reporters and keep their mouths shut. Usually they proceed to air their views—only to reveal their mental mediocrity, their sometimes incredible stupidity, and their always complete ignorance of what the masses of their fellow-citizens are thinking about and desiring. They never learn.

I am moved to these thoughts by the obstinate and stupid attitude taken by the automobile manufacturers, the oil men, and the steel and coal barons toward the NRA and the question of codes. Now it is obvious that the adoption of a code is anything but a simple matter, meaning as it does a mental and business revolution, often the end of an era of complete selfishness and ruthless, underhand business competition. The technical difficulties in the way must often be very great. But the attitude of the leaders of these several industries reveals again that they never learn. The recovery act is clear and plain concerning its general objects, and quite frank in its statements that criminal punishments will be meted out to those who disobey. But the "great" business men involved in these major industries had neither the gumption nor the common sense to take a helpful and constructive and cooperative attitude. It may be a terrible trial to them to have to yield on the open shop, but it is inevitable. So why not be pleasant about it? That would pay. But no, they have taken the opposite course; they have been silly enough, some of them, to refuse to meet with William Green. Now I personally do not like Mr. Green either, or believe in him as a labor leader. But if I were in their place I would yield to circumstances and swallow the dose. The trouble is that these captains of industry have not yet learned that their old order is dead, killed by their own selfishness, stupidity, and shortsightedness.

Let us take another case—that of Machado in Cuba. The daily press has reminded the public of the luncheon given for Machado in 1927 in Wall Street by several of the great magnates, and have reprinted Thomas W. Lamont's fervent remark on that occasion that he "would like to see Machado President of Cuba indefinitely." As I was a guest I have never written of what occurred at that luncheon. Now that the facts are out, I shall merely say that for crassness it exceeded in many respects anything I have ever listened to. Machado revealed himself completely. He assured his hosts that as long as he was President their investments in Cuba would be as safe as those in the United States; that there would be neither revolutions nor labor troubles as long as he sat in the presidential chair. He would fix any one who tried to make trouble. As I walked away with a prominent, liberal, and today still unbesmirched banker, he said sarcastically: "That's the kind of talk I like to hear," with a smile which revealed how he felt. "Look at your shoes," I replied, "Machado has not left a bit of blacking on them; they are licked clean." Never have I seen more smug satisfaction than that expressed by the other bankers and business men present—there were fully forty if not fifty of them, and some of them have figured considerably in the press since that time in ways they have not liked. It is not surprising, after such support, that Machado believed that he could have his way with the Cuban people without hindrance.

The point is that these bankers had no greater wisdom or wider vision than to think that Machado was the kind of man who ought to rule Cuba, and that it was to their interest to have him in the Palace at Havana. They could not see, and I doubt if they yet can see, that that speech of Machado's stamped him as totally unfit to rule over a single human being, and certainly as the very last man they should have backed, or induced the State Department to back, under Coolidge and Hoover. They paid no attention to the warnings of The Nation and the liberal press. They knew better, and so they winked at Machado's record of incredible cruelty and wholesale murder to the end. If some day their heads "roll in the sand," as Hitler once put it, they will until the last be as surprised and pained and filled with resentment at the bitter injustice of it as the French aristocrats were when they mounted the guillotine. They will never learn.

The truth is that, as I know them, they are neither very bright nor very learned; their mental processes are befogged by their complete certainty that they possess greater wisdom and intelligence than anybody else—especially than those whom they are pleased to call radicals. They are, I admit, sometimes efficient in their special lines. But when one gets beyond that, beyond the scope of their daily luncheon horizon, it is appalling how limited their views are and how narrowly they are hedged in by their prejudices. Often their power has completely gone to their heads. I was talking the other day with one who knows the Morgans well. He thought Mr. Morgan and Mr. Whitney had made an extremely good showing on the stand in Washington—granted our peculiar American brand of business ethics. But he added: "What I cannot stand about them is their smug sureness that they know better than anybody else how everybody else should act."

Dwight Garrison Villard

Spain's Unfinished Revolution

By PAUL BLANSHARD

Madrid, July 27

IN the sun-drenched streets of the Spanish capital no sign is visible that a revolution has taken place or that another may come soon. Occasional groups of civil guards with black patent-leather tricorne hats stalk about, supplementing the white-helmeted policemen. Several truckloads of blue-uniformed shock troops of the republic are trundled across the city daily, ready for riot duty, but there have been no riots recently. The government has been shrewd enough to act before the event. Secret meetings that may lead to revolt are watched from within and without and their leaders sent to prison promptly. On July 22 and 23 "extremists" of the right and the left to the number of 116 were quietly arrested in Madrid and other Spanish cities.

Trial or no trial, these prisoners may not see freedom again for many months, since even under the republic political prisoners may be held almost a year without trial. Some of them may be sent to North Africa, to which the republican revolutionists who are now in power were consigned in the days of Alfonso. The Azaña Government is wisely refraining from the death penalty even for those counter-revolutionists who attempted a national revolt last year under General Sanjurjo, because death penalties would only make martyrs of the monarchists.

The unfinished revolts and local disturbances in Spain in recent months indicate a more than casual restlessness. The national revolution is obviously incomplete. It has gone just so far in destroying the control of the nation by the propertied classes, and now the government must choose to finish the job or surrender many of the gains that have been made. The indications are that the government will push forward with determination and intelligence, but the outcome is still in doubt. The full pressure of conservative interests is now openly against the Azaña-Socialist coalition; the newspapers, both Catholic and syndicalist, are blazing with sarcasm and propaganda; and the employers are organizing to save themselves and what is left of their privileged position. The situation is exactly what one would expect in a capitalist country when the members of an idealistic Socialist Party are numerous but not dominant in the government. The Socialists have accomplished enough of a social revolution to arouse the capitalists without taking away their power. Many of these same capitalists were delighted to have Socialist cooperation in overthrowing a corrupt monarchy, but they are determined now that the Socialist Party, which was the best-organized force in the republican revolution, shall not reap any further fruits for the working class. My impression is that a return to the monarchy is unlikely but that the danger of a conservative dictatorship is real.

In a sense the present government is a semi-dictatorship, since its democratic mandate is not altogether clear and since it is permitted to use dictatorial methods under the Defense Act. The present Cortes, with Azaña as Premier and Zamora as President, is the same constituent assembly that was elected in 1931 to write the constitution and the laws necessary to put the constitution into effect. The Cortes is sole judge of the meaning of "putting the constitution into effect."

The opposition is crying that the government is already serving illegally because the local elections of last April in many parts of the nation resulted in overwhelming defeat. Technically the opposition is right, but it is doubtful whether a new election would change the balance of power between rights and lefts. The Socialists still are the largest group in the Cortes, comprising approximately 113 out of 450 members, although the numbers shift daily through resignations and deaths; the Radicals with 86 lead the opposition. In Spain as in France parties are often nothing but tiny nuclei dominated by clever politicians, kept in existence in order that their leader may use them as a weapon with which to bargain for a Cabinet position. Premier Azaña heads a party of 30 in the Cortes, the Republican Action group; while President Zamora comes from a party with only 10 representatives. The present coalition government of Socialists, Radical Socialists, Republican Actionists, Catalanian lefts, Galicians, and a few smaller groups dominates the Cortes by a margin of from 25 to 30 votes. But that does not mean that the government has a margin of only 25 votes in the Cortes balloting. In Spain the opposition usually expresses itself by staying away. The constitution requires that the government must secure for the passage of important laws an absolute majority of the membership. Today in an important test vote I saw the government win by 254 to 9, with many gaping vacancies in the red plush seats. The government's real margin of success was only 27.

The Azaña coalition continues to reveal many grotesque features. It is anti-clerical in the sense that it wants complete separation of church and state, but it is serving under a Catholic President, Zamora, who really created the crisis of last June by yielding to church pressure. During that crisis the clericals evidently thought that they could force a national election and the fall of the ministry by placing the responsibility for forming a government upon the Socialists. To their surprise the Socialists were able to muster substantially the same Cabinet that now rules under Azaña, so Azaña was returned to power. Azaña is a shrewd, progressive tactician who represents quite accurately the rather uncertain socialistic tendencies of the government. The most important work of the government is in the hands of the three Socialist ministers, Largo Caballero for labor, Indalecio Prieto for public works, and Fernando de los Rios for foreign affairs—a Socialist membership of three in a Cabinet of ten. If the government moves to the left, it is likely that Azaña will be succeeded by either Prieto or Caballero, who is head of the Union General de Trabajadores, the chief labor federation. If the government moves to the right, the leadership will naturally go to Alejandro Lerroux, opportunist extraordinary and head of the Radical Party. I do not see anyone on the horizon who casts a shadow remotely resembling Mussolini or Hitler. It is universally conceded here that the Socialist Party is by all odds the best organized and disciplined party in the nation and that it could block any move toward fascism in the near future.

Yet in spite of the strength of the Socialist Party the revolution has not brought any substantial amount of socialism to the Spanish cities. Madrid looks more like Los Angeles than Moscow, an old Los Angeles with seasoned beauty in its architecture but emulating all our Western bourgeois customs, including posters advertising Marie Dressler and 15,000 Spanish maidens whose make-up resembles that of Joan Crawford. Public ownership of industry is almost unknown. Not a single great industry has been socialized, and the present government has no plan for socialization. Caballero was frank enough to admit this to me, and when I showed some surprise he said: "Oh, I suppose we couldn't socialize industry without coming to blows. Perhaps it will come to that but it hasn't yet."

It may be asked, then, what the Spanish revolution has accomplished in the direction of socialism. Apparently four things: the improved physical conditions of labor, the improved status of labor organizations, the partial release of education from church control, and the beginnings of a genuinely socialistic land program. The last is the most recent and probably the most important thing in the Spanish revolution; the rest are simply reform measures whose parallels are to be found in Western capitalist countries.

Spain is still chiefly an agrarian country with three predominant forms of farming: large estates owned by the landlords in the south, little individualist farms in the middle and east, and a contract system of farming in the north. The present government decided after the Sanjurjo revolt of last year to seize all the estates of the grandees of Spain without compensation, and also to socialize the great estates of the south, especially those in Andalusia and Extremadura. Its program, contained in the orders of last September, was revolutionary, but only a very small part of it has been carried out. The government was given authority to socialize land through its Institute of Agrarian Reform in three ways. It may organize collectives under state management as in Russia; it may permit control of different plots of land by farmers working cooperatively under state supervision; or it may assign socialized land to individual farmers on perpetual leases so long as they stay on the land and work it.

Under its agrarian-reform laws the government planned to socialize not only the great estates of former nobles but also all great estates comprising more than 20 per cent of the section in which they were located, partially compensating the owner at a price set by the government's finance department to be paid over a period of years. After that the government planned the seizure of village common lands which had been illegally taken by landlords.

Apparently the only step taken toward carrying out this land program is the declaration of social ownership of land previously held by rebellious nobles. Not all of this land, which comprises more than 400,000 acres, has as yet been taken over for operation. Meanwhile the landowners are organizing definitely for counter-attack. So long as they own land they can use their ownership punitively to throw out of work the more aggressive of the farm workers, as they did in July in Salamanca, the region west of Madrid. After 30,000 farm workers of the region had joined the Socialist unions and forced up wages, and after a great strike in January, the employers called a meeting in the bull ring (a favorite place for public meetings) and organized company unions which they used as engines of discrimination. Parenthetically it should be noted that if the present policy of breaking up large estates continues, the bull rings of Spain may soon become public forums, since the raising of good fighting bulls is a luxury industry, confined, like the ownership of the Boston Red Sox, to self-sacrificing patriots. In the Salamanca region the organized farm laborers are fighting back strenuously with the cooperation of the government. Farm laborers staged 150 strikes in this one region alone during the year 1932, and brought 700 other disputes to the labor courts.

These labor courts (jurados mixtos) offer a striking parallel to the machinery of arbitration set up under President Roosevelt's National Recovery Act except that the government representatives on various tribunals are more definitely pro-labor than would be permitted in the United States. The typical labor court is composed of six employers, six workers, and a chairman who is chosen by the government unless the employers and workers can agree upon a chairman by unanimous vote. The chairman is the key executive officer of the court and has wide powers. The court itself is allowed to settle all disputes coming to it on petition of workers or employers which have to do with wages, hours, discharge, overtime, and the duration of a contract. An appeal from the court goes to the Minister of Labor, who is a Socialist. Also, all decisions of a general character are made in the last analysis by the Labor Minister.

The statistics of petitions and strikes in industry and agriculture during 1932 give proof of the immense gains made by labor through these courts of the new government. Of 19,796 judgments rendered by the labor courts in 1932, 14,460 were in favor of the workers and only 5,336 in favor of the employers. The constructive policy of the courts is shown by the record of 50,766 peaceful settlements as compared with 2,400 strikes. These labor courts have immensely improved the physical conditions of both farm and city workers and have given for the first time to Spanish workers the right to organize unions with genuine power. The working day has been reduced to eight hours even on the land; the day-of-rest law applies even to journalists; and wages have increased while wages have been going down in other parts of the world. Spain's unemployment is very small, partly because of the government's great public-works program. The membership of the U. G. T. has increased by two-thirds since the revolution and has a total of perhaps 1,200,000. The anarcho-sindicalist unions, on the other hand, have greatly decreased in power and membership, although they are still important in Barcelona. The government has put into effect a program of workmen's compensation for accidents, but its other social-insurance measures are still in the formative stage. Health insurance and old-age pensions are being planned, but they are not in effect, and the absence of a good program for unemployment insurance is disappointing.

In the background of the capital-labor struggle that is going on in Spain is the struggle between the socialistic state and the Catholic church for control of the national culture. The issue involved is not freedom of worship—the churches are open and well attended, and the clergy is outspoken in opposition to the government. Other important issues are involved. Who shall control the schools? Shall the government continue to support the ordinary priesthood? The second question seems fairly well answered in the government's successive reductions of its contribution to lay priests from 65,000,000 to 42,000,000 to 26,000,000 to 4,000,000 pesetas (the figures only approximate) during the last four years. This is supposed to be the last year of the government's payment to the church.

The great test of the government's anti-clerical program will come in December when the new educational code for the complete secularization of common schools throughout Spain goes into effect. The church leaders have sent out definite orders to the priesthood to tell Catholic parents to keep their children away from the government's schools. The government is equally determined to give Spanish children secular teachers who may be Catholics but who shall not be members of any religious order. The government is hurriedly training a corps of teachers for the new task.

The church, in attempting to block the government's educational program, is stressing the issue of economy. Where is the money to come from to establish the new school system? The leader of the Catholic Action group in the Cortes told me that it would take a billion pesetas a year to put the government's educational program into effect. (A peseta is now about twelve cents in American money, but it has a considerably higher buying power in Spain than twelve cents has in the United States.) Fernando de los Rios, former Minister of Education and now Foreign Minister, told me that his government proposed to spend 400,000,000 pesetas on education next year, whereas it was spending 300,000,000 this year. He was vague as to the sources of new revenue, but there is no doubt that the revenue can be secured if the government wills it.

High Finance in Boston

By HENRY W. HARRIS

THE story of how banks have used their security affiliates for the purpose of unloading bad paper on investors was spread upon the public record in the Mitchell investigation. It remained for a thirty-two-year-old judge in Boston to take the next step and hold directors of a security affiliate to personal, civil liability for such a transaction. In a recent decision which rocked State Street, Judge John J. Burns of the Massachusetts Superior Court declared that the former board of Beacon Participations, Inc., all of whose members, with one exception, were directors of the Beacon Trust Company, must pay for losses sustained when they allowed the bank to use the affiliate as a "dumping ground" and for those resulting from the juggling of its funds in other ways, to which he applied such terms as "reckless expenditure," "flagrant breach of fiduciary duty," and "deliberate misapplication of other people's money."

The case has already become a classic, for it is the first in which a court has held directors of a security affiliate responsible for "bad faith" to the corporation on account of their zeal in protecting the interests of the bank. The prominence of the defendants is important both because of the attraction their names exerted upon people who were invited to buy stock in Beacon Participations, and also because many of them have held, and hold, key positions in the financial and social life of Boston.

Charles B. Jopp was president of the Beacon Trust Company, a leading Boston bank, and of its affiliates. He later became a vice-president of the Atlantic National Bank, with which the Beacon was merged, and now is an official of the First National Bank of Boston, the dominant financial institution in New England, which has absorbed both the other banks. The court describes him as "the principal factor in causing the losses complained of."

The list of directors must have been appealing to the public, which was invited to buy Participations stock in a large advertisement appearing in the Boston newspapers. It included William P. Hart, president of the Charlestown Five Cent Savings Bank, an important institution; Robert Gould Shaw, Jr., now dead; Charles F. Adams, head of the First National Stores, the largest grocery chain in New England, and owner of the Boston Braves and Boston Bruins;

Gardner Poole, a well-known business man, formerly president of the Boston Rotary Club; Fred B. Lawler, formerly vice-president of the Atlantic National Bank and now an executive of the First National Bank; Arthur T. Lyman, a well-known broker, son of one of the wealthiest men in Massachusetts; Fred D. Jordan, partner of Lyman in the firm of Jordan, Lyman and Company, Inc.; Charles R. Gow, president of Warren Brothers, a nationally known construction concern, former postmaster of Boston, and one-time head of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, an organization which has lobbied consistently at the State House to break down the laws protecting women and children in the mills. Mr. Gow has just been appointed by President Roosevelt to be State Engineer for Public Works for Massachusetts.

Adams left the board reasonably early, and is absolved in some of the transactions. Into the directorate later came Allan H. Sturges, president of the new Pilgrim Trust Company, which was granted a bank charter while this suit was pending, and George S. Mumford, former president of the Atlantic National Bank, the third largest bank in Boston until it was absorbed by the First National. It is only fair to say that these two were not parties to the original scheme. Mumford, in particular, was held responsible only for continuing the procedure followed by his associates in managing the property of Participations for the benefit of the bank.

Edward Spiegel, who brought the minority stockholders' suit for the benefit of all the stockholders, is a Boston lawyer with an entirely different background. He stumped the State for La Follette in 1924, and has since been a member of the Progressive Action Committee of Massachusetts, the active hold-over committee of the La Follette organization, on which Robert Fechner, now head of the Civilian Conservation Corps, once served. Spiegel held twenty-five shares for three years without receiving a statement. When a statement was finally given to the stockholders, it told as little as such statements usually do. Spiegel saw Jopp, and received what he described as a "pep talk." When further attempts brought little information, Spiegel began an investigation which lasted for more than a year. He then brought suit. That the holder of such a small number of shares should go to such lengths surprised the defendants, who assumed at the start that Spiegel was attempting to "hold them up." They are just realizing that his guiding motive was the public interest.

Spiegel is thirty-five years old. Judge Burns is three years younger, and his appointment two years ago was generally hailed as the beginning of something pleasantly new on the Massachusetts bench. The son of a street-car motor-man, he is a graduate of Boston College and of the Harvard Law School, where he later became professor. At the time of his selection, the story of his background and his record made a tremendous impression. In language much stronger than anything in Spiegel's bill of complaint Judge Burns tells the story of Beacon Participations. It comprised six steps.

Step number one was the organization five years ago of Beacon Participations, Inc., affiliate of the Beacon Trust Company, for the advertised purpose of dealing in securities. The bank issued to the public nearly $2,000,000 worth of non-voting preferred stock, but bought all the common stock—25,000 shares—and with it voting control, for $1,000. All the directors of Participations, with the exception of Lyman, were directors of the bank.

Step number two was the "unloading" on Participations of what the court describes as "a worthless note" for $520,000 held by the Beacon Trust Company against its real-estate affiliate, Beacon Building Trust, Inc., on such terms that the bank could not be held as indorser. The directors who voted this transaction for the security affiliate were, with one exception, members of the board of the bank and also of the real-estate affiliate. The court found that Participations was "an ideal dumping ground," and had been "organized for the purpose, among other things, of buying this note." Before the Senate committee in Washington, Mitchell, of the National City Bank, described such a transaction as "bailing out the bank."

Step number three was the setting up of a joint account with Jordan, Lyman and Company, Inc., controlled by two of the directors of Participations, who had made a handsome profit in floating the preferred stock. Under its terms Participations was to put up the money and share the profits and losses equally with the brokerage concern. In justification of this deal the defendants argued that the brokers were contributing their knowledge and experience to the transaction, but the court commented dryly that Jordan and Lyman, directors of Participations, owed it this knowledge and experience anyway.

The stock market crashed, and instead of sharing the profits without putting up any money, Jordan, Lyman and Company found itself liable for half the losses and heavily indebted to Participations. Participations made a deal by which the brokerage concern was released, and Jordan, though he was known at the time to be insolvent, assumed the debt. He is now a resident of Maine and could not be served in the suit. The court expresses surprise that Lyman, whose father was one of the wealthiest men in the State, never became personally liable, and that the whole obligation was placed on Jordan, who was "financially irresponsible." Judge Burns calls the joint-account transactions "a deliberate misapplication of other people's money."

Step number four was the payment of dividends out of capital, so that the bank might retain voting control after Participations began to lose money. Under the articles of incorporation preferred stockholders, who had contributed 80 per cent of the capital, would acquire voting rights when four quarterly dividends were unpaid. To prevent this, the directors voted dividends, though there were no profits to divide and the company's capital had become seriously impaired. The court found this "a deception on the shareholders and on the general public. The shareholders received part of their capital, believing it to be income, and by such improper declaration the voting rights of the preferred stockholders were illegally postponed. The declaration of dividends gave a false picture of the company's financial condition to the prospective purchaser of its shares."

The fifth step was the secret repurchase by Beacon Participations of nearly 52,000 of the preferred shares, for the purpose of retaining voting control for the management in any event and, perhaps, to help "bail out" the "insiders." To make this purchase the directors spent three-quarters of a million dollars.

Judge Burns found that the directors gave the preferred stockholders no notice of the repurchase and that the transaction was "a reckless expenditure" which "practically cleaned out the treasury" and, in addition, left Participations with most of its good collateral pledged to the First National Bank for a loan of $110,000. The preferred stock held by the public was entitled to receive $20 a share upon liquidation. The court found that there was not enough money in the treasury to pay this when the repurchases started, and that the transaction worked as an illegal discrimination against those stockholders who knew nothing of the buying up of the shares. It also made it impossible for them to gain voting control and protect their rights within the corporation.

The sixth step in the story of Beacon Participations was the entry of a plea in bar to Spiegel's suit by the current directors, who had been elected by the defendants in the suit, on the ground that he had not exhausted his remedy within the corporation before bringing the case to court. The situation was thus created of a board of directors spending the stockholders' money in an attempt to defeat a suit which was brought for the benefit of the corporation and its stockholders and in which any money recovered would go into the company's treasury. Upon Spiegel's demand, the corporation, through its new board, has recently waived its claims of appeal from Judge Burns's findings. The Judge could not see what remedy in fact Spiegel had through the directors, since seven of the defendants were directors of the Atlantic National Bank, which held voting control, and the defendants could thus control any litigation brought against them by the directors; and since, in addition, the new directors were the nominees of those accused in the suit.

An interesting feature of the defense was the claim that the stockholders had ratified all the acts of the directors inasmuch as Jopp had appeared at the annual meetings with a proxy for the 25,000 common voting shares and, holding a meeting with himself, had ratified all the legal acts of the directors. The court commented that such ratification could not apply to illegal acts, and added: "It would be monstrous if the rights of the Class A stockholders could be swept away by the vote of a man who was the principal factor in the losses complained of."

The damages which each of the defendants must pay remains to be determined, but the judicial finding of liability against these men and the precedent thus established is of far greater importance.

The Artist and the Depression

By SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

NOT long ago, in a broadcast from one of our secret radio stations, I remarked that bourgeois society had neglected the artist, and salved its conscience by assuming that he needed to be neglected in order to be great. The sentimental belief that it takes a bruise to make a genius is coextensive with philistinism, being one of its more tiresome corollaries. I remember once hearing a young woman at a dinner party saying in an insufferably affected voice to an astonished artist, "I suppose you live in a romantic little attic." I supposed he didn't, knowing that the craze for bohemianism had made romantic attics too expensive for impecunious devotees of the arts. But in a way the lady's picture was authentic—authentically bourgeois: a picture of genius pining in garrets, living on short rations, and distilling from neglect and disappointment beauty which will delight the hearts of collectors, after death and the dealers have established its market value.

It is as false, of course, as a picture from the brush of any Ananias, because the values and the emphases are wrong. Its provenance is clear enough. The assumption is that since such artists as Rembrandt, Manet, Cézanne, Seurat, were unappreciated and great, they must have been great because they were unappreciated; ergo all artists need to be unappreciated in order to be great—an assumption which becomes meaningless when one sets beside the roster of neglected geniuses that of the geniuses who were not neglected: names such as Giotto, Leonardo, Michelangelo, Rubens, Delacroix. An artist is made great by neither public indifference nor public acclaim, but by the genius that is in him and an environment in which sufficient culture is current to permit that genius its full development. If the environment also affords discriminating appreciation, he is likely to develop more swiftly and happily, for the artist, like anyone else, is inspired and stimulated by judicious praise. If it yields also a demand for his work, he is likely to be more productive—although too great a demand may tempt him to sacrifice quality to quantity, a danger recognized by a distinguished French painter recently when he said that the more popular among his colleagues might be expected to do better work now that dealers were no longer standing at their elbows ready to snatch their canvases from the easel.

The number of artists who incur this risk is small; and much smaller in this country than in France. Few American artists have to steel themselves against the demands of dealers or anyone else. The buying public is extremely limited, and a goodly share of its patronage is appropriated by the time-serving pseudo-artist. Moreover, our largest buyers of art prefer to pay three or four hundred thousand dollars for—let us say—a bad Lawrence rather than three or four hundred for a good painting by a native and needy painter. Paying high prices for the works of dead men enhances the purchaser's social prestige; paying low prices for those of living men does not. A great many people really believe that only death makes an artist important; like the girl who remarked wonderingly that Redon was already a great painter although he had been dead only a few years.

Though being poor does not make the painter or sculptor an artist, being an artist may be pretty generally counted upon to keep him poor, especially if he is obsessed by new ideas and given to experiment. And so we come back to the picture of struggle and neglect, somewhat modified in the interest of accuracy.

There is more in the distorted original than mere conscience-sopping. There is a sort of left-handed acknowledgment of the artist's importance to society. And his importance to this country, I venture to believe, lies no less in his work than in his way of life, which is governed by a standard diametrically opposed to the standard of material success by which the vast majority of his compatriots measure their neighbors and themselves. In a society enslaved to wealth, he lives most like a free man. For the values which are important to him are not material but spiritual; his interest is in creation, not in acquisition. Therefore he accepts poverty, not because he feels differently about it from the colored man who complained that it was "so inconvenient," but because he prefers to use his time and energy in developing his talent rather than in pursuing the popular ideal of speculative getting and conspicuous waste. And his choice is as good an answer as any to anxious inquiries about what a civilized society would substitute for raw acquisitiveness as a spur to ambition and ingenuity. (Here I may be reminded that other people have also made this choice. I would not deny it, but I happen to be writing now about artists.)

Such a choice has its collateral rewards even in a society such as ours. The person whose primary concern is with things of the mind can stand adversity much better than the person who is chiefly interested in material things; not only because he is used to it, but because it has to hit him frightfully hard in order to affect his real life.

The depression of the past four years has hit a great many artists frightfully hard, although it had to get pretty bad before they noticed it at all. It was only natural that it should. In capitalist society art is a luxury, and a luxury which potential patrons of the arts will forgo before they will give up their yachts, their automobiles, and their peregrinations from one rendezvous of pleasure-seekers to another. The people who in normal times would buy works of art are feeling poor these days, whether they actually are or not; they will not buy unless they can do so at prices ruinous to the artist. And so the dealers display their wares to an apathetic public and wonder how to pay their rents, while the artists whose works they used to sell are so far behind in their rents that they no longer even wonder. I speak of artists; I don't know how badly the market for society-dressmaker portraits has fallen off—although for the benefit of those who take this phase of the situation to heart I may quote in passing an itinerant foreign "spot-knocker" of that school who told me last fall that his annual pilgrimage was proving disastrous. Nor do I know or greatly care how many milk-and-water mural decorators are out of jobs since the commissions at Rockefeller Center gave out. I fancy, however, that the large public-building programs undertaken to relieve unemployment may save them from disaster, for it is in public buildings that they have always been encouraged to do their expansive worst.

The degree of adversity among artists varies from a falling of income below the taxable level to virtual destitution. I do not know any painter or sculptor who is starving; I do know of one or two who were reported to be. I know personally several others who would be starving if it were not for their friends or the Gibson Committee. The committee has been able to give emergency employment to some 80 out of 200 applicants. It seeks out churches or other non-profit-making societies which want paintings or sculptures but cannot afford to pay for them, supplies the artists and pays them, the societies furnishing the materials. It also provides teachers of art to settlement schools which would otherwise have no art departments. The artist is employed every other week, and the committee pays him $25; so he has an income of $50 a month, which will keep the wolf from the door if he can somehow get from some other source the wherewithal to keep a door between them. Even this measure of relief will not be available after September, when the committee closes its doors on a situation which its contributors took to be acute and temporary and have found to be acute and permanent.

It is not only the beneficiaries of the committee who face another crisis this fall. Several artists' colonies, I am told, are in much the same situation. Their members have been living on their friends, credit, and odd jobs; and the day of reckoning is not far off. Some efforts have been made by these communities to help themselves. In Woodstock, New York, one of the most numerous, a few public-spirited citizens and well-to-do artists formed an association which bought work from artists in need, or found work for them to do. In New York various attempts have been made, by both art lovers and artists, to beat the disastrous bear market in works of art.

The most picturesque if not the most successful of these attempts have been the open-air exhibitions in Washington Square, where the artists adopted direct producer-to-consumer tactics, displaying their wares on sidewalks and fences and acting as their own salesmen. Chicago artists have also resorted to this expedient, which has long been familiar on Montmartre. At the Independents' show last year it was announced that artists would be willing to barter their works for goods or services—a picture for so much dentistry, or a sculpture for a suit of clothes—but not much came of it. Art-loving people in this and other cities have for several years arranged shows and auctions around Christmas time for the benefit of needy artists, with a certain amount of success.

These attempts at relief share the salient characteristics of all efforts to alleviate suffering caused by the depression: they are unsystematic and wholly incommensurate with the need. The impoverished artist, like the impoverished bond salesman or the down-and-out worker, gets along as best he can from day to day, and never knows when the morrow will find him wholly destitute. It is quite as futile to advise him to try some other line of work as it is to say the same thing to the worker or the salesman. Other lines offer no better chance of a living than his own. American artists know this only too well. They are accustomed to earning their living wholly or in part by avocations; and in those avocations they now find themselves obliged to compete with formerly high-priced experts who are willing to work for anything they can get.

The unemployed artist, however, has a great advantage over the unemployed of industry and commerce. He doesn't have to find an employer in order to be enabled to work. So long as he can get the materials he can keep himself occupied; and that wonders can be achieved with very little in the way of equipment we have the mute testimony of those superb things which Van Gogh produced in pen and ink when he was too poor to buy colors. The east wind of depression is tempered to the artist not only because his chosen way of life has inured him to it but because he can forget it at least part of the time in the joy of productive labor. He can keep his powers keen through exercise, and need never know—as must the architect or the engineer, for example—how bitter a thing it is “to rust unburnished, not to shine in use.”

It is hardly surprising that the depression has given impetus to a nationalist movement in art analogous to that in industry and commerce. When the controversy over Diego Rivera's superb and ill-fated fresco at Rockefeller Center was at its height, this movement rushed to share in the publicity under the name of “The Advance American Art Commission”—whatever that means. Part of its policy seems to be the practice of announcing its “regret” when a foreign artist is engaged to decorate an American building; and among the artists it most regrets are the two foremost modern fresco painters, Rivera and Orozco (whose American ancestry, by the way, goes back far beyond that of any member of the “commission”). It is an unfortunate movement, and would be more so if it were not for the significant fact that it is sponsored by painters and sculptors whose work, without exception, is profoundly regretted by American artists and discriminating critics of art. The artists know that it is much more important that art shall be good than that it shall be national. They know that if a Sert or a Brangwyn were excluded from this country, a myriad native purveyors of bathos would rush to cater to the taste that prefers a Brangwyn or a Sert, and American art would not be benefited. They know that if the foreign painter of obscenely flattering portraits were excluded, he would only be supplanted by the native impostor, and American art would not be benefited. And they know, too, that if an Orozco or a Rivera were excluded, American artists would be deprived of priceless instruction and inspiration. I do not look to see any American artist who merits the name rush to guard the native trough on the pretext of defending and promoting the native art.

The depression, chronic and acute, which weighs upon our artists is not to be lifted in such ways. An improvement in economic conditions will end the acute phase; the chronic phase will be relieved only by a solution of the general labor problem. Pending that solution, which seems about as far away as ever, becoming an artist will continue to be pretty much like taking a vow of poverty—with the sporting chance that good work or good luck, or both, will finally bring release.

[This is the fifth of a series of articles on the economic crisis and the professional worker. The sixth, The Engineer and the Depression, by W. A. Shoudy, will appear next week.]

Home-Owners in Revolt

By JAMES STEELE

Cleveland, August 8

IT is ten o'clock on a hot, oppressive July night. Up and down Lardet Avenue on Cleveland's East Side a throng of people is smiling, talking, laughing, arguing with the cops who are stationed along the street every few feet or gathered in bunches about squad cars and patrol wagons. There are nearly 300 cops—foot, mounted, and motorcycle—armed with clubs, tear gas, guns. They handle their clubs uneasily, eyeing the crowd anxiously, telling some of its members, "Aw, we ain't t' blame. We get blamed fur ev'rythin'." The men laugh and the women berate them in broken English, Bohemian, Hungarian. A Bohemian cop attempts to remonstrate with a woman in his poor English. A kid, standing by, jeers at him, "Why don't ye speak English?" The cop's mate, a burly, scowling 300-pounder, growls, "Oh yeah, well I was born an' brought up here all me life." "Gee, ye don't act like it," the youngster retorts while the crowd laughs. The cops walk off, muttering.

At the other end of Lardet Avenue a large audience, closely packed together, is listening to a speaker from the Small Home and Land Owners' Federation. His voice booms out over the milling throng. "And why is John Sparanga being evicted? He has paid in over $4,500 on this house, and while he was working he kept up his payments to the bank regularly. Three years ago he lost his job and he hasn't worked since. As long as there was a penny in the house he kept up the payments, but there came a day when he couldn't keep them up. He had to get help from the Associated Charities to feed himself and his wife and five kids. But that didn't mean anything to the bank. They tried to foreclose on him three different times—but we, the organized small home-owners, stopped them." Thunderous applause, echoing down the avenue. Then a whispering among the crowd as police converge and surround them.

The speaker wipes his brow and glances at the cops. "They beat us to it this time. They came at six o'clock in the morning and kicked John Sparanga and his family out on the street. Mrs. Sparanga tried to hang herself, she was so worried, but the cops wouldn't let us put the furniture back—and when we tried to they gassed us, gassed us, American citizens and taxpayers that pay their wages. Friends, we're living under the American Constitution, and that gives us the right to free speech, free assemblage, and the right to protect ourselves against tyranny. We say, use it!"

A roar of approval, repeated again and again, swirls through the oppressive darkness—and then, suddenly, red flashes and reports in the dark street; thick white clouds slowly rising; men, women, children stumbling, clutching at their faces, shouting to each other not to use handkerchiefs, then pressing back before the waves of tear gas. Those on the edges of the crowd, trapped by police, run between houses, over fences, through backyards into the adjoining streets—and there, too, are the police, the reports, the clouds of sickening, stinging gas. "Back to Lardet! Back to Lardet!" Youths scatter among the fleeing men and women, stopping them, shouting orders: "Back to Lardet!"

Back on Lardet Avenue there has been clubbing and shooting—a dozen men have been shipped to hospital with scalp lacerations; two men have been rushed away, shot in the legs. But the crowd is not giving way; three times this day, since their first mobilization in the early morning, the police have scattered them with gas and clubs, but now they are strong in their united strength. The home-owner, the unemployed worker, is not standing alone; shoulder to shoulder with 10,000 others he is resisting those who would take from him his home and happiness. Conscious of this strange new feeling, yet unable to voice it, the men and women stay. They yield before the police in one place only to swell their numbers in another. Isolated groups of demonstrators are pursued and bombed and rush for safety into the massed thousands. Here and there, on the outskirts of the crowd, the police toss bombs, but the crowd gives way just enough to avoid the fumes. The cops are at a loss: in spite of their guns and clubs and tear gas they are afraid, for this is a crowd that won't scatter, a crowd that is strangely grim and determined. They retreat back into Lardet Avenue while the crowd settles around the block, surrounding it, vowing not to leave until John Sparanga is back in his home.

Twenty-four hours later the crowd is still there, and the cops are still there—jumpy, afraid of the crowd, cursing their superiors for sending them out on such a job. They hustle everyone along the street, and break up small gatherings as much as they dare—but there is no tear gas and there is no clubbing. Perhaps the fact that several of their mates fell victims last night to husky Hungarian housewives with old-fashioned iron pans has cooled their ardor.

Two days later there is a mass demonstration on the Cleveland Public Square. The home-owners, massed around the statue of Tom Johnson, protest police brutality and Sparanga's eviction, decide to demand redress from Mayor Ray Miller. Five minutes before the parade arrives at City Hall the Mayor remembers a pressing luncheon engagement and leaves; but the banks are urged to go slow on foreclosures—the Cleveland Press says maybe if there were a federal home-loan office in Cleveland the "riot" would not have occurred—and the next day it is announced that a federal home-loan office will be opened in Cleveland!

John Sparanga may not be saved; but the dogged demonstration in his behalf has saved many other Sparangas from a similar fate.

The organization which staged the demonstration—the Small Home and Land Owners' Federation—began last October as a spontaneous "home defense" movement among working-class Hungarians. It answered a deep-felt need among the smaller home-owners for some method whereby they could defend themselves against the foreclosures which were eating up their savings and breaking up their families. It spread rapidly, crossing all barriers of language, religion, and politics, until today it has more than 14,000 members of all political beliefs and religions among people of such diverse nationalities as Bohemians, Lithuanians, Americans, Germans, and Italians. Although the federation's membership represents one-fourth of all the small home-owners in Cuyahoga County (homes valued at $7,000 or less are listed as small homes), its strength is actually much greater. The families of the members are solidly behind it, as are the Unemployed Councils—two forces which make it possible for the federation to rally 10,000 people at an eviction in the course of an hour or two. Through this ability to stage mass demonstrations quickly the federation has prevented literally scores of evictions; on one day this summer it stopped five. According to its own figures the number of foreclosures in Cuyahoga County has declined 45 per cent since it was organized.

This has been accomplished almost wholly through voluntary rank-and-file action. There are no paid officials in the organization; all that they receive from it is expense money, for which they must render a detailed accounting. Each branch is an autonomous unit, electing its own officers and carrying on its own neighborhood activities. Should some important issue arise, however, which the branch does not feel capable of handling by itself, it merely sends out a telephone appeal and the other branches ship in members by the hundreds—as they did in the Sparanga case. The coordinating body for the city is the City Central Body, made up of delegates elected by the branches. Recommendations issued by this body have to be carried out, but should any branch wish to appeal, it has the right to do so—and some of them have done so.

The federation has taken the lead in publishing a bi-weekly newspaper, the Home Defender, in organizing an educational department, in setting up women's and youths' auxiliaries which draw into the direct activity of the federation the wives and children of the members. The Home Defender, incidentally, is issued by a volunteer staff of young people, sons and daughters of members, and is much more readable than newspapers of protest usually are. Its paid circulation is about 10,000 each issue.

Naturally, since the federation controls so many votes, the politicians have not been slow to discover that their hearts bleed for the poor home-owner. The Republicans tried to take over the organization first. When they failed they retired to brand it as a "red outfit." The Democrats, a little more clever, have played up to the militancy of the rank and file, merely attempting now and then to secure indorsements for local Democratic measures. Such attempts have been uniformly squelched by the City Central Body. With the local elections coming in the fall, the Democrats are now forcing the issue, feeling that they can split the organization if they cannot control it. How successful they will be is indicated by the decision of several of the largest branches to run their own candidates in the council elections and to call on the Socialist and Communist parties for cooperation in naming candidates for wards where a united working-class candidate would have a good chance of election.

In spite of lack of publicity the reputation of the federation has spread. Branches have already been organized in Columbus, Toledo, and Akron. Inquiries have been received from Pittsburgh, Chicago, Long Island City, and California. The small home-owners of the United States are organizing, tardily perhaps, but none the less surely; and the Cleveland Small Home and Land Owners' Federation, with its militant policy, seems to indicate the direction they will take.

Why the Milk Farmers Struck

By ROBERT WHITCOMB

Chenango County, N. Y., August 15

IN 1919 the milk farmers, or dairymen, of New York State had a Dairymen's League under G. W. Slocum that virtually acted as a farmers' union and won a milk strike for them. Then, as now, the farmer liked to think of himself as a peaceable, law-abiding citizen, but he hated the idea of being the "goat." Shortly after the World War, however, the viper of Wall Street in the guise of the Borden Company extended its fangs still farther into the country and gradually bought up the local cheese factories which had handled the surplus milk that had been kept "to home" during the strike. At the Jersey City convention of the league held about that time, the almighty dollar of the big interests railroaded the league itself into the hands of the trusts. Soon the gains of the strike were lost.

Since that time New York State has become dotted with milk plants owned by Borden's or Sheffield's or the Dairymen's League, with no serious competition from small independent dealers or weak farmers' cooperatives, and practically no organized opposition from the farmers themselves. Dairymen joined the league or they did not, but they brought their milk every day, and they were obliged to take the company's word for the butter-fat test and also for the proportion of their milk retailed as fluid or drinking milk. The farmer received a check monthly, and that ended it. It is reminiscent of the checkweighmen in the mines, except that the farmer is a small business man in his own right, with thousands of dollars invested in land, buildings, machinery, and cattle—his farm. Nevertheless, the farmer finds himself to all effects an employee of a company with offices in New York, and he must take New York's word for it that the prices fixed are fair.

The depression, followed by mass unemployment and wage cuts, lessened buying power and therefore the consumption of milk, thereby increasing the surplus to be used for butter, cheese, ice cream, powdered, evaporated, or condensed milk. It was this situation which led Helen S. K. Willcox of North Norwich to prescribe killing "half our herds" as the only sure remedy for the milk farmer, because "you can lead a horse or a corporation to water, but you can't make either of them drink." The strike leaders this year repeatedly offered to supply only the fluid market and keep the surplus "to home," planning to start independent cheese factories of their own, but these offers were always rejected. The surplus is obviously wanted by the milk companies and can be sold. And the farmers are paid a pooled or average price, a combination of the high and low prices of fluid and surplus milk—the proportion is measured by the company and is revealed in the monthly milk check, though the price is usually known a few weeks in advance.

Last year the chaos in the milk industry, which involves a million persons in New York State, became evident when the farmer's check just about equaled his cost of producing the milk. Only the organization of dairymen on a State-wide scale could give the farmers the strength to get a fair proportion of the consumer's dollar, but such a movement, though it had the support of Cornell agricultural experts, the State Grange, and Governor Roosevelt, failed. Independent farmers could not organize without endangering their market, members of the Dairymen's League considered their contracts sacred, and the huge milk machine built up after the war poured forth propaganda, as it did again during the strike this August. Nevertheless, local leaders in the counties where they were known formed a loose organization that enabled the farmers to call fairly representative State-wide conferences.

This year several things happened. The farmer's price dropped below his cost of production—some monthly checks were not sufficient to pay for the cows' milk-ration feed. The season was exceptionally dry; not only the pasturage was burned up but also the cornfields which fill the silos for the winter. Poor food lessens the quantity of milk and cuts down the butter-fat content. The farmer faced a winter of starvation for both his cattle and himself, with machinery and buildings deteriorating, fences falling down, bills and taxes accruing, notes and mortgages falling due. The monthly check became still smaller. The farmer was and is getting between one and two cents a quart for his milk, while Cornell University has told him what he already knew—that it costs more than two cents a quart to produce milk. Figures came from Wisconsin showing that farmers there get a higher price for their milk, with lower costs of production, smaller companies, poorer markets, while at the same time the Wisconsin cooperatives were reported to be returning more profit on their investment than the New York State milk companies. In the meantime the New York companies got help from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the farmers were discussing the dividends paid from funds which they considered were earned by farmers, and wondering whether or not this or that company had watered its stock. Newspapers reported that Larry Fay, until his death, and other racketeers collected one cent on every quart of milk sold in Greater New York.

The Milk Control Board, established in April by the passage of the Pitcher bill, promised help for the farmer. In January the farmer got 87 cents a hundred pounds (47 quarts) for milk testing 3 per cent butter fat. (In Wisconsin the farmers' cooperatives pay $2.76 a hundred for milk testing 3.5 per cent butter fat, though the consumer pays only 10 cents a quart.) The board raised the price to $1.68, but at the same time raised the retail price from $4.70 to $5.64 a hundred pounds. And the farmer did not get this regularly, nor for all of his milk. The slight rise in prices since the Milk Control Board was established has been more than offset by the rising prices of cattle feed under the NRA.

Considered in terms of the individual farmer, the work of producing milk is not only unpaid but wasted, and the farmer is paying from his small holdings some of the profits still being made by the milk monopoly. One farmer in Herkimer County, with eight people working for him, and a farm herd worth $30,000, received a monthly check of $150, while his expenses for the month covering bare necessities for his family and cattle were $200. Another farmer in the same valley drew a check of zero because he owed a silo company money for a silo and the payments for it were taken by the milk company from his milk check. This man attempted to get food from a relief agency, but assistance was refused because he owned a farm. Men who haul farmers' milk to the milk stations often get more than the individual farmer. Farm hands work hard for no wages at all; they get only food, clothing, and lodging, and this year their work is still harder because streams are dry and water must be drawn for the cows. It takes one man a full day to draw water for a large herd.

Out of working for nothing, or working hard to make less than nothing, comes hopelessness, then desperation. A common cause, common misery, bound the farmers together. They attended crowded meetings in Grange halls and county courthouses; they were addressed by county leaders, politicians, and business men. Local merchants and professional men were all sympathetic, bearing in mind that the farmers are their best customers. Veterans of the 1919 situation came forward and told how it was done. Public-spirited farmers and leaders were constantly running to Albany and trying to get a hearing before the Governor or the Milk Board. On July 25 forty representatives from fifteen counties informed the Milk Board that if nothing was done the farmers would strike on August 1, not against the board, but against the big milk interests, especially the Dairymen's League, which is composed of well-to-do farmers but controlled by Borden's. The board was skeptical, and said that such a strike would be against the State. The strike leaders, some of whom rationalized the strike into a "holiday," insisted that they were law-abiding citizens, but that they meant to get what they were "entitled to" by lawful means. They were unanimously against violence of any kind, although during the following excitement many of them smiled when they heard of the persistent way the "boys" had "blocked traffic."

The only hope of relief, aside from the bare possibility of a bolt from the murky blue of Albany, lay in a mass protest. Disorganized, separated by distance, 80,000 farmers grasped desperately for any straw of leadership. Among the leaders the most quoted names are Piseck, Blair, Woodhead, and Clemens. The Piseck brothers, of Herkimer County, are unmarried Polish-Americans, originally from Illinois, where they studied agriculture and the management of co-operatives at the State university. They were militant leaders, and rode all over the State addressing meetings, telling the story of the Dairymen's League kittens that turned into independent kittens when their eyes were opened. They insisted that the farmers meant business, but they counseled against violence, and when the accusation came from Hamilton Fish and Louis Cuvillier that Communists were leading the strike, no one was more indignant than the Pisecks. They have been farming at Newport for a dozen years.

Walter Blair of Sherburne, Chenango County, is a soft-spoken, elderly farmer who resents having been arrested for disorderly conduct because he tried to persuade another farmer to take his milk home. Charges against Blair were pressed by members of the Dairymen's League, who also tried to reject the Blair milk after the strike, and Blair understood he was being told to keep his mouth shut, but he did not. Clemens and Woodhead are business men, Woodhead is a farmer on the side; Clemens is trying to popularize his Rutland Association for farmers.

Common grievances, however, produced a militancy among the farmers that transcended this leadership, and the strike was successful in attracting nation-wide attention before the multitude of forces against it broke its back. The leaders confusedly tried to call a truce, but the Governor and the Milk Control Board would not deal with strikers, particularly since, in spots, the enthusiasm of local strikers took the form of administering milk baths, turtling trucks, shooting at thermos trucks, or stoning troopers in spite of tear gas. Even the rank-and-file farmers are inclined to pity the "poor boys" in the State police force—they have such a rotten job to hold down. Governor Lehman made effective mention of the National Guard without calling it out. Extension of the milkshed into other States is still another weapon of the milk companies, although given time enough the farmers of other States might have joined the movement. Radio and press further confused the issues, while the Dairy-men's League published large advertisements proclaiming the danger to the "babies' milk supply," although the strikers guaranteed free milk for babies and carried out their promise in Amsterdam, where only babies under two and a half years old got milk. When the truce was proclaimed, neither Clemens nor Woodhead was present, and the latter called the strike off in the western part of the State. Now, at least, the leaders are accorded more attention at Albany.

The Nazi Hexenkessel

A Personal Letter

[We are able to vouch for the authenticity of the following letter which describes the continuing boycott of Jews in Germany.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Zurich, August 15

DEAR M.: How everything has changed in your old Vaterland! One could cry at the thought that Jews are compelled to live there, or rather to exist. I feel very strange and sad at the thought that now for the first time I am able to write you how I have really felt during all these months—parents are not allowed to write to their children about the things they are most concerned with in the home country. Whatever so-called "atrocities" you may have read are all absolutely true. For a time it seemed as if the waves of cruelty had calmed down, but a few weeks ago the campaign of hatred started all over again and the prospect looks darker and more dreary than ever. The mourning among the Jews cannot possibly be described; one has to experience it to believe it. It seems like a mockery to read in the German press:

An American who is traveling through Germany for the National Broadcasting Company of New York is full of praise for the German discipline and order which is prevailing all over the country. No Jew is molested and everybody may attend to his own affairs in greatest peace, whatever business he may be engaged in.

Can world opinion be so naive as to believe such a report?

And this American is alleged to have repeated this report over the air in the United States and praised with great enthusiasm the "wonderful" conditions in Germany. I am very much surprised that the N.B.C. should lend itself to such reporting.

Jewish stores are suffering very badly from the pressure of the Jew-baiting, since by law no municipal or federal employee is allowed to buy in a Jewish store. Immediate dismissal is the punishment for such an "offense." In all Jewish wholesale stores brown cloth is being confiscated. All Jewish stores are picketed, mostly by proletarian women who consider themselves very important with their white armbands which bear the words, "Buy German Goods Only." The department stores are picketed usually by four of these ladies, the big stores by three, the smaller ones by two, and the little shops by one. The other day I walked with O. past M.'s department store, which of course is Jewish, and I sent O. across the street to N.'s department store, which is Gentile. Since from my appearance nobody would think that I am Jewish I dared to trick the Nazis. With a dumb, innocent face I asked the honorable ladies who were picketing the Jewish store: "Is this a German store?" "Oh, no," was the answer, "you are not allowed to buy here!" "Why not?" "These are Jews! If you buy here, you will be punished by the party, provided you are a member." "Who knows me within the party? These people have such lovely inexpensive things in their windows." "You are better known by the party than you expect, and besides, Gentiles have just as cheap and lovely things," came the answer. "Very well," I said, "I shall cross the street and see what the German store has to offer."

I walked across to meet O., who had just come out of the Gentile store. We both returned then to M.'s store and looked at the windows again, knowing of course that we were being watched. The minute we entered the store, however, an excited woman followed me: "For goodness' sake," she said, "do not enter that store. A moving picture is being taken of you and will be shown on a public screen." Then all of a sudden three young Nazis appeared and handed O. a handbill which read: "If you do not want to burden your conscience do not buy from Jews. If you do your picture will be taken and shown on the screen!" I wanted to send you the original, but the employees of the store asked me to let them show it to the proprietor, as the distribution of these handbills is not officially permitted. As quickly as these young men appeared they vanished.

Another scene in front of the same store: A lady wearing the swastika started to enter the store. She was warned as I had been. I heard her say: "I buy wherever I want to!" We waited until she came out again. As she rushed into her waiting limousine, a Nazi jumped to the running board, closed the car, and off they went. That was all one knew.

Two weeks ago five Jews committed suicide within two days. Four of them were among our personal friends. One of them, Dr. J., who could not stand life in Germany any longer, said: "A German soldier shoots a bullet through his head rather than leave his fatherland!" The funeral of Dr. J. was attended by a very large congregation of the foremost citizens of the city, but not one single Christian colleague of his showed him the last honor in spite of the fact that he not only had been a member of the doctors' guild for many years but also had held many honorary posts.

My letter would never end if I were to tell you all that we have experienced; it is fortunate that one hardens and forgets in one's old days. J. L. told me the other day that when she went to the church to confess on boycott day, the pastor told her: "Pray for the poor people who today are persecuted so unjustly!" And my "pastor" told me never to tell anybody what I think, when I informed him that I would say to anyone who asked me about my identity: "I am a Jewess and I was a German." To all of us life in Germany is so disgusting and hateful that we would rather leave everything and run away, and yet it is not so simple.

Switzerland seems like a dream. No brown uniforms on the streets, no swastika flags, no military march music, with which we "German" citizens are fed during twenty-four hours of the day, through radio or through school children, who yell the Horst Wessel song in every possible and impossible way, or through Vereine, who patrol the streets singing at very late hours of the night waking everybody up. Even the smallest of the small join in. Recently on the street I met a group of kindergarten children ranging from three to six years of age, led by their teacher. They carried of course the swastika banner and sang the Horst Wessel song. I heard them shout behind some people: "Tueff, tueff, tueff, there comes another Jew!" That's how Germany lives!

Your best friend, W. S., is wearing the Nazi uniform, and since I do know that he has been forced to wear it, I simply cannot visit the family any more. He howls with the wolves, and I cannot differentiate this time between voluntarily and involuntarily. On the other hand I can understand his action, because it means to him to be or not to be, and after all he is the sole support of his parents. In spite of all this, I should feel shameless if I were to enter a home where the Westdeutsche Beobachter is being read and the swastika and Nazi uniform are worn. That my long intimate friendship with Mrs. S. has to end because of this makes me extremely sad.

Did you read what happened to the family of Scheide-mann? Be very careful what you do, I implore you. Do not forget that we are still living in the Hexenkessel [witch kettle].

YOUR LOVING MOTHER

Sonnet

By MARK VAN DOREN

As if I went to meet you at a run,
And ran too fast, and midway of a mile
Stumbled, spent of breath, and lay in the sun
Till the slow warmth revived me—so your smile,
And so your wordless welcome both restore
My halting mind that brings too much to say,
My tongue that is prepared to tell you more
Than ever will be needful to me—nay,
You teach me then, though I too soon forget,
How nothing had been needed but these eyes
That with the dew of absence still were wet,
This prisoned love that with its noiseless cries
Never will be heard by even you;
But you well know the bars it hungers through.

Afternoon at Hyde Park

By MARGARET MARSHALL

Scene: Hyde Park

Time: Friday in August

The First Family is sitting about the room in their accustomed attitudes. Mrs. Roosevelt sits at a great big desk writing an article. A Woman's Home Companion lies in front of her. Mrs. Dall, at a medium-sized desk, is writing a radio article. Sistie Dall sits at a very little desk "writing an article." The President occupies a large armchair in the center of the room. He is reading a code. Hugh Johnson is reading the code over his shoulder. In spite of this the President is wearing his broadest smile. Buzzie Dall is chasing a commodity dollar around the room. He is trying to catch it with a large net index number. The elder Mrs. Roosevelt is crocheting a Blue Eagle.

The sound of an airplane is heard outside and Raymond Moley enters.

MOLEY: I have landed, and the situation is well in hand.

Hugh Johnson salutes, the President salutes, everybody salutes.

H. J. [bluntly]: Have those gangsters accepted the code?

MOLEY [proudly]: They've signed up as one man—with a few reservations. They accept the minimum wage—they say their men have been making too much—but they want more machine-guns and the open shop.

H. J. [bluntly]: They'd better not monkey with that bird.

MOLEY: That's what I told them, General. [He salutes.]

H. J. [more bluntly]: And what did they say?

MOLEY: They told me to go to London.

SISTIE [interrupting in a sweet childish voice]: Grandfather, may I "write an article" for the Herald Tribune?

THE PRESIDENT [smiling]: No, dear, Raymond has the Herald Tribune.

SISTIE [interrupting in a sour childish voice]: But Raymond went to London. Why can't I have the Herald Tribune?

THE PRESIDENT [taking off his smile]: No, dear. Raymond has the Tribune. [He replaces his smile.] But why don't you "write an article" for the Washington Bugle? I'm sure they'd accept it.

SISTIE: Oh, goody! goody! I'm going to "write an article" for the Bugle. [She dances about the room and scares the commodity dollar away just as Buzzie Dall thinks he has it.]

Hugh Johnson's voice rises bluntly.

H. J.: Moley, you tell those gangsters for me that they can't have any more machine-guns. That's the trouble with this country. Too many machines throwing men out of work. Stuart Chase says so. [He gets blunter and blunter. He paces the floor and makes a great racket. He shouts.] This steal code has already caused more trouble than any two others put together. Moley, those kidnapers will accept collective bargaining or we'll drive them out of business!

The President smiles and nods his head. In the lull, Mrs. Roosevelt turns to Mrs. Roosevelt, Sr.

MRS. R. [whispering]: You know, Mother, we really need thicker rugs in this room. Dear General Johnson is so heavy! [Her face lights up.] Oh, Mother, I have an idea! I think I'll take the car all by myself and drive out to the Rockies. I could shoot a bear and be back in no time. And a bear rug would be just the thing for the General.

She smiles and walks back to her desk. She sits down and writes:

Vacations are always a problem in a family of limited means. Let me tell you of one thrilling vacation which I once took with four boys and six girls to whom I wished to give the experience of real Western outdoor life along with a practical lesson in catching bear rugs. . . .

A maid enters and announces James Farley. President Roosevelt removes his broadest smile and put on a medium-sized one. Mr. Farley comes in.

MR. FARLEY [looking a little embarrassed]: Good afternoon, Mr. President.

MR. R.: Yes, James, what is it?

MR. F.: Well—[He hesitates. He twirls his hat in his hands. He blurts.] I need a few more second-class postmasterships.

MR. R.: I told you, James, that you couldn't have any more second-class postmasterships until Christmas. What did you do with the ten I gave you for your birthday?

MR. F.: But Mr. President—

MR. R.: No, James, it's final—Who wants 'em?

MR. F. [smiling eagerly]: A lot of first-class Democrats.

MR. R. [sternly]: Are they literate?

MR. F.: Oh yes, they were supporting you long before Chicago, Chief.

MR. R.: Anything else?

MR. F.: Well not exactly. Just a rumor.

MR. R.: What? A rumor? What rumor?

MR. F.: Nothing to it of course, but I heard that Alice Longworth was working on a proposition to bring contributors to women's magazines under the Civil Service.

MRS. R. [looking up and smiling]: Alice does have such constructive ideas. But don't you think, Mr. Farley, that there are altogether too many services already? [She turns back to her desk and writes. Mr. Farley departs, and the President puts his broadest smile back on.]

The sound of a tugboat is heard outside and Grover Whalen enters.

MR. WHALEN: I have just come off the Macon, and judging by the ticker tape the NRA is having the greatest reception New York has ever seen. Lindbergh has nothing on this eagle.

HUGH JOHNSON [bluntly]: They'd better not trifle with that bird. [Everybody salutes.]

Suddenly a bell strikes five. Mrs. R stops writing. Mrs. Dall stops writing. Sistie stops "writing." Mrs. Roosevelt, Sr., stops crocheting. Mr. Moley stops saluting. Buzzie stops chasing the dollar around. Mr. Johnson stops.

MRS. R. [rising]: The forty-hour week is up. I know that we are executives but we must set an example.

The door opens and a servant enters.

SERVANT: Today's supper-for-ten-for-fifty-cents is ready in the icebox. [She departs.]

THE PRESIDENT: My dear, couldn't we bargain with her collectively to serve supper sometimes?

MRS. R.: Why Franklin, a code supper is all anybody could want.

As they leave the room the President wearily removes his smile and hands it to Mrs. R.

MRS. R.: Really, Franklin, this smile must go to the cleaners. You've worn it since last March.

BURLINGAME
PUBLISHED

In the Driftway

THE Drifter's correspondence is piling up. And though he hopes his readers understand that their letters are none the less treasured for being unacknowledged, he cannot bear to have them entirely wasted on the desert air of a letter file. Here, for instance, is a letter from May Bancroft Cole in the wilds of Maine, who does up spinach in a paragraph:

There are many jolly ways of wasting good time, but a peck of spinach can do more damage to an otherwise good forenoon than any other little thing I know. So take home a peck, pick out all the bad leaves, separate the roots, and cut out all the stalks. Then wash it—not in the bathtub, because that would be too convenient—but in something just a bit too small to accommodate the whole peck. Wash it through water after water until your fingers cannot detect the least particle of sand in the bottom of the pan. Then look at the clock and decide whether a woman isn't God's perfect fool to perform in such fashion.

Touché!

• • • • •

SPENCER WILLIAMS, representative in Russia of the American-Russian Chamber of Commerce, writes a note from Moscow which indicates that the Drifter sometimes builds better than he knows:

Your valued column in The Nation of July 5, 1933, bespeaks scorn for the habit of consulting the dictionary. That you have the courage of your convictions is indicated in the subsequent sentence which renders that good old catch-word of many a spelling-bee as "plaguey." That plaguy word has sent many a champion down for a count of ten.

• • • • •

THE most original plan for solving the Indian problem came out of somebody else's letter basket. It was invented by Lady Houston and published in the London Sphere of June 17. James Manning, also in the depths of Maine, mindful of The Nation's deep interest in India, was kind enough to pass it on. The article is entitled Why I Financed the Houston Expedition, and runs as follows (the italics are Lady Houston's):

When I promised Lord Clydesdale that I would finance this great adventure and he went forth like Jack the Giant-Killer to conquer Everest, many people said, "Why does she do it?" My reason was this. A relation of mine had just come from India and three days after she left, her nearest neighbor was murdered. This sort of thing I was told is, alas, not unusual now in India. I asked why, and the reason I got was that since the agitators have been permitted to preach treason it has made the people of India think that we Britons have lost our courage, and they had better therefore stand in with these others. This made me feel that some great deed of heroism might rouse India and make them remember that, though they are of a different race, they are British subjects under the King of England, who is Emperor of India, and what more can they want?

For all Indians love brave deeds and must rejoice with us and feel proud of this act of heroism our valiant airmen have accomplished in mounting seven miles into the air over India's highest mountain, for this is surely a proof to them that pluck and courage are not dead in our race, and perhaps—who can tell—this may make them remember all the advantages and privileges they have enjoyed under the English rule, and all the loving kindness that was shown them by our forefathers, who fed them when there was famine, who nursed them when there was plague, and who administered absolute justice to them in every dispute; for as long as our race exists, indomitable courage and an unalterable love of justice will always be our outstanding characteristics; for that great thinker Maeterlinck tells us that the character of a nation never alters.

The Drifter has the impression, from reading the more instructive columns of The Nation, that the Indians would be more favorably impressed if every Englishman in India would go and climb Mt. Everest, and stay there.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Agrarian Revolt in California

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In sunny California, the land of the "all-year-round" climate, all has not been calm this summer on the agricultural front. Most of the crops of vegetables and berries are raised on farms operated by Japanese, who employ laborers from south of the Rio Grande. Working conditions among these laborers have been intolerable for many years. Wages by the hour were 10 cents and less. Piece work was common; the price for picking a crate of berries, 19 to 30 cents, depending on the variety, and this seldom netted the picker more than 90 cents a day. Hours were long; ten hours were standard, twelve were often the rule. In El Monte, the center of the berry-growing region, a system of virtual peonage prevailed. The Japanese owners gave their Mexican peons hovels made from chicken coops, dry-goods boxes, and improvised materials. In these terrible circumstances Mexican laborers tried to make a living and support large families of niños.

It was not expected that unorganized agricultural workers, with no tradition of labor struggles and in a foreign land, would take matters into their own hands. It is to their everlasting credit, however, that about the first of June they did do just that. The Mexicans in Santa Monica in the onion and celery fields refused longer to accept the wage of 10 cents an hour. The movement soon spread to other agricultural regions; when the agreement was finally signed, the strikers numbered 6,000. The first task of the leader, Armando Flores, was to call together representatives from the twenty locals to formulate demands. When this was done, Flores and members of his committee visited the different centers and set up well-organized units. Vacant store buildings were lent by Mexican owners for meetings, and there came into being the "Union de Campesinos y Obreros Mexicanos," which by July 6 was able to dictate its terms.

The strike was not won, however, without a struggle which threatened at times to be violent in both its local and international aspects. By the time a settlement had been reached, sentiment sympathetic to the workers in Southern California had spread to Mexico itself, where "La Crom," the powerful labor party of Mexico, declared a boycott of all Japanese goods and merchants in the republic. The Japanese in California resorted to many methods to kill the strike. Scabs of any nationality available were sent into the fields. Wives and children were commandeered to replace the strikers.

As usual the role of the police was to harass the picketers in every way possible. Sheriff Eugene Biscailuz of Los Angeles departed from his usual fair record in labor disputes and ordered his deputies to aid the Japanese in their effort to break the strike. Many employees were arrested and charged with being Communists. In El Monte seven leaders were arrested and accused of communistic tendencies; later the charges were changed to vagrancy. To insure their staying in jail, bail was fixed at the excessive sum of $500 each. The prosecution at El Monte was carried on not by a representative of the District Attorney but by an attorney for the employers, Mr. Doi, who was appointed special prosecutor by Judge D. S. Sores. The California branch of the American Civil Liberties Union was active in the defense of some of the strikers arrested on charges of vagrancy and conspiracy. Attorney A. L. Wirin of the union secured the dismissal of many cases.

The final agreement is temporary, but it means, nevertheless, a far-reaching victory for the formerly disorganized and discouraged Mexican farm population. The Japanese Association recognized the union and agreed to discharge all the scabs and reemploy all strikers showing union cards. Twenty cents per hour was set as a minimum wage. It is safe to say that this strike and its final success is one of the most interesting examples in recent years of a group organizing without outside leadership for the collective betterment of its members.

Long Beach, Cal., August 16 THEODORE RODRIGUEZ
W. G. FENNELL

Radio Censorship

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Not long ago, at the request of a woman's organization, I gave a lecture on Russia over a radio hook-up including stations in several States. What I said is of no importance to your readers, but it has occurred to me that they might be interested in knowing what the censor would not permit me to say. The following are the extracts which were deleted from my prepared manuscript:

1. "The Russians plan and experiment while we drift and cling to tradition."
2. "The frequency of bedbugs has been grossly exaggerated. Anyway, who ever died of bedbug bites?"
3. "The political structure of Russia is, I think, the most intelligent in the world." The sentence, "They tolerate no such absurdities as the direct election of chief executives, judges, or members of the national congress," was toned down to read: "They do not have the direct election," and so on.
4. After stating that in Russia one must not only work but must perform work which is considered socially useful in order to obtain a food card, I said: "No cards are given to salesmen, criminals, advertising men, prostitutes, realtors, financial counselors, racketeers, priests, Christian Science practitioners, chiropractors, solicitors, osteopaths, herb doctors, or night-club hostesses. After formulating this list I am again impressed with the profound character of the Russian Revolution." This entire paragraph was struck out. Perhaps this deletion was poetic justice, for I may have had too much fun in writing it.

5. "If the world has to choose between capitalism with chronic unemployment on the one hand and communism with inefficiency on the other, communism ought to win—and probably will."

6. "In my judgment there can be no revival of the Russian church. It rose and fell with the Czarist regime, with which it was inextricably involved. It can no more return than the murdered Czar can come back to life."

May I say in conclusion that I cannot see in this censorship, which I think is typical, any conspiracy on the part of "capitalism" to suppress its critics. Nor do I think the policy of the station owners is influenced by any sense of duty to preserve the existing order. So far as I can judge, the station owners have only one "principle" and that is highest net returns. They claim that their only basis for censorship is the exclusion of anything that will offend the delicate susceptibilities and prejudices of their listeners. The station operators resemble newspapermen in that they are relatively free from either susceptibilities or principles.

Radio censorship, apparently, is not for the protection of either capitalism, religion, or morality. It is enforced so that no offense may be given to that ill-defined class known as the "booboisie" to whom, supposedly, most radio advertising is directed.

Mills College, Cal., July 15

GLENN E. HOOVER

Taxation of Land Values

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Nation steadily and apparently conscientiously avoids all mention of taxation of land values and of the fact that real-estate values are practically untaxed values. I presume that this policy is adopted in deference to the interests of readers in other matters. If I find that The Nation is willing to publish short articles or letters showing that we have billions of available revenue if only we would take land value instead of taxes, I will be glad to subscribe to The Nation again.

New York, July 15

BOLTON HALL

Negro Firemen

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Murder for the Job in The Nation of July 12 recited the details of the tragedies of fifteen Negro railroad employees in Mississippi without mentioning any of the events leading up to them. The cause of this reign of terror is attributed to the employment of Negro firemen while white firemen go without jobs, the question of seniority rights and agreements to the contrary notwithstanding.

During more normal times the positions of firemen on certain southern divisions of the Illinois Central Railroad were divided on a fifty-fifty ratio between Negroes and whites. The whites accepted the division because there was plenty of work for both, and because "the left side of the cab" was the Negro's job for a number of years. With the depression came a demand from the white firemen that the ratio of Negro firemen be reduced 5 per cent. This was granted. In 1932 Negro firemen held approximately 45 per cent of the jobs. The new deal had not yet turned the corner, jobs continued to be scarce, and the white firemen asked for another reduction in the ratio of Negro firemen. Probably this was more than the railroad officials could stomach. Action on the request was delayed over a long period. Meanwhile, the murders began. Though all of the shootings have occurred in Mississippi, the Louisiana and Vicksburg divisions of the Illinois Central Lines are also involved in the dispute.

Mississippi's murders illustrate one phase of the intense struggle for survival of the Negro fireman. New contracts between the railroads and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen negotiated during the last ten years have been largely responsible for reducing the ratio of Negro firemen on the Southern Railroad from 80 per cent before the war to 10 per cent. On the Atlantic Coast Line, where formerly 90 per cent of the firemen were Negroes, the percentage is now below 40. In 1930 it had dropped from 90 per cent to 50 per cent on the Seaboard Air Line, with the brotherhood seeking a contract to permit further reductions.

These are the jobs that white men would not have before the war because of the low rate of pay and the dangers of the job. With the increased pay and improved status of firemen made possible by the government administration in 1918, Negro firemen have been forced to fight a "white-dog contract" whereby several lines have signed agreements with the brotherhoods that not only restrict the percentage and territory of Negro workers but in some instances provide that they be replaced by white workers as rapidly as vacancies occur. Furthermore, the great St. Louis and San Francisco system in 1928 issued regulations that pointed to the eventual elimination of all Negroes from train, shop, and yard service.

You liberals laughed in 1926 when President Robertson of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen told the Detroit convention that he hoped to report at their next meeting that not a Negro remained on the left side of an engine cab. Well, the "white-dog contract" is one of the results of that bit of demagoguery. And when the Progressive Order of Locomotive Firemen (a Negro organization formed because the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen does not admit Negroes) decided to fight this discrimination on the Atlantic Coast Line, Donald R. Richberg of defense counsel upheld that road's action because Negro firemen could not be promoted to engineers.

Is not this a dirty dish to set before Joseph B. Eastman?
New York, July 18

IRA DE A. REID
Director of Research, National Urban League

To Chicago Architects

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It is earnestly urged that all architects and engineers living in Chicago and vicinity who are interested in joining an organization of technical men aiming at political action looking toward a new social order immediately write to Sol Greenberg, 2307 Haddon Avenue, Chicago, Illinois. This organization is not to be confused with Technocracy, Inc., with which it has no affiliations whatsoever, either in philosophy or in program.

Chicago, Ill., July 13

SOL GREENBERG

The article on Utility Profits in New Jersey by Samuel Morris which was announced for this week has been unavoidably postponed. It will appear in an early issue.

Books

Before the Summer Goes

By DAVID MORTON

Only remember, now, how summer brought
Green to the meadow, darkness to the trees,
And how the heavy, moveless airs are fraught
With sleepy sounds and fragrant silences—
And how the slope wore buttercups awhile,
So shining and so delicate and still
We walked around it, went an extra mile,
To set no bruising foot upon that hill.

When fields are stubble and the trees are thinned
For sunlight or for starlight filtering through,
We shall be listening how a little wind,
Lost in the world, may find naught else to do
Than cry and cry, and never will be still,
For green things gone, for yellow from the hill.

A Note on Gertrude Stein

The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas. By Gertrude Stein.
Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

IT must be recognized, first of all, that Miss Stein's new work is the most "comprehensible" and therefore, in a sense, the least characteristic work of hers that has appeared. The reason for this is twofold: it is presumably not her book at all, but the autobiography of her secretary-companion, Miss Toklas; and its subject matter is of a traditional kind. Although she cannot help falling into her own syntax and idiom most of the time, Miss Stein makes at least as great an effort to be faithful to the style of her narrator as Defoe in writing "Robinson Crusoe." Such phrases as "awe-inspiringly" and "the house of our dreams" are intended to indicate Miss Toklas's sensibility rather than Miss Stein's own; and because this sensibility is a more familiar one most readers will have less difficulty in following it. The other reason that the book is so easy to read is that it can be enjoyed for its gossip, its fund of wit and anecdotes, its revelation of a "personality." Read in this way, it should provide inexhaustible fodder for the newspaper reviewers and abundant, if somewhat superficial, enjoyment for a large section of the reading public. Indeed, it is all too tempting to plunder some of its rarer bits for the purposes of this review; to repeat what Miss Stein has to say about Matisse, Picasso, Whitehead, Hemingway, among others; to destroy the reader's own pleasure in discovering these things for himself. For among books of literary reminiscences Miss Stein's is one of the richest, wittiest, and most irreverent ever written. In it she makes ridiculous all those who have ridiculed her for the last twenty-five years with the charge that she has had "nothing to say." She shows that she has a great deal to say of the sort that historians, biographers, and literary gossipers are in the habit of saying: Miss Toklas's "autobiography" is, among other things, a critical history of modern French painting and an account of the post-war generation in American letters. But if it were only this it would be an even less characteristic book by Miss Stein than it is; others could have given us these facts, but only Gertrude Stein can give us Gertrude Stein. And the deepest interest of the book lies in the insight it gives us into the genesis of the mind and sensibility reflected in Gertrude Stein's other and more characteristic books.

There have always been only two questions about Gertrude Stein: What, precisely, has she been trying to do these many years? What, if any, is the value of what she has done? The first, which has never been satisfactorily answered, is a question that has to do not only with her method, style, and processes of composition but also with her view or "vision" of experience. The second, which cannot very well be answered before the first, is a question involving all the questions of evaluation involved in discussing any artistic work. Most of the confusion in regard to Miss Stein's work has come from the attempt to answer the second question without adequately recognizing the difficulties of the first. For Miss Stein, who happens to possess at once a highly trained metaphysical mind and an extremely refined aesthetic sensibility, offers unusual difficulties to the critic—more perhaps than any other creative writer of our time. Before disposing of her work with any real comfort it is necessary to know a great deal not only about William James and Bergson and Whitehead but also about Cézanne and Picasso and Juan Gris. Her so-called naive and primitive writing, moreover, represents such a complex synthesis of these influences that the most painstaking analysis is required to reveal them with any degree of clarity. In the end, it is much easier to turn to a "difficult" writer like Mrs. Virginia Woolf. All that will be pointed out here is that, in the general character of her mind and in its central orientation, Gertrude Stein is not nearly so isolated and eccentric a figure in American letters as is so often believed.

Before Gertrude Stein went to Paris in 1903 she had been a favorite student of James at Radcliffe, she had published a paper in the Harvard Psychological Review, and she had spent four years at Johns Hopkins, where her researches had been praised by Halstead and Osler. She did not take her degree there because, as she says, medicine bored her. In Paris she immediately met Matisse, Picasso, Braque, and other young painters who were busily overthrowing the "literary" painting of the previous generation in favor of an ever more abstract practice of their art. Under their inspiration she appears to have done her first literary work; "Three Lives" was written, literally, under the shadow of Cézanne. The effect of this worship of abstraction on a mind already trained in metaphysical speculation was to alienate its owner even farther from the concrete life of her own time and country. In the rue de Fleurus Miss Stein settled down to the creation of a form of writing which in style attempted to reproduce the movements of consciousness as described by James and Bergson, in form and diction to conform to the ideal of austere simplification followed by the new school of plastic artists. Like them, she hated "literature" and sought "the destruction of associational emotion in poetry and prose." Like them also, she was indifferent to the qualitative aspects of subject; she merely "rendered" people, landscapes, and events. And because her passion for "elemental abstraction" appealed to a generation that had just been through the concrete discomforts of a world war, she became in time a kind of High Priestess. Although a follower like Hemingway, remaining "nine-tenths bourgeois," never got away from the "museum smell," her non-associational prose became one of the greatest single influences on the prose of her time.

In her detachment, her asceticism, and her eclecticism, Miss Stein can only remind us of another American author who lived in Europe and devoted himself more and more exclusively to the abstract. The principal difference between Henry James (whom Miss Stein reads more and more these days) and Gertrude Stein is that the former still kept within the human realm by treating moral problems. (Miss Stein has a more absolute aesthetic ideal: "the intellectual passion for exactitude in the description of inner and outer reality.") Moreover, what Miss Stein has in common with James she has in common with Poe, Hawthorne, Melville, and several other important and characteristic American writers: an orientation from experience toward the abstract, an orientation that has been so continuous as to constitute a tradition, if not actually the American tradition. Of this tradition it is possible to see in Miss Stein's writing not only a development but the pure culmination. She has pushed abstraction farther than James or even Poe would ever have dared—to the terms of literary communication itself, "Words and Sentences." The final divorce between experience and art, which they threatened, is accomplished. Not only life but the traditional means of communication in life are "simplified" to suit the patterns which she offers in substitute.

WILLIAM TROY

Can Cuba Recover?

The Crime of Cuba. By Carleton Beals. J. B. Lippincott Company. Thirty-one full-page photographic illustrations. $3.

THE amazing revolution of affairs in Cuba has stirred an interest about the island in the United States more intense than there has been for twenty years. Carleton Beals's colorful work appears as a timely response to prevalent curiosity as to what is back of the headlines. Why did the Cubans fail to love the kindly-seeming (in his photographs) Machado? In this book you may read of the crimes of the vanished regime, recounted bluntly in overpowering but discriminating detail. Beals adheres steadfastly to matters of public concern, barely hinting at the scabrous background of the Machado despotism. Much of the material is of course difficult of verification, in the same sense that it is difficult for our public prosecutors to convict a racketeer. But there is substance and to spare to support the characterization of the late administration as "a sawed-off shotgun government."

It does less than justice to the breadth of this book, however, to present it as a chronicle of atrocities. That chapter in Cuba's sorrowful history has closed since Beals set pen to paper. We may hope that it has closed forever. But governments of thieves and assassins do not spring into being spontaneously in a void. The crimes of Machado form but an episode in the tragic tale of the crime of Cuba. His conduct of public affairs as a private racket was a function of Cuba's social environment, the refinement to a high degree of a set of skills elaborated there long since by Spanish and American and Cuban predecessors. The claim of "The Crime of Cuba" to long-time usefulness lies in the thoroughness with which it explores the Cuban scene and the emphasis which it places upon abiding factors with which the new provisional government (or any government seeking the general good of Cubans) must reckon. There is no work either in Spanish or English that undertakes with such breadth of scope to display the fundamentals of Cuban society. It is based, as the reviewer can testify, upon accurate use of the best sources.

The first part of the book, nearly a fourth, is devoted to analysis and portraiture of culture patterns. Two themes are intertwined. There is first the absence of roots, which we might have been reminded is the characteristic of immigrant civilizations, the result of the selective processes which impeded the transit of either European or African culture as an integral whole to this continent. There is, second, the gulf between Creole culture, represented as upper-class, urban, but retrospective, and mestizo culture, represented as rural, degraded, but vital. Beals steers skilfully around the view that these patterns are racially transmitted, but is impressed by the degree to which growing race consciousness serves as a cultural barrier. He accepts the Fernando Ortiz theory of growing Africanization. He also undertakes, without explaining his method, to revise the Cuban census figures to show a great minority of pure white stock.

This section is a fascinating piece of work, with a style and spirit more characteristic of French than American journalism. The patterns described are there and they are most important, politically as well as socially. My complaint would be that a full perspective demands portrayal also from other points of view. This cultural dichotomy is imperfectly correlated with economic forces. It tends to ignore features common to both patterns. It leaves Beals with an inadequate explanation of the rise of the A. B. C. secret society. It does not account for the Cubanization of Spanish and other immigrants (American, for instance). It leaves the impression, which is misleading, that industrial and commercial mores, where found in Cuba, are merely an alien intrusion. Beals's data elsewhere in the book supply evidence to the contrary.

It may be suggested that an alternative approach to the problem of Cuban cultural differences and similarities may be found in an examination of the impact of successive economic systems upon a subtropical frontier. There has been frontier economy itself, never extinguished and now the bulwark of Cuban rural subsistence. There has been the plantation system, which nurtured both Creole and mestizo culture. And there has been modern industrialism. Cuba has, however, never known small-scale competitive capitalism either in the countryside or mill. And it is this which gives a sense of romantic unreality to the political fetishes of nineteenth-century liberalism as applied to Cuba. As Beals reiterates, Cubans do not own their land, and the basis for general participation in the control of enterprise has been a progressively narrowing one.

The central theme of this book is, however, political. It may be best summarized in the author's own words:

Every government has owed much of its origin to American business interests or to the direct intervention of the United States, or both; and these governments have been maintained in power, legally or illegally, by these same factors constantly operating. The main objective of American capital in Cuba has been to reap the largest profits possible without regard for the welfare of the Cuban people; the main objective of the State Department has been to maintain the status quo, to insure stability often regardless of the wishes of the Cuban people. . . .

"For all the blood and sacrifice of our people, of your people, we merely changed masters. . . . We are exiles in our own land. . . . That is the crime of Cuba."

The Cuban, aware that his country is a protectorate of the United States, that his government functions in a realm of unreality, that the final resort is American banking interests and our State Department, refuses to get profoundly excited about politics. Rightly or wrongly he believes any solution answering basic Cuban needs can meet only failure.

The factors in the Cuban situation here correctly stated have been relatively little affected by the passing of Machado. And at a time when the conduct of American diplomatic and banking policy has led to the utter collapse of Cuban economic society, the near-bankruptcy of every American enterprise in the island, and the unemployment of at least half a million American workers to counterbalance that of as many Cubans who no longer buy American goods, it is opportune for Americans to be reminded of the neglect of their moral responsibilities which has contributed to the result.

Beals goes much farther in his specifications of personal and public responsibility. His book in substance charges Stimson and Guggenheim, Woodin and Percy Rockefeller, Charles E. Mitchell and the Chase National Bank with aiding and abetting for pecuniary ends the Machado despotism. He charges wholesale neglect on the part of our embassy of many supposedly American interests, lest the Cuban government be injured. He charges ambassadorial callousness concerning the life and property of Americans not well connected, lack of vigilance regarding Japanese espionage, connivance in the use of embassy premises as an observation post for the Cuban police, and misstatement of facts on the part of Ambassador Guggenheim in public pronouncements and official reports.

The Guggenheim issue has played a great role in opposition propaganda during the last three years, and in the mind of Mr. Guggenheim himself. It is perhaps a more charitable view to say that he was an incompetent ambassador. The circumstances of the overthrow of the Machado regime are the most eloquent testimony to what American diplomacy could have accomplished at any time during the last three years had it set about it with the skill and objectives of Sumner Welles. Nevertheless it must be pointed out that Welles has had a different Administration at Washington to serve.

Beals's pessimistic view concerning the policy likely to dominate the Roosevelt regime has been happily falsified by events. But what of the future of the economic and political intimacies which underlie the shifting panorama of personalities? Whatever the role of Cuban workers, soldiers, and the A. B. C. in the recent revolution, the support of the United States (calling it a constitutional process) was still a factor. Is it "control" when Guggenheim presses advice which is not taken, and something else when Welles produces "new deal" counsel and is listened to? The realities of Cuban-American relations cannot be escaped by legal correctness. They are there and likely to remain, to the embarrassment of both countries, even though the permanent treaty be modified. Beals, while lamenting the conversion of Cuba into a sugar factory, urges in the interest of American security that we give preferential treatment to Cuban sugar as against Philippine and Hawaiian products. The long lists of interlocking directorates with which Beals occasionally interrupts his narrative are certain to remain a part of the Cuban scene unless and until a Communist revolution sweeps them from the whole American stage. How can these factors be reconciled with a "new deal" that will be of significance for Cuban society? Readers of this book, written before the revolution, will be more impressed with the living death of the Cuban republic than with the resources and remedies that might be applied for recovery.

But there are young men and young women who think otherwise. Societies, like organisms, have hidden reserves that may be rallied in the phenomenon of rebirth. A younger generation of Cuban leaders may yet arouse latent metabolic processes for the recovery of their country. If they are to succeed there is a long time of sacrifice ahead for the comfortable classes. Havana cannot maintain the scale of living that glittered from 1917 to 1927. It is equally true that the United States may aid most effectively by curbing the intrigues of the financial racketeers, who are even less lovely in looting Cuba than in their depredations at home. The beginning of wisdom does not consist in floating a refunding loan in the New York money market. American enterprise has been ruined by its own mistaken greed. It may flourish again in security only if Cubans can find a way to a new orientation of their national life. The magic of "experts" has been tried. Foreign investment has proved a perilous stimulant, like strychnine, a poison in an overdose. Unless the people can be returned to the fertile land, and the land to the people who need it, without too cautious regard for legal and financial niceties, Cuba's future will with difficulty rise above her past.

LELAND HAMILTON JENKS

The Giants of Wall Street

The Mirrors of Wall Street. Anonymous. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

NO time could be more appropriate than the present for a penetrating analysis of the great figures of Wall Street, of the men who have dominated the financial and industrial policies of the nation to the misfortune and bewilderment of the great mass of its citizens. But the glass which the anonymous author of "The Mirrors of Wall Street" has held up before the clay-footed giants of finance is cracked and distorting.

Most of the expected figures are included in the scene—Morgan, Mitchell, Lamont, Otto Kahn, the younger Rockefeller, Baruch, Dillon, Aldrich, Eugene Meyer, and others. Some enter less directly, such as A. H. Wiggin, Owen Young, and Andrew Mellon. There are a few prominent omissions, such as Raskob, the du Ponts, Matthew Brush, and Charles Hayden. There is random information, a considerable fund of gossip, and a great deal of generalization.

The attitude of the present book toward the great financiers is mildly "debunking," a debunking interspersed with a kind of half-praise which fails to reveal any consistent insight into their true motives. The author, for example, is apparently unable to detect the patent opportunism underlying Winthrop Aldrich's blast for banking reform, delivered last February when the Chase Bank was on the brink of an inquisition similar to the one which shook Charles E. Mitchell out of the National City Bank. "Mr. Aldrich has dared to damn the very practices that his neighbors, his legal brethren, and his financial colleagues have grown rich on," the author declares, without questioning the reasons for Aldrich's sudden penchant for reform. "In one statement, Mr. Aldrich has done more to clear the atmosphere than could have been done by any other save Mr. Morgan."

The real fabric of the Wall Street system is only hinted at. In an introductory chapter the author discusses Washington and Wall Street, certainly a ripe opportunity to illustrate the means whereby a numerically small group of men were able to control many of the important functions of government during the twelve long years of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regimes. But aside from small gossip about Andrew Mellon and the principal figures on the Federal Reserve Board, all that this chapter contributes to public knowledge on this subject is the self-evident fact that under Wall Street pressure the Federal Reserve Board carried on in the early years of the boom a program of open-market purchases of government securities which supplied much of the credit for the rampant speculation in that period. Moreover, after announcing that "there is nothing mysterious about the causes that underlie today's so-called depression," the author attributes sole responsibility for the depression to this same open-market policy, which, while undoubtedly contributing to the extremity of the boom and hence of the slump, is hardly explanatory of the world-wide breakdown of credit, prices, and trade which has occurred since 1929.

This conclusion is typical of the superficial generalizations which run through the book. In the chapter on J. P. Morgan the author tells of the somewhat romantic scene in August, 1914, when Morgan agreed to take care of Great Britain's financial needs in the war, declares that he is antipathetic to Jews, and praises his impeccable family morals. But the vital significance of Morgan's position to the people of the country, as well as the vast network of power which he exercises through the public utilities, railroads, and businesses of all types under his influence, receives only passing mention and no development worthy of the name.

At its best the book offers personal details of varying interest and piquancy about men who appear before the people chiefly as names or as symbols for institutions. At its worst it slips into misinterpretations of the most naive character, as when the writer says of Charles E. Mitchell, "But he was above immediate profits. Money meant little to him anyhow." Perhaps the most significant expression of the author's attitude toward the evils of Wall Street occurs in the passage in which he looks back wistfully to the days of the elder Morgan and writes: "A pity 'tis that his span of life was not delayed for a couple of decades. He would have held the lines at Armageddon. His voice like a thunderbolt would have annihilated the so-called bankers . . . before they . . . tricked the nation into bondage."

PETER HELMOOP NOYES

Brilliant and Tedious

The Farm. By Louis Bromfield. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE subtitle of Louis Bromfield's new novel could be "the story of four generations of an American family," and there are no other nine or nine hundred words better suited to indicate its unevenness, brilliance, and tedious detail.

The unevenness throughout "The Farm" leaves the reader with the impression of having read two books at the same time. The long stretches of dull prose read as if Bromfield had sat day after day over his writing pad working with gritted teeth to fill in the hundred-year outline or to die in the attempt. The lines and paragraphs of brilliant writing scattered over the 346 pages are something else; the reader is here brought face to face with a writer who moves us as only a few novelists in America have the power to do. If these passages are not the work of a superior talent, then there is no such thing as creative writing.

But the detail—the tedious detail! Perhaps it is the average reader who demands this itemizing in his novels. The popularity of such novels as "The Farm" would point in that direction; but why must the rest of us be choked with minute descriptions of clothes closets and kitchens, wearing apparel and thoughts? Not even the solitary traveler who unsuspectingly stumbles into one of Bromfield's forest clearings can escape until he has been subjected to the embarrassment of being catalogued from beaver hat to union suit.

"The Farm" is one of the better examples of the novel without characters. In this instance, regardless of what can be said for or against the tendency to write about masses of things rather than specimens of humanity, there is little lack of interest on that account. Bromfield's scores of walking characters—which is to say, characters who come and go without adding to or detracting from the story—are too fleeting to make any lasting impression, good or bad or indifferent, on the reader. Rather, we are held and urged on to the next page by the feeling of a seething mass which, we innocently hope, may break open on the following page and reveal men and women real enough to thrust forward a hand to greet us. And strangely enough, when we turn the final page, we discover that we bear no resentment against Bromfield for having told us a story merely about things, without the help of a single outstanding character.

It is to be hoped that Bromfield will institute a more intensive search in his next novel for the source and causes of America's regression. In "The Farm" he touches lightly on the more obvious symptoms of decay and decadence; and so, well and good. But since the future of the novel lies in its willingness or unwillingness to utilize its unique medium of expression, it is to be hoped that novelists like Bromfield will render the form secure by writing intelligently on peculiarly American expressions of morals, religion, and economic relationships.

In the meantime "The Farm" will find a large and ready-made band of readers, not a few of whom will be disappointed because dirt-farming is squeezed out by detailed descriptions of knickknacks. But, as if by chance, the story resembles the script treatment of a Hollywood screen play, and at some future time the disappointment may be assuaged by a faintly familiar version of "The Farm" accompanied by process shots of cows and chickens and fade-ins on the farmer's daughter.

ERSKINE CALDWELL

"Then I Saw the Congo . . ."

Congo Solo, Misadventures Two Degrees North. By Emily Hahn. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

MISS HAHN is a young woman of great courage. Though it is quite true that Africa is no longer "dark," that road-building is an occupation of such importance that entire Congo villages are depopulated in order to furnish labor to construct highways, and that dugout canoes on the river are propelled by outboard motors, it is still no small matter for any person without previous knowledge of the bush country to embark on the venture reported in this book. That Miss Hahn came through safely was due to her adaptability both to new situations and to human personalities.

Beginning with her departure from Europe on a French West African mail boat (third class, which of itself is something of an adventure), she recounts in diary form her arrival at Matadi—where she was almost refused admittance into the Congo Free State because of the paucity of her funds—her trip into the interior, her experiences as unofficial assistant to a friend in charge of a hospital, her adventures with various members of the Belgian administrative staff, and finally her quarrel with her friend and the beginning of her trip out by way of the East Coast. While in the interior she gave hypodermics and even anaesthetized a patient during the amputation of his leg; she went on an elephant hunt; she made pets of a deserted native boy and a number of simians of various types; she assisted at court councils; she bought Paris perfumes at an interior trade center; and always she was bitten by the innumerable insects that plague the European in the African interior.

The book makes no pretense of being anything more than an account of the experiences of its narrator. Here and there certain observations concerning colonial policy appear: "Of course this country isn't like Australia, I said. Here they don't want to kill off the Negro, they want to help him increase, because they need his labor." But not much of this is found: "Well, I must wait a few days before settling the world. I can't decide on everything this Thursday." Certainly, a picture of Belgian colonial administration that is none too flattering is implicit in these pages; but it is no more than implicit, for apart from the interplay of situations involving Miss Hahn, her friend "Den," three or four officials, one or two natives, and the simians, there is little that is explicit in the book.

Yet this is in keeping with the character of the writing, for it is frankly a personal narrative, not a disquisition either on ethnology or political economy. As such, it is readable and entertaining. The tale it tells is obviously a true one, and there is no attempt—for which one gives hearty thanks—to play up the horrors of the jungle or the mystery of the African bush. That it is a significant work is probably not maintained by the author herself. But it does give a picture of a type of existence lived by Europeans in Africa, and it does emphatically suggest the query as to the worth of such existence in terms of any values that can be associated with human living.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

A Dated Liberal

From Chaos to Control. By Sir Norman Angell. The Century Company. $2.

PAMPHLETEERING for a quarter of a century against those particular forms of wickedness, such as war and higher tariffs, which are most hateful to liberals and in favor of those manifestations of righteousness, such as peace and good business, so dear to liberals, has elevated Sir Norman Angell to a knighthood and first rank as an international publicist. His latest work has the weakness of his earlier writings and of the contributions of most liberal writers today—namely, a lack of philosophical profundity. This shortcoming is pardonable in men like Stalin, Mussolini, Hitler, Mitchell, and Ivar Kreuger, who succeed, even if only for a short time, in getting things done their way. But when a man who admits that he has never been able to get people to do things his way sets himself up as an expert on what is wrong and how to right it, he ought, at least, to think things through. And that, precisely, is what the outstanding exponents of British and American liberalism fail to do.

The very title of this book raises questions which it ignores or begs. For instance, is there not control in the fortuitous play of innumerable factors maintaining the equilibrium which Sir Norman Angell calls chaos and which some people call life? Is the jungle more chaotic than a conference of experts? Or is the chaos in the Western world between 1929 and 1933, or 1800 and 1933, better or worse than the greater relative degree of order that reigned for centuries in Egypt, China, Babylon, or Peru? And just what is Sir Norman Angell's opposite of the present chaos? It is much easier to visualize the world dream of a Caesar, Napoleon, Mussolini, Hitler, or Lenin than that of Sir Norman Angell, whose values are largely negative—no war and no bad business. Of course he would add to the list the elimination of avoidable unhappiness for the people, but he would fail to define or comprehend what happiness and unhappiness mean. He cannot apprehend the fact that most people find happiness in suffering and dying for a person, a symbol, or an ideal—for king, flag, or the conquest of a mountain peak. He assumes that a normal person must crave easy living, when, as any true scientist in the field of human behavior, or as any experienced parish priest, family physician, or army sergeant knows full well, most men want to live dangerously, at least at certain times. Sir Norman Angell does not preach an adventure of humanitarianism as a substitute for war, or the sublimation to a higher ideal of the sadistic-masochistic drives which normally express themselves in military mass murder and lofty patriotism. His message is that war is bad business, and he is probably unable to appreciate Professor Whitehead's profound observations that "unfortunately life is an offensive against the repetitious mechanism of the universe," and that "a policy of sociological defense is doomed to failure."

The positive objectives of Sir Norman's idealism appear to be a smoothly working international capitalism under which the state and individuals would cooperate in some unexplained way. The results would be fair (what is fair?) and ample (?) profits for traders, happiness (?) for the people, and the reign of peace and liberal righteousness revealed by liberal experts to the educated democracy. And, of course, freedom would ring.

In a chapter on the present deplorable disbelief in economic sanitation we are assured that the experts are as agreed about the fundamentals of economic sanitation as they are about the essentials of public hygiene. (Sir Norman Angell, Frank Vanderlip, and Nicholas Murray Butler agree on tariff reduction and debt cancelation.) Wars, tariffs, and intergovernmental debts are pestilential germs which the people stupidly tolerate because they heed the wicked nationalists and militarists instead of the nice liberal experts. The idea that international trade competition or modern industrial capitalism may be necessarily a self-destroying social pattern is never even seriously entertained.

In answer to the question, "Do we know what we want?" Sir Norman gives a despairing reply. "Democratic control, however real and effective, would avail nothing while the ideals of patriotism still dominated the mind of the people." "The conditions of successful planning" are discussed in terms of cooperation between government and business rather than in terms of a new cultural synthesis. Spiritual or emotional dynamics have no place in the Angell evangel.

A chapter on Where Education Falls Short tells us that "to be educated did not mean to be politically wise"—hence the war of 1914-18, which might have been averted. Our troubles are due to our education having "failed to develop the skill or habit of applying to social problems simple truths inherent or self-evident in the common facts of daily life." We must "develop the skill for seeing the meaning of facts and drawing the socially useful conclusions from them."

To Sir Norman the "meaning" of the "facts" of international trade and the transfer problem is that the war debts should be canceled. To him the American provincial is an economic illiterate for not seeing a truth so obvious. To the American farmer the meaning of the facts of high taxes, large debts which the farmer has to pay, low prices, and the size of the British navy is that England should pay. To him the defaulting foreign government is a welcher. To me the meaning of these "facts" is that Aristotle and St. Thomas Aquinas were right about usury. Sir Norman is not enough of a thinker to perceive that all debtors have a transfer problem today and that all large classes of debts must stand or fall together.

It is a pitiful liberalism which assumes facts to be objective realities having identical appearances to all educated minds and indicating certain obvious conclusions to all experts alike. The experts reach conclusions about social problems in much the same way as the masses, and every social decision is an expression of preference rather than a selection between truth and error. "From Chaos to Control" is a piece of immature discussion by a dated liberal. It is irrelevant to the world of Stalin, Hitler, or Franklin Roosevelt. Its basic assumptions were never relevant to any situation which existed outside the minds of a few nineteenth-century liberals. The book has no broad human appeal because it strikes no responsive chord in the hearts of the world's unhappy millions who are not looking for a life of controlled ease under experts but for bread and adventure—mainly a great adventure which will give meaning to life.

LAWRENCE DENNIS

Shorter Notices

To Be or Not to Be: A Study of Suicide. By Louis I. Dublin and Bessie Bunzel. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $3.50.

The most interesting and original part of this book is the opening section, which consists of a statistical survey of the prevalence and environmental influences of suicide. In this field Mr. Dublin, who is statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, is in his element, and writes with undoubted authority. Many of his statistics, since they are derived from the files of the Metropolitan, are especially valuable. Some of the data only confirm general expectations, but others are rather surprising—for instance, when they establish the fact that suicide is most frequent in the jocund month of May. The race distribution of suicide will also surprise some readers. While American Negroes and Italians have a low suicide rate, that of the Germanic races is very high. It is interesting that the Jewish suicide rate, which used to be very low, has increased tremendously in recent decades. The rest of the book is very readable although it offers no new theory of suicide. The story of suicide among primitive peoples and in various civilizations ancient and modern is followed by an exposition of the legal and insurance aspects of suicide. Then the psychology of suicide is examined, with much reliance upon psychoanalytic interpretations. In conclusion Mr. Dublin, as is very natural, since he is in the life-insurance business, engages in a little propaganda for life, but he seems to have missed Samuel Butler's famous observation that suicide is a problem for an embryo, not a man.

Down and Out in Paris and London. By George Orwell. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

This interesting and rather painful document has been compared to a "populist" novel like Eugène Dabit's "Hôtel du Nord," and indeed, in its vivid, unforced fashion, it is more absorbing than any novel of that sort, since all experience, honestly set down on paper, is more interesting than experience derived through the sieve of fiction. The author is, or was, an old Eton boy and ex-civil servant who became a dishwasher in Paris and a bum in his own country. His account of these experiences has attracted great attention in England. Several reviewers have dealt with his book in a semi-autobiographic fashion, commenting that it is rather pleasant to be down and out by the Seine, but not so pleasant by the Thames, and so on. This commentator would state, like Mr. Orwell himself, that it is not pleasant to be down and out anywhere. No writer submitting himself for the nonce to a horrible existence, for the sake of material, could possibly convey so powerful a sense of destitution and hopelessness as has Mr. Orwell, on whom these sensations were, apparently, forced. If we are correct in this conclusion, if this book is not merely a piece of "human nature faking," it is a restrained and all the more damning indictment of a society in which such things are possible.

The Russo-Japanese Treaties of 1907-16 Concerning Manchuria and Mongolia. By Ernest Batson Price. The Johns Hopkins Press. $1.75.

Never has a scholar more ably dissected the secret of Russo-Japanese treaties than Dr. Price has done in this slim volume. But his analysis is more than an examination of words and phrases written into diplomatic documents, for it lays bare the adroit technique of modern diplomacy. "Special interests" defined in public conventions become "vital interests" in secret treaties, and from there it is but a short leap to the exercise of political sovereignty. The public treaties into which Russia and Japan entered during this period ostensibly promised that both powers would respect the political and territorial integrity of China, but the secret agreements arrived at at the same time were actually arrangements looking definitely toward the further partition of China. All that was necessary was a simple shifting of phraseology. Dr. Price suggests, though with justifiable caution, that the last of the secret treaties, those negotiated in 1916, were in all likelihood directed against the United States. Additional study may reveal, indeed, that even as this country was preparing to enter the World War on the side of Russia and Japan those two countries were forming a military alliance against the United States. Dr. Price's work will prove invaluable to scholars seeking a clearer understanding of the present conflict of interests between the Soviet Union and Japan.

Charles II. By John Hayward. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

Mr. Hayward does his best to vindicate Charles II by humanizing him. But to prove that a throned sensualist and double-dealer was no worse than the average man might be in the same circumstances cannot alter the historical indictment. By the very nature of the situation it is criminal for a man in a position of great responsibility to be a mediocrity; though perhaps not so great a crime as being a successful autocrat, like Charles's more brilliant contemporary, Louis XIV. Mr. Hayward's book would have been cleaner without the patches of humanizing whitewash, but it is very readable.

Beethoven. By Alan Pryce Jones. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

Beethoven was so much the creature of music—which, of all arts perhaps, derives most from the subconscious—that his conscious life resembles a blundering and only partial awakening out of the subconscious. Impulse dominated his actions, and he showed incredible stupidity and insensitiveness in his relations with his intimates. As a consequence his life, racked additionally by his physical torments, was a sad one. Mr. Jones presents it in fluent narrative, but his estimate of the value of Beethoven's music is too extreme to be just. It is true that the art of a past period can only exert a part of its potentialities in the present, but that is because in any period men can find use only for a portion of what is given them, even of contemporary achievement.

Wagner. By W. J. Turner. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

This is one of the most interesting of the eighteen volumes thus far brought out in this series. Within its brief compass it contrives to give a well-rounded, even detailed impression of the personality of Wagner, one of the most successful men who ever lived, and a penetrating assessment of Wagner's place in the history of music. Now that his career can be seen in perspective, Wagner appears a monstrosity of brilliant egotism. Rarely in history has one man been able to use others so cleverly for his own ends, and coat the act with such a convincing whitewash of idealistic sentiment. Mr. Turner's judgment upon Wagner's music is probably too harsh; but it is evident already that its one-time "profundities" are pretentious and deceiving.

"I found more meat in it than in a dozen previous efforts to interpret Hitler and Hitlerism."—LEWIS GANNETT

GERMANY ENTERS THE THIRD REICH

By CALVIN BRYCE HOOVER

Author of "Economic Life of Soviet Russia"

The what and why of the momentous events in Germany since the fall of Bruening to the mid-summer of 1933, told by an expert observer.

"A disquieting book but full of fresh, illumination and convincing interpretation."

—New York Herald Tribune

At all bookstores $2.50

MACMILLAN

Joshua Reynolds. By John Steegman. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

Reynolds's life was one of the most fortunate in history. He was happy, healthy, distinguished, popular, rich, and long-lived. His satisfactions were so many that he never required or missed the consolation of a woman's love. He was fortunate even to the point of having Gainsborough, his younger and only serious rival, die before him, leaving him undisturbed in the pleasing consciousness of being indisputably the greatest living painter in England. Mr. Steegman tells his story entertainingly but a little too worshipfully; and the portrait lacks what Reynolds's own portraits often lacked, sufficient social background.

The Brontës. By Irene Cooper Willis. Great Lives Series. The Macmillan Company. 75 cents.

It is not often that the circumstances that beget authorship are so plain as in the case of the Brontës. Charlotte, Emily, Anne, and their brother Branwell grew up in a depressingly lonely household, early left motherless and dominated by a discouraged, eccentric, and hypochondriac father. The false laws of gentility barred them from friendships; the companionship of books was all that was available to them; their chief play as a consequence was literary. As adults they met life shut up in shells. Branwell, broken by a disappointment in love and a failure as a painter (there was a compulsion on the Brontës to practice one or another of the arts), became a drunkard and drug addict and died young. Emily and Anne also died young; Charlotte outlived them but died in her first pregnancy. Even the pleasure of literary recognition was enjoyed only by Charlotte. Miss Willis tells their touching story interestingly and sensitively, but wastes a good deal of her small space at the beginning by a pointlessly detailed description of the Brontë house at Haworth.

Yonder Lies Jericho. By Samuel B. Harrison. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.

"Yonder Lies Jericho" is the success story of Aaron Burrell, born Aaron Berele Hochstein, who comes as a penniless immigrant to the Texas of 1865, and eventually founds a merchant dynasty in the Southwest. Although there is an interesting background to the story of Aaron's rise—the cattle drives, the oil booms, the first coming of the railroads—Aaron himself is a generalized figure, with all the stock emotions of the Jewish business man of popular tradition. The dialect in which he speaks, diluted Milt Gross, is unfortunately chosen, and lends a burlesque touch to the melodramatic crises of his life. One feels that this novel, dealing with phases of Southern expansion and with Jewish life in the South, is an attempt to conform to two current literary vogues; but that the material has not been integrated into a convincing whole by the author.

Original Design. By Eardley Beswick. Minton, Balch and Company. $2.50.

The original design in question is conceived by an earnest young chap who is a draftsman in the factory which provides an authentic setting for this English novel. Although crafty people in the works manage to steal credit for his invention, it still saves the business from catastrophe after roughly 350 pages of one thing and another—seductions, a suicide, a ball game. The inventor's troubles tie fairly plausibly into the story of an industrial depression; but while all this commands interest of a sort, it is not exactly stimulating, nor does it pretend to have much bite as regards the social scene.

Ballads and Sea Songs of Newfoundland. Collected and edited by Elisabeth Bristol Greenleaf. Music recorded in the field by Grace Yarrow Mansfield and the editor. Harvard University Press. $5.

Ten years ago, when teaching one summer in a school of Dr. Wilfred Grenfell's Mission on the west coast of northern Newfoundland, the editor of this sizable volume found herself in a region where old ballads were still the songs of the day. She collected the words and music of all the songs she could coax forth in that and the following summer. Then she dropped the project for a time, but in 1929, with assistance from Vassar College, she returned to Newfoundland with Grace Yarrow Mansfield, a trained musician, and finished the collection of the material which has gone into this book. Many of the ballads, of course, are old favorites from the British Isles, especially England and Ireland, although often with local variations. Some were composed in Newfoundland, usually on English or Irish models. A lesser number are American, Canadian, or French songs. The book has been produced with both enthusiasm and care. A large number of songs have been assembled, with footnotes on their origin, so far as traced, and on their appearance in other collections, when found. The result is a genuine contribution to the folklore of this continent.

A new blend of pipe tobacco created by BENADERET internationally known tobacconist.
Send for a free sample.
Benaderet's—215 Sutter St., San Francisco.

Today to Tues. Sept. 5
"ISLAND OF DOOM" Thrilling and Soviet Talkie MURNAU'S "SUNRISE" Story by
Beg. Wed. Sept. 6. American Premiere. Soviet Film Hermann Sudermann
"AN HOUR WITH CHEKOV"
ACME THEATRE 14th ST. and UNION SQ. Midnight Show Every Saturday
Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

The American Liberal

A Non-partisan Newspaper
Social Science from the News
A Newspaper for the Thinking Population
A New Deal in News
Send for free sample copy
196 Dean Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Subscription: One dollar a year

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL BLANSHARD, executive director of the City Affairs Committee of New York, has just returned from a visit to Spain.

HENRY W. HARRIS is a Boston newspaperman.

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE is the author of "Art in America."

JAMES STEELE is the Cleveland correspondent of the Federated Press.

ROBERT WHITCOMB is a New York newspaperman.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English department of Washington Square College, New York University.

LELAND HAMILTON JENKS is the author of "Our Cuban Colony."

ERSKINE CALDWELL is the author of "God's Little Acre."

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is in the department of anthropology at Northwestern University.

LAWRENCE DENNIS is the author of "Is Capitalism Doomed?"

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXVII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1933

No. 3558

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	281
EDITORIALS:
The Future of the Dollar	284
Austria's Sad Plight	285
More Speed by Rail	286
ISSUES AND MEN. SIX MONTHS OF FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT. By Oswald Garrison Villard	287
RUSSIA'S MENTAL REVOLUTION. By Louis Fischer	288
NRA: PIN PRICKS AND BRICKBATS. By Paul Y. Anderson	290
UTILITY PROFITS IN NEW JERSEY. By Samuel Morris	292
THE DRAMATIC VARIETY OF SIDNEY HOWARD. By Joseph Wood Krutch	294
THE ENGINEER AND THE DEPRESSION. By W. A. Shoudy	296
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter	298
CORRESPONDENCE	299
FINANCE. ARMOUR AND COMPANY ATTEMPTS A COUP. By Peter Helmoop Noyes	300
BOOKS AND FILMS:
The Horse of Poetry. By Horace Gregory	302
Turner, Marx, and the A. F. of L. By Benjamin Stolberg	302
A Light Fall. By Florence Codman	303
The Mellon Saga. By Lewis Corey	304
Massachusetts Doesn't Want to Know. By Silas Bent	304
Docility and the Depression. By Granville Hicks	305
Democracy Slips Downward. By Edward C. Kirkland	306
Gorki's Challenge. By Alexander Kaun	306
Shorter Notices	307
Films: Concerning "Narratage." By William Troy	308
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	308

BOARD OF EDITORS

ERNEST GRUENING	FREDA KIRCHWEY
HENRY HAZLITT	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL	MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England.

NEWS FROM CUBA further confirms the contention previously expressed by The Nation that the State Department errs seriously in withdrawing Sumner Welles at the very moment when the real task for an American ambassador at Havana begins. Revolt has broken out in the Cuban army. Among the discordant elements are a part of the rank and file who, urged on by student groups, resent the continuation in high command of Machado appointees. But the entire army, maintained by loans from the Chase National Bank, was Machado's instrument for the self-perpetuation of his power, and remains a sinister legacy of the regime for which the United States was so largely responsible. As so often in Latin American countries, the Cuban army has served not as an implement of national defense against a potential foreign foe but as the implement of dictatorial oppression. It is almost inevitable that following the fall of this dictatorship the Cuban army will either become the subservient tool of some similarly noxious force or act as a Pretorian Guard, an anti-social, indigestible body motivated only by the patriotism of its pocket. This is only one of the many aspects of the Cuban tangle which require the utmost tact and wisdom in the policy of cooperation to which the United States is committed while the Platt Amendment endures. Sugar is another problem. With the sugar industry now chiefly controlled by American banks—banks whose leadership has been thoroughly discredited at home, whose interests are antagonistic to those both of the Cuban and the American people—it is disturbing to picture American policy conducted by Jefferson Caffery. Mr. Caffery's ready services to American oil and banking interests in Colombia under the Hoover Administration disqualify him for his new task. But his appointment apparently was sponsored by Mr. Welles, who believes that he can direct Cuban policy from Washington. The task, however, calls for a first-rate man on the job all the time. Mr. Welles should stay in Cuba and see through what he has begun.

ATROCITY STORIES would be superfluous. Nazi Germany itself, publicly and proudly, proclaims ideals and intentions and acts which must create more resentment and foreboding in other lands than any tales of terror that refugees have brought out. At Nürnberg, before great congregations of district leaders and troops and youth organizations gathered in a nation-wide Nazi demonstration, the chiefs of Hitler's Third Reich—Hitler himself, Rosenberg, Goebbels, and others—defended their performances and glorified the crude policies of repression which, when others have described them, they have repudiated as slander. The Jewish policy was justified on grounds of national needs. Not only is it necessary to eliminate from Germany the dominant Jewish influence—which is decadent where the Nordic genius is creative and constructive—but all other nations will be forced to adopt tactics of a similar nature. Germany's foreign policy was discussed in vague terms; but the parade of 150,000 equipped and trained men was more eloquent than any words. Hitler solemnly insisted that Germany has no wish to win further laurels on the battlefield because no war could bring greater honor than it had won in the World War; but this mystical victory has not yet sufficed to enlarge German territory to the east or restore lost provinces. For the achievement of these proclaimed aims Hitler must, it would seem, depend upon the legions which made so brave a showing in the park at Nürnberg.

THE EFFECT OF ALL THIS, and of Germany's provocative tactics along its borders and especially in Austria, has been to increase tension all over Europe. The Allied Powers promptly granted Austria's request that it be permitted to raise a special corps of 8,000 men for duty against "terrorist elements." Russia has signed a non-aggression pact with Italy, and has received a special visit from Herriot. Most sensational and significant of all, Stalin has issued an invitation to his old enemy, Marshal Pilsudski, to come to Moscow as the guest of the Soviet Government at the Red Army celebration on the anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution in November. No stranger bedfellows than these two have been made by the Nazi menace. It is considered possible that a military agreement may be signed by Poland and Russia to reinforce the non-aggression pact arrived at in London. The British government is much concerned over the German threat to Austria; and the creation of a new British consulate at Innsbruck has been interpreted by the press as a sign that a Nazi coup in the Tyrol is considered possible. Meanwhile Premier Daladier has been engaged in inspecting a vast chain of underground fortifications stretching for 100 kilometers along the German frontier—a veritable underground city with roads and railways and dwellings, and tremendous machines of destruction designed to end in that sector the danger of invasion from the east. And the Belgian government has announced that it will float a loan of 1,500,000,000 francs to be used in rushing its border-fortification program through ahead of time.

FURTHER LIGHT on the London wheat agreement must compel some modification of the editorial view we expressed last week based on the official text then printed. The importing nations have apparently agreed to reduce their tariffs not merely in general but in specific terms. They agree to reduce their tariffs by a cent a bushel for every cent that wheat rises above a price of 63 cents a bushel in gold. In other words, if wheat at Liverpool were to rise to a price equivalent to $1 in gold, the Italian tariff, which is now $1.07 a bushel, would be reduced by the difference between $1 and 63 cents, or 37 cents a bushel. If some such reduction were not provided for, then it is obvious that every future rise in the world price of exportable wheat would permit a potential rise in the domestic wheat of the importing countries by the same amount. If world wheat rose to $1 a bushel, then Italian wheat, protected by a tariff of $1.07 a bushel, might rise, if sufficiently restricted in supply, to $2.07 a bushel before the world price of exportable wheat would prevent it from going further. This would tend to lead to a still further overexpansion of wheat acreage in the importing countries. It is obvious that this particular agreement will do nothing to improve present conditions. It will, however, have an important effect in preventing a still further overproduction of wheat in the event of a price advance, and is so far valuable. Secretary Wallace has already announced that the American wheat acreage will be reduced by 15 per cent.

THE ADMINISTRATION should think twice before going ahead with the present proposal to make direct loans to industry. This would be a return with a vengeance to the principles of Hooverism. It is better to assume on the whole that the banks are anxious to employ their funds wherever they feel that they can do so with safety. For the government to make loans to industry would be for it to risk the taxpayers' money in business firms in which bankers or private persons refuse to risk theirs. If it were true that the NRA had raised costs of production to such a point that many firms could no longer make the profit that they would otherwise be able to, and were hence being refused credit by the banks, it would be much better for the NRA officials to reconsider their first policy than to go on with it and try to finance it by pouring more government money into private industry. It is not likely that many sound banks would take advantage, either, of the proposal to borrow more money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend to industry. Loans from the R. F. C. at present cost the borrowing banks $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Prime commercial paper, on the other hand, is selling at a discount of only $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.

To borrow money at more than 4 per cent to lend at less than 2 per cent is not sound banking. Finally, it must be pointed out that some of the Administration officials have fallen into the same fallacy that Mr. Hoover fell into: they assume that a revival has to be started with a credit expansion. The sequence is the other way round: a revival in business is followed by a credit expansion, for when prices are higher and a greater volume of production is called for, manufacturers and merchants need to borrow more money, and when the banks see that these stand to make a profit, they are willing to lend more money.

SELDOM has there come to our attention a judicial action more unsound and out of keeping with the times than that of Justice Selah B. Strong of the Supreme Court of New York in denying the right of picketing to Locals 505 and 509 of the Confectionery Workers' International Union. Not only does Justice Strong's law seem to be out of line with numerous decisions in State and federal courts upholding the right of picketing, but the circumstances under which he granted the injunction add to its unreasonableness. Picketing had been authorized by the unions against certain bakeries in the New York metropolitan district in furtherance of a strike to prevent reductions in wages. The case first came before Justice Strong in Brooklyn on August 1, at which time Matthew M. Levy, counsel for the unions, asked for an adjournment on the ground that he had received only the day before the brief of the employers. Justice Strong refused an adjournment and later granted the sought-for injunction on affidavits submitted by the employers, without hearing witnesses or argument by counsel. In his order Justice Strong said:

The mere walking back and forth on a sidewalk with placards is sufficient to annoy the public and create a public nuisance. Picketing frequently leads to malicious mischief, and sometimes it leads to disorderly conduct and violence. . . . There can be no question that the defendants have been guilty of all three charges of malicious mischief, disorderly conduct, and violence and that the so-called peaceful picketing could not be.

IT IS UNCERTAIN from the language whether Justice Strong maintains that there never can be peaceful picketing or that there cannot be such in the strike in question, but it does not matter much. In either case the duty of the courts is to prevent violence, not to interfere with a fundamental and recognized right of organized labor. If Justice Strong regards two pickets with small placards as a nuisance, then his only hope of making the sidewalks free from annoyance is to prohibit the public from using them. Justice Strong's injunction was not concerned with the National Recovery Administration, but it comes right after the absurd attempt of Grover Whalen, in charge of the drive of that organization in New York City, to prevent the picketing of NRA shops. In that connection the International Juridical Association has issued a statement pointing out that the recovery act exempts from prosecution under the Sherman act (not the Clayton act) combinations which under the anti-trust laws might have been illegal. It does not take away any rights granted by those laws. Previous to 1921 mass picketing had been permitted in a number of cases. Since then it has been common to follow the rule laid down in that year by the United States Supreme Court in the case of the American Steel Foundries, limiting pickets to two or three at each entrance. Picketing is so essential to organized labor that the fight in its behalf must be carried to the highest courts and maintained, if necessary, by a general strike.

ONE-FIFTH of the country's population may be affected by conferences in New York seeking to regulate the milk industry for unspecified areas of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and Vermont. Under the regulation established by New York State a few months ago the price to the consumer has risen, and the poorer families have come to realize that government control may mean for them not only greater expenditure but even less milk or milk of a lower grade than they have been accustomed to buy. Decreased milk consumption and consumption of lower-quality milk raise important questions of health, present and future. They also affect the earnings of the producer and tend to offset the benefit he expected from laws avowedly enacted to help him out of the depression. The conferences are therefore of great moment, particularly if they lead to any measure of federal control. The federal milk administrator, Dr. Clyde King, was present at the outset of these discussions but absent in the later stages. However, the pronouncements from the conferences indicate that the national government will have a hand in establishing or enforcing agreements to be made by the conferees. If this is to be the case, it behooves the Washington officials to avoid mistakes which helped to embarrass the activities of the recently created State boards of milk control. The Secretary of Agriculture ought to announce publicly who asked for federal intervention and the reasons which induced Dr. King to step in.

THE SUSPICION that men purporting to represent producers or impartial interests have enjoyed affiliations with the big interstate distributing companies has not been wholly without justification. In the case of each man claiming to speak for groups other than the distributors, it is important to know whether he has been an officer or director of distributing companies, whether he owns stock of such companies, and whether he has been enjoying favors at their hands. The grading and classification of a producer's milk can be employed by distributors, and have been employed by some of them, to recompense or win amenable "representatives" of the body of producers. Another protection which the federal government can provide, if it has or expects to have anything to do with the proposed five-State agreement, is to require that all sessions and discussions of the eighteen representatives attending the meetings in New York shall be thrown open to the public. In addition to open sessions, there must be open hearings, conducted on the spot, where the farmers' and consumers' organizations can take part. Our new administrators in Washington should make their work privilege-proof and suspicion-proof.

FERVID PATRIOTS and rabid Marxians have one theory in common, namely, that the times produce the man. In the first case a higher power and in the second the power of the masses always projects into the scene "the man of the hour." We had been as skeptical of this theory as we are of the "nosebleed theory" of history, which, if we remember correctly, maintains that William the Conqueror would not have landed in England on that historic day in 1066 if Harold had not been unavoidably detained by a protracted case of nosebleed. But we are deeply shaken by the black eye of Huey Long. It has been established since the incident at the Sands Point Bath Club that at least half the population of this country has longed to sock the Kingfish in the eye. On the night of August 26 the number apparently had reached a great popular majority, for in a hitherto obscure washroom on Long Island a "man of the hour" who is appropriately nameless squared off, and with the pent-up desire of the American people in his fist, knocked Huey so far out of the political arena that he will probably never find his way back. Since then, with almost indecent haste, steps have been taken to make it final. Owen P. White, who proposed that a medal be struck off in honor of the Sands Point battle, reports that already more than enough funds have been received for that purpose and announces that the surplus will be turned over to the Women's Committee of Louisiana, which has for its object the elimination of Huey Long from the United States Senate. Huey himself, after a brief and profane sojourn in Milwaukee, went back to Louisiana sans patronage, sans prestige, sans everything. There are those, like Heywood Broun, to regret the loss of one who for all his sideshow manners was a bit to the left on public questions. But we can think of more persuasive proponents of radical ideas than a demagogue in green pajamas, with an unsurpassed record for crude graft and a propensity for treating washroom companions as if they were second lieutenants.

THE LATEST politician to emit an impassioned defense of the American home is Mayor Moore of Philadelphia. This time the home is menaced not by reds or bomb throwers but, if you please, by nudists, 250 in number, who applied openly for police permission to use a gymnasium and to swim without either bathing suits or interference. The roar which Mayor Moore let out is worth recording. The nudists, he says, "would not command respect in darkest Africa or amongst the aboriginal wild men of America." They would "turn back the hands of time 6,000 years and not even use a fig leaf. They cannot practice this belief in this great city of American homes." Philadelphia, it will be remembered, is also the city in which for generations the politicians have been linked with crime and the underworld for the degradation and prostitution of a large number of its men, women, and children, whose slums are among the worst in the country. But it must now be defended from the wickedness of a group of "doctors, lawyers, architects, engineers, and social registerites" who have decided to be unconventional and to adopt the conventionality of Japan and Russia, to say nothing of the numerous nudist organizations in America, England, France, and, until recently, in Germany. Well, Philadelphia is safe for the present. But will somebody please remind Mayor Moore of the once bitter outcry against the one-piece bathing suit and of the fact that the first woman to ride horseback astride in New York was fined $25 for indecent exposure of her limbs. If he should, by any chance, want the truth he would find out that the overwhelming testimony is that nudism does not make for immorality, but precisely the reverse. But what are facts to a politician defending the American home?

The Future of the Dollar

THE President's executive order, permitting the producers of newly mined gold to sell their metal at the world market price, and compelling American commercial buyers of the metal hereafter to pay this same world market price, will do much to relieve an anomalous situation. Since the United States officially abandoned the gold standard in April, the paper dollar has suffered a decided depreciation. Largely in reflection of this, the price of all the "international" commodities—wheat, cotton, sugar, hides, petroleum, wool, silk, rubber, coffee, copper, silver—rose violently in terms of paper dollars, and many domestic commodities rose in sympathy with them. Only one international commodity failed to rise—gold. There was no open market for it in this country, and none was permitted; it was not allowed to be exported, and it could be sold only to the government at the fixed statutory price of $20.67 an ounce, though the open-market price in London had risen to the equivalent of $29.50 an ounce.

Naturally American producers began to complain. They alleged that as a result of the depreciation of the paper dollar and the NRA program their costs of production were either increasing or threatening to increase, and that as consumers their cost of living was either rising or threatening to rise, while they were the only producers prohibited from getting the higher market price for their product. They held that dentists and jewelers and other commercial users, on the contrary, were getting their gold at an arbitrarily cheap figure. Moreover, bootlegging was beginning to develop and new gold was being shipped out of the country for the higher foreign price. What the President's new order now does, in effect, is to permit American producers to sell newly mined or refined gold at this world-market price, and to compel commercial buyers to pay it. The order does not permit the establishment of an open market. It accepts the prices established by the market in London. The Treasury Department is to act as the agent between buyer and seller. The seller must prove that his gold is newly mined, not old hoarded gold. The buyer must prove that he wants the gold for "legitimate," normal commercial needs.

It is obvious that this arrangement is a compromise, and it is still to be seen whether it will work satisfactorily. A completely free gold market would certainly seem to offer several important advantages. To accept the London open-market price for our gold, without permitting our own supply of, and commercial demand for, the metal to affect that price, is almost as dubious a procedure as it would be to forbid an open market in wheat and to order all American wheat to be bought and sold at home at the price daily established in the Liverpool market. In view of the fact, moreover, that the amount of gold remaining in the hands of hoarders is estimated at several hundred millions of dollars, it is difficult, when we consider that the current annual new production from American mines amounts to only about $50,000,000 a year, to see how extensive bootlegging operations are to be prevented. For the hoarders who are anxious to be rid of their gold—which, in the language of the underworld, has become "hot"—will be willing to accept less than the market price, and commercial users who would otherwise have to pay a premium of approximately 45 per cent over the former statutory price of gold will be tempted to buy gold offered for less than the new market price.

Finally, there would be a certain advantage from the standpoint of intellectual clear-headedness if a genuine open market were established. Most persons are still, for example, measuring the rise and fall of the international value of the paper dollar not directly against gold, as they should, but against the British pound. This leads to a good deal of mental confusion. The dollar is said to be falling when the pound goes up in dollar terms, or rising when the pound goes down in dollar terms; but as the pound is also merely a fluttering piece of paper, it does not take an Einstein to recognize that we cannot tell from the two quotations whether it is, in a given case, the dollar that is falling or the pound that is rising, or whether both are rising or both falling, with one moving faster than the other.

It is obvious that the new executive order, therefore, is a compromise, and that it is partly lack of an understanding of the situation and partly a desire for face-saving that prevented the establishment of a free gold market. For when the United States abandoned the gold basis, the Administration made dire threats against gold hoarders that have no parallel, historically, since the French Revolution. By its constant renewal of threats without action the Administration has presented a ludicrous spectacle. On April 5 President Roosevelt issued an executive order demanding that all holders of gold coin, gold bullion, or gold certificates should turn them in before May 1 under penalty of a $10,000 fine and ten years in jail. On April 20 another executive order was issued to the same general effect. On April 25 Secretary Woodin issued a final warning. The order was flouted by many known gold hoarders, and it was said that a test case would immediately be rushed to the courts. Former Senator Thomas's offer on May 3 for the government to "come and get him" for hoarding was ignored. On June 5 the Treasury submitted to the Department of Justice a list containing the names of more than 1,000 persons suspected of hoarding gold, and it was held that about $600,000,000 in gold and gold certificates was still outstanding. On June 6 a "drive on the hoarders" was announced, but some of them defied the government. On June 26 Attorney-General Cummings announced an extension of time, but threatened to publish the names of the hoarders. On August 12 the Attorney-General was going to announce that week whether gold hoarders would be prosecuted. Finally, the President's latest executive order permitting the sale of newly mined gold at the market price also makes hoarding a crime subject to $10,000 fine and ten years in jail.

No doubt the government has failed to carry out its threats because it doubts that it has any constitutional right to impose these penalties. It might also be well for it to ask itself whether it thinks many juries would send a man to ten years in jail simply because, as the London Times has put it, "he had sufficient foresight to realize that the gold dollar is more valuable than the paper dollar," or merely because he took advantage of the convertibility offer that the government had been making on its bills for years. Perhaps the government does not like to see speculators profiting from our action in abandoning the gold standard. It will then have to explain why it is discriminating against the gold speculators and neglecting the commodity and stock speculators, nearly all of whom have made a greater percentage of profit than the gold hoarder stands to make even if a free gold market is allowed.

The truth is that the government's attitude toward the gold hoarder is neither wise in the long run nor necessary. Such penalties were not found necessary in England, which immediately established an open gold market. Even in England, France, and Germany in war time, when the drive for gold was imperative, no such penalties were imposed or threatened: a mere patriotic appeal was deemed sufficient. Finally, the government has no real need for the gold; the amount of gold in the Federal Reserve System is now the largest in the system's history, far exceeding that in 1929, and it is not now, as then, subject to withdrawal by anybody on demand. What the government is doing, in effect, is to threaten to put a man in jail for ten years for refusing to sell it gold it does not need at a price 30 per cent below the market value.

The best way for the government to get itself out of the untenable position in which it has put itself is to prepare to devalue the dollar and return to gold convertibility at the earliest opportunity. It can hardly be argued that a depreciated dollar will help our export trade. In the last months of the Hoover Administration, when we were terribly worried because of the "dumping" of goods here from countries with depreciated currencies, and were considering special tariffs or embargoes for protection, Robert L. O'Brien, chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, remarked succinctly that whatever export advantages a depreciated currency gave that were not illusory were temporary, and whatever advantages were not temporary were illusory. This applies to our own depreciation. So long as it continues, however, other nations will fear us; and there is nothing to prevent them from putting up further embargoes or so-called "compensating" tariffs. Such embargoes and such "compensating" tariffs always overcompensate; and the probable result is that while the dollar remains depreciated, our export trade will be injured rather than helped.

It is frequently said in Washington that the dollar will not be devaluated until "we see where it is going to settle," or until "we get the price level we want." But a dollar divorced from gold has no intrinsic value; it will settle at the point where speculators think it is going to be devaluated. Its mere depreciation, however, cannot bring the rise in prices that devaluation at the same level would; for a fluctuating depreciated paper currency puts an element of uncertainty in the way of every business transaction. A return to gold, on the other hand, would not only in itself create certainty and confidence, but the mere announcement by the United States and Great Britain, if they could be brought to act together, that they were both returning to the gold standard at a devaluated level for their currencies at some definite date in the future, would in itself show that these governments had sufficient confidence to take firm action; and that demonstration of confidence would generate confidence in private business everywhere.

Austria's Sad Plight

ON August 9 the Italian government informed the British and French ambassadors in Rome of Germany's promise to put an end to all radio and airplane propaganda against Austria. On August 13 the German Reichstag deputy, Habicht, appointed by Hitler as Nazi propaganda chief for Austria, delivered an attack on the Dollfuss government from the state radio station at Munich, which penetrates far into Austrian territory; his speech was printed in hundreds of thousands of copies and scattered over Austria from airplanes. On August 20 he delivered a second attack. This shameless betrayal of a promise he had accepted and passed on in good faith prompted Mussolini to send an immediate invitation to Chancellor Dollfuss. The two prime ministers met in Riccione, where an agreement between Italy and Austria was concluded on the basis of an offer by the Italian dictator to open a part of the port of Trieste to Austria's foreign trade. Austria gratefully accepted the proposal, and will henceforth direct its exports—which, lacking harbors of its own, it had heretofore sent by way of Hamburg—through Italian channels. And since it will not be in a position to build its own mercantile fleet for years to come, Italy's shipping industry will gain what Germany's has lost by this transaction. Moreover, both nations agreed to grant to each other sweeping tariff reductions that will cut sharply into British, French, and German exports to the Danube state. Not quite three days after the publication of the Riccione agreement Premier Daladier announced, during a demonstrative inspection of the new fortifications on the Franco-German border, that France would under no circumstances tolerate an attack on the autonomy and sovereignty of the Austrian Republic.

But there is more than meets the eye behind this apparent accord between the two nations most vitally interested in the fate of Eastern Europe. Far from patching up old differences, Austria's desperate plight has spurred them on to a new race for commercial and territorial advantage, for control over Austria will ultimately extend to Hungary and to the other smaller Danubian states. Always a bone of contention between Italy and France, this issue has overshadowed all others since Hitler's coming to power made Germany a menacing third in the race. The success of his Anschluss plans would mean the extension of Germany's domination over the other Central European and Balkan states into the spheres of influence claimed by France and Italy.

The positive programs of Paris and Rome in relation to Austria are dictated by sharply conflicting economic and political interests. France is determined to prevent a union between Germany and Austria. It wishes to bring both Austria and Hungary under its direct control. Paul-Boncour, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, recently declared that "healthy cooperation with France" could be most effectively accomplished through a Danubian federation that would include Austria, Hungary, and the nations of the Little Entente. Italy likewise favors a restoration of Austro-Hungarian relations, as the frequent visits of the Hungarian Premier, Gömbös, to Rome and Vienna clearly show, but preferably as a monarchy under a Hapsburg prince.

Today the states of Europe, in their fear of the war-fomenting Hitler regime, are being forced into a united front that at the time overshadows the antagonistic interests of France, Italy, and the states of the Little Entente. But this conflict is not dead. The contest between Italy and France for hegemony over the small states of Europe will have to be fought to a finish, just as the states of the Little Entente—Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania—for their own national self-preservation will have to oppose to the utmost the revisionist movements of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Greece. So long as Germany's fight for control of Austria remains undecided, the united front among the other states of Europe will remain unbroken. But this harmony is likely to be short-lived. The days of the present Austrian government are counted. Before long Chancellor Dollfuss and his Christian Social Party will doubtless have to retire before the National Socialist movement, which, financed, directed, and controlled by Germany and supported by a despairing population, is growing to invincible proportions. Last week the Reichspost, the Dollfuss organ, was forced to admit that the Austrian Fascists control most important parts of the postal system of the country, that they open letters and telegrams, listen in on telephone conversations, and exercise a rigid censorship.

A government that has permitted the National Socialist foe to gain and hold such strongholds in its own body politic cannot long endure. The Nazi menace has grown beyond the strength of 8,000 military border guards, beyond the power of reassuring words from foreign statesmen, to control

More Speed by Rail

IT is probable that the next important advance in rapid transit in this country will be by rail. This prediction may be surprising to a generation preoccupied with the automobile and latterly with the airplane to such an extent that many persons have come to regard the railroad as an obsolete form of transportation probably doomed to eventual extinction. But this is too hasty a conclusion. The railroad is menaced—and already has been greatly injured—both by the automobile and the airplane, but the menace by no means covers the entire field and it has been exaggerated by a public unduly influenced by the spectacular. Although the railroads are much handicapped at the moment by their bad financial condition, experiments are nevertheless coming to a head which indicate a restoration of their prestige through the development of short, streamline trains, drawn on pneumatic tires by oil- or gasoline-electric engines at nearly twice the speed now attainable.

It was the automobile, of course, which gave the railroads their first and most terrific body blow. Indeed, the arrival of the automobile at the beginning of this century, although it increased incredibly the scope of private transportation, set back public transit for at least twenty years. At the outset of the century an extensive system of suburban and rural electric trolley lines was developing, and promised to spread all over the country. The automobile killed this in a decade without supplying—so far as public transit went—anything in its place. It was not until the coming of hard-surfaced roads after the World War that the motor bus began to furnish public transportation in an important way. Motor buses, which numbered 10,000 in 1920, have now increased to more than 100,000. The railroads need not have been as much injured as they were by the automobile, but coincident with its arrival they were falling into the inefficient hands of the bankers, and they met the new competition first with ill-advised contempt and later with disastrous inertia. They continued to operate long, heavy, expensive trains, and their only answer to the inroads on their traffic by the automobile was to discontinue services and abandon trackage. They ceased efforts toward greater speed, and in fact a number of fast trains were either withdrawn or put on a slower schedule. The consequences were appalling. Although the railroads still handle the vast bulk of the country's freight, their passenger revenues have declined by 70 per cent since 1920.

Yet the situation of the railroads is far from hopeless. There are, in fact, distinct portents in their favor at this time. The railroad continues to be incomparably the fastest and cheapest means of moving bulk freight, and although it has lost considerable short-haul, small-merchandise business to motor trucks, it is in a way to regain part of this by organizing its own collection and delivery service. Its passenger losses are more serious. The motor bus is carrying passengers more cheaply and the airplane more rapidly than it does. It can never hope to equal the airplane in speed, but the latter is, and for the near future promises to be, considerably more expensive. Until the airplane can rise and descend vertically, it is physically incapable of handling a great volume of traffic, because too much space is required for the manipulation of a single machine. For those who can afford it, the airplane will snatch an increasing number of long-distance passengers from the railroads, but it is doubtful if it can save much time on stretches of less than 500 miles. Between New York and Washington, for instance, a railroad train takes five hours as compared with two hours in an airplane, but another couple of hours must be added for getting to and from the airports, so that the total saving in time is not considerable.

To date the motor bus has been a much more formidable competitor for railroad passenger business than the airplane. It travels on a roadbed laid by the public and can haul travelers at about half the cost of that in the present heavy railroad train. At the same time the motor bus probably has reached the limit of speed under existing conditions, and increasing congestion of traffic may even retard it. The railroad has an immense advantage from the standpoint of speed in owning its highways, and it is claimed in behalf of the new three-car, streamline, motor-propelled trains with which the Union Pacific is experimenting that they can be operated not only twice as fast as a motor bus but slightly more cheaply.

Europe beat us with the first new-style, high-speed train—from Berlin to Hamburg—which travels ninety miles an hour. But a somewhat similar train was recently tried on the Long Island Railroad. It did seventy miles an hour, but was said to be good for ninety. The new trains with which the Union Pacific and the Burlington systems are experimenting are expected to run between Chicago and Los Angeles at seventy miles an hour. The opportunity for greater speed lies before American railroads, and there are signs that some of them are waking from their quarter of a century of disastrous hibernation to grasp it.

Issues and Men

Six Months of Franklin D. Roosevelt

THE President has passed the first important milestone of his four-year term. Six months have passed since he assumed power, and it is now a trite fact that more has been crowded into that brief period than into any other peace-time Administration in Washington. It may even be contended that the first six months of Wilson's war Administration were not so momentous so far as legislation is concerned. Beyond question no man is able to visualize, or even to guess, how far the New Deal may take us. It is like war. You begin a war in Cuba and end on the other side of the globe in the Philippines, which scarcely an American had ever heard of before. You begin to battle in Belgium and you fight in Asia, Africa, and all over Europe before you are through. The country has started on a new path of controlled industry and economics and no one knows what the outcome will be—whether we shall hold on to our institutions, or whether we shall end completely socialized, or with a fascist dictatorship.

But that uncertainty need not keep us from trying to evaluate today what Mr. Roosevelt has accomplished and his manner of doing it, for that frequently counts for more than the actual achievement. Nor need we be deterred by the fact that the President has been actuated by no predetermined policy or program. He has not moved in accordance with any deep-seated political or economic philosophy—I still feel this even though, in his acceptance of Mr. Moley's resignation, he spoke of the latter's "participation during these two years in the development of policies based on our common ideals." During his term as Governor of New York there was not the slightest sign of advocacy of, or adherence to, any far-reaching policy of social reorganization. Nor did his speeches during his campaign in any way mark him as a radical reformer. Indubitably he has been governed, since he has been in Washington, by the immediate needs of the hour, especially at the very outset, when the banking collapse was upon us. To a certain extent that was inevitable; but to go on through three and one-half more years without a definite, clear-cut vision of the goal, or goals, to be achieved may easily prove to be a very different matter. The day may come, sooner than the President now realizes, when he will be faced with the question, "Under which king, Bezonian?" and have to decide once for all.

But today it is proper to pass judgment upon what Mr. Roosevelt has so far done without stopping to consider the remoter implications. I think we can all agree that his unbounded courage and cheerful self-confidence have had a vital effect upon the public. He has carried his tremendous burden almost jauntily—perhaps because of a certain streak of incurable youthfulness in him. In any event this attitude of his has helped to ease the national strain and to change the American mentality, and that, as I have already said on this page, is one of his greatest achievements. That we can today discuss and authorize radical measures without being called Bolsheviks is, I repeat, a tremendous step forward, for which we cannot feel too grateful. Side by side with that let me put the extraordinary spectacle of our greatest steel, coal, oil, and other magnates coming down to Washington, not to give orders as has been the habit of these privileged masters of capital, our real rulers in America for decades, but to sit like schoolboys before General Johnson, to be rudely lectured and told what they have got to do. What a reversal of roles! What a New Freedom for our government! Woodrow Wilson, the author of the New Freedom slogan, it will be remembered, undertook to do this very thing. His Assistant Secretary of the Navy has accomplished vastly more in six months in this respect—with the vital aid of an economic collapse and panic—than Mr. Wilson achieved during his entire term.

Then I want to praise here and now Franklin Roosevelt's attitude toward his high office. He has held it in the best American tradition, with complete simplicity, and has done nothing to augment, and much to decrease, that alarming tendency in Washington to adorn the Presidency with the trappings of royalty. He has been affable, approachable, modest, unassuming. Have you noticed that whereas Herbert Hoover was guarded at his summer camp by a company of marines at government expense—they made roads for him when not protecting his precious person—there is no such flummery, not a uniform, at Hyde Park? To some the President's going off on a little schooner seemed an affectation; to me it was an extraordinarily happy procedure. There were no plain schooner yachts in the days of Cincinnatus and Israel Putnam. Had they existed, those patriots, after returning to their plows, would probably have treated themselves to similar simple vacations. Like Grover Cleveland, Mr. Roosevelt has, so far at least, exalted his office by regarding himself as a citizen temporarily projected into a high place, seeking no personal enhancement. I have not heard definitely, but I do not believe that Mr. Roosevelt enters the public parlors in the White House, when they are full of visitors, preceded by a bugler, as did the pitifully small Herbert Hoover, whose subconscious realization of his smallness made him surround himself with ceremonial.

So the manner in which the President has borne himself in office, the charm of his radio voice, the friendliness which everybody has felt for him have all done their share in winning the public to him. I believe he would carry every State in the Union if the people were called upon to vote for or against him today. At least it is true that he has done away with partisanship, and not by strident patriotic appeals. There is Congressman Goss of Waterbury, Connecticut, a typical rich manufacturer-Republican and apostle of that protection by which he and his class and group have profited so largely. Did he not assure an NRA gathering in Hartford the other day that he, who had voted and worked against Franklin Roosevelt, wished now to testify that he had never in his life seen such courage and such devotion as the President has shown since March 4? This is disarming your enemies with a vengeance!

I have not space for further listing of the things that impress me favorably about the President. But the other side? Yes, there is another side which must be portrayed if justice is to be done and the scales held evenly. On the side of our foreign relations Mr. Roosevelt's record is bad, almost disastrous. Like his predecessors, he has parceled out many of the highest diplomatic positions to large contributors to his campaign funds or paid political debts with them. He too has degraded the newspaper profession—or better, business—by giving offices, such as the London Embassy, to newspaper supporters. He has done nothing in regard to Manchuria; he has shown no teamwork with Norman Davis and made no genuine contribution to disarmament despite his moving appeal to the nations to ground arms. On the contrary—and this is the worst of his offending—without warrant of Congress he has ordered the building up of the navy to treaty size by the petty subterfuge of "emergency public works," thus initiating a new armament race which has already produced the inevitable repercussions in England and Japan and may easily lead to another world war. He has given no lead in dealing with Hitler's Germany, and no voice to American indignation thereat. So far the inter-Allied debt situation is worse befogged under his failure to lead than it was before. His treatment of the World Economic Conference was literally scandalous; his change of mind on currency stabilization, and his berating of the conference because he had changed his mind, wrecked the meeting and reduced American influence to its lowest ebb. His repudiation of the gold clause in our bonds has also contributed enormously to the decline of American prestige.

At home the President has not yet really come to grips with some of the greatest vested interests, such as the protection barons. His attitude toward labor is in great need of clarification—as is that of the NRA, too. Yet it is a fact that he has abolished child labor—by accident if you please; and it almost looks, as one observer just back from Washington writes me, as if the government were "building a labor movement in America." He has, as I have said, no real chart by which to sail the ship of state, no deep philosophy, no real aim, no clarified vision of the America he wishes to create. Even his homily of the other day, that hereafter we are to treat all groups in the nation as neighbors have treated one another and allow no actions hurtful to anyone within the nation's boundaries, lacks clarity. Hence, if NRA fails and the emergency compels, we may yet see Franklin Roosevelt go to the fascist right as easily as to the radical left.

His severest tests are yet before him—especially the test of his leadership. He—and we—may sometime look back upon the just completed half-year as the golden period of his rule. As to that we shall know a great deal more when the next period of six months ends. Meanwhile, we can all be grateful for the good things that he has accomplished; wish him well every hour of the day and night; pray for his complete success, and help him, too, by rigid and faithful and unyielding criticism whenever and wherever criticism is due.

Quincy Garrison Kilgore

Russia's Mental Revolution

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, August 17

COMMUNISTS derive much pleasure from pointing out the inner contradictions of the capitalist system, from pointing out the close proximity of luxury and dire poverty, for instance. Yet the Soviet Union has its own inner contradictions. Under certain circumstances plenty is a problem in the U. S. S. R. too. Thus the enrichment of the peasant between 1923 and 1926 precipitated the Stalin-Trotsky crisis in the Communist Party, and stimulated a demand for measures that would prevent further enrichment. The middle peasants and kulaks were increasing their production. At the risk of diminishing national wealth and income, the Kremlin had to check that increase. A mujik with two cows was a good citizen in 1925. But if one cow did the un-Bolshevik thing and gave birth to a calf, the mujik became a persecuted kulak who had to give up all three animals and thereby reduce the country's supply of meat and dairy products.

Agrarian collectivization was conceived as a means of eliminating this inner Soviet contradiction. In essence, collectivization is an attempt to foster peasant enrichment without thereby creating an economically powerful class that will oppose socialism and the soviets. The peasants are to grow rich collectively but not individually. Yet this year's excellent crop has already set people thinking whether collectivization can achieve this goal. One begins to foresee new struggles between the city and the village. One begins to suspect that collectivization is not the last step in the evolution of Soviet agriculture.

In 1917 the Bolsheviks nationalized land. The peasant held his land in usufruct. But he retained his draft animals, cattle, and equipment, and, after 1921, he could sell his produce privately. He was therefore a private capitalist—120,000,000 private capitalists in a socialist country of 145,000,000 inhabitants!

The purpose of collectivization was to take from the peasant his horse, ox, plow, and harrow, and to collectivize them. By collectivizing the peasant's means of production the government proposed to destroy him as a capitalist. Those Communist village administrators, therefore, who in 1929 and 1930 and again in 1932 also collectivized the peasant's cow, hogs, chickens, and vegetable plots were following a very healthy Marxist instinct, and it is no wonder, accordingly, that Moscow closed an eye to these activities. The peasantry, however, fought violently for its capitalist vestiges. It fought directly by means of sabotage and arson, and it fought indirectly by slaughtering the animals threatened with collectivization. (Hence today's meat and fat shortage.) As a concession to the village the Kremlin finally allowed the collectivized peasants to keep their dairy and small animals and poultry, and, moreover, to till their truck gardens for their own, as distinguished from the collective's, benefit.

In May, 1932, as a further concession calculated to relieve food scarcity, the party and government legalized the peasant's open-market sale of his surplus products.

Now, the one big step forward, collectivization, plus these two apparently small steps backward, produces the following situation: The vast majority of Russia's peasants are organized in artels or collectives. They own no land, no working animals, no machinery. They plant and harvest the big crops, like grain, cotton, flax, and so forth, in common. From the common collectivized economy the peasant receives compensation in accordance with the size of the crop and with the quantity and quality of labor which he and his family have contributed during the year to the collective. He may consume this compensation himself, but in good years he has a very appreciable surplus of grain or potatoes to dispose of on the market. Here, then, ■ a unit in the collective, the collectivized peasant is a socialist producer and at the same time a private merchant. In addition, however, each member of a collective may and often does have a cow, a few pigs, some sheep, ■ few chickens, and a small area around his privately owned house where he grows vegetables, hay, sunflower seeds, and such minor crops. These are his own property. What he saves from personal consumption he can sell to individual city residents. Here the peasant is a private producer and a private merchant as well.

The Soviet agrarian collective, or kolhoz, accordingly, is not yet a purely socialist form of society. No one can say that Russian agriculture has been completely socialized. The present bastard unit is bound to pass through further evolutionary stages. It may be that the government will be forced to interfere with the growth in productivity of the kolhoz, as it interfered with the kulak's growing productivity in 1927.

